PREFACE.

When the author of this work, in 1886, began the publication of the HISTORICAL RECORD, it was his intention during the following four years to give the public a work of reference on Church history, covering the entire period from the Prophet Joseph Smith's birth to the present time. This could have been accomplished by the adoption of a uniform system of brevity throughout; but having to rely on public patronage, in order to make the undertaking a possibility from a financial standpoint, it was found necessary, as the work proceeded, to deviate somewhat from the original plan, and enter more deeply and minutely into matters pertaining to early Church history, which seemed to be of special interest to a majority of readers. Consequently, the four volumes, now completed, will be found to treat mostly upon matters pertaining to the progress of the Church previous to the location of its headquarters in Utah, and the narration of more modern incidents is reserved for a future work.

In offering these volumes to the public, the author is aware that he has presented, in the shape of a monthly magazine, something different from anything previously issued from the press, and that, by having entered a hitherto nearly untrodden field, he has labored under many disadvantages; but he has endeavored to be accurate and plain in all statements, and has only sought such sources of information as were considered perfectly reliable. In arranging the several articles with a special view to making the entire work a book of reference, care has been taken to compile under the same headings such matter as might be considered kindred in nature; and by the assistance of the index, which, under the caption of Church Encyclopædia, has been made full and complete, the reader will be able to find any information the work contains in a very few moments.

If the Latter-day Saints, to whom this work is respectfully dedicated, will read it under the influence of the same spirit that prompted the author to write and compile it, he will be fully satisfied with the result.

Respectfully,

ANDREW JENSON.

No. 1. JANUARY, 1886. VOL. V.

EARLY CHURCH HISTORY.

Compiled principally from the writings of Geo. A. Smith and Orson Pratt.

Joseph Smith, the Prophet, was born in Sharon, Windsor County, Vermont, December 23, 1805. When ten years old, his parents and family removed to Palmyra, Ontario County, New York, in the vicinity of which he resided about eleven years. During the latter part of this period, he dwelt in the town of Manchester, He was by occupation a farmer, and his advantages of education were very limited.

Like Samuel of old, Joseph Smith was called of the Lord in his childhood, while his mind was yet unwarped by the false theories, traditions and creeds of uninspired men. When about fourteen years of age, he began seriously to reflect upon the necessity of being prepared for a future state of existence. He went among the different denominations that existed in the State of New York, and his mind became perplexed with the clashing and contention, which existed among those who professed the name of Christ.

Disgusted with the confusion which his researches disclosed, and encouraged by the promise of Saint James, "If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not, and it shall be given him," he retired to a grove, and in earnest prayer besought the Lord to reveal the way of salvation. While thus engaged, he beheld two glorious beings, wrapped in a brilliant and glorious light, who informed him that all the religious sects of the present age had departed from the ancient gospel of Jesus Christ and his Apostles, with its gifts and Priesthood, which should be made known to him in due season. Many glorious things were shown him in this vision.

About four years after, on the evening of September 21, 1823, while Joseph Smith was engaged in prayer, and striving to exercise faith, the room was filled with light surpassing that of noon day, in the midst of which was a person whose countenance was as lightning, and yet so full of innocence and goodness, and of such a glorious appearance, as to banish all apprehension. He was an angel commissioned of God to inform Joseph that the covenants with ancient Israel touching their posterity should soon be fulfilled, and that the great work to prepare for the second coming of Christ should now commence, and the fulness of the gospel be made known to all nations. The angel also informed him that the native inhabitants of America were a remnant of Israel, who had anciently enjoyed the ministry of inspired men; that records containing their history had been preserved to the period of their national degeneracy; that these records had been concealed in the earth, and that the Lord promised they should be revealed in the near future.

On the following day the angel returned and showed him the spot where the sacred records were deposited. A small rock, projecting a little above the earth's surface, covered a stone box. Joseph opened it and beheld the plates.

The angel said: "You cannot at this time obtain them, and when they are obtained, it must be by prayer and faithfulness in obeying the Lord; they are not deposited here for the sake of accumulating gain or wealth, or for the glory of this world; they are of no worth to the children of men, only for the knowledge they contain, which is the fulness of the gospel of Jesus Christ, as it was given to the ancient people of this land." The stature of this personage was a little above the common size of men in this age; his garments were perfectly white, and they appeared to be without seams.

Much instruction was given by the angel to Joseph Smith during a period of four years, and on the 22nd of September, 1827, the angel of the Lord delivered the records into his hands. They were engraved on plates which had the appearance of gold; each plate was about seven inches by eight in width and length, not quite as thick as common tin, beautifully engraved on both sides in reformed Egyptian characters, bound together in a volume as the leaves of a book, fastened at the edge with three rings running through the book. With the records was found a curious instrument called by the ancients the Urim and Thummim. By the gift and power of God, through its means, he translated the record, which is the Book of Mormon. The first edition of 5,000 copies was published by Joseph Smith, at Palmyra, New York, early in 1830.

On May 15, 1829, while engaged in the work of translation, Joseph Smith and his scribe, Oliver Cowdery, became deeply impressed upon the subject of water baptism, the form and object of which, and the authority necessary to administer the same, were clearly taught by our Savior in person among the ancient Israelites of America. They earnestly desired to attend to this important duty; but, knowing that the uninspired teachers of modern times were without divine authority, they were at a loss how to receive the ordinance legally. While praying earnestly to the Lord upon this subject, an angel in his glory appeared, and, laying his hands upon their heads, he ordained them to the Aaronic Priesthood, and told them that this Priesthood included the authority to baptize in water for the remission of sins, but not to administer the higher ordinances. This heavenly messenger, who said his name was John the Baptist, also told them to baptize each other, which they did the same day.

A few months later they began to seriously consider the importance of receiving those greater blessings and powers of the gospel, which the Priesthood of John the Baptist did not include. After engaging in humble prayer, three of the ancient Apostles —Peter, James and John—appeared and ordained them to the Apostleship, giving them full authority to administer in all the ordanances of the gospel.

Having baptized a few penitent believers, they, by divine command, organized the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints on April 6, 1830, in Fayette, Seneca County, New York, with six members.

The Book of Mormon being printed, the Church began to attract the attention of newspaper editors, who immediately opened their artillery against Joseph Smith, and the few people who had received his testimony. The tocsin of persecution was immediately sounded, and continued to increase, with scarcely any cessation, during his whole natural life.

Through the labors of Joseph Smith, Hyrum Smith, Oliver Cowdery and other Elders, who had been ordained, branches were established in New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, the British provinces and the New England States.

A large branch of the Church was established in Kirtland, Geauga County, Ohio, and, the spirit of persecution pursuing all the branches to a very great extent, the Saints, agreeable to a commandment of God, commenced gathering to Kirtland. Soon after, Joseph Smith, with several of the Elders, visited Jackson County, Missouri, and there commenced settlements of the Saints, Upper Missouri being at that time but thinly inhabited.

In June, 1831, a conference was held at Kirtland; a number of the Elders were ordained High Priests by Joseph Smith, he being President of the High Priesthood and of the whole Church, being called of the Lord, like unto Moses, a Seer, Revelator, Translator and Prophet; and it was his privilege to have two counselors, to act as assistant presidents, which form the First Presidency of the Church.

In June, 1832, William W. Phelps & Co. commenced printing a monthly periodical called the Evening and Morning Star, at Independence Missouri, devoted expressly to the spreading of the principles of the gospel, and publishing the revelations of God to the Church.

A mercantile house was established by the firm of A. S. Gilbert & Co., and several hundred farms were opened, and mills and many extensive improvements commenced.

The Elders continued to preach with unabated zeal, notwithstanding they were constantly subjected to abuse.

On March 24, 1832, Joseph Smith and Elder Sidney Rigdon were dragged from their beds at midnight, in the town of Hiram, Portage County, Ohio, daubed with tar and feathers, and severely injured. Aqua fortis was poured into President Smith's mouth, and he was held by the throat until left for dead. One of his children was sick with the measles, and being in bed with him at the time of the outrage, was thereby exposed to the night air, and died soon afterwards. This child (a boy) may be called the first martyr of this dispensation.

In June, 1833, a commencement was made for the building of a Temple in Kirtland.

On July 20, 1833, the printing office of William W. Phelps, at Independence, Missouri, was surrounded by a mob of about five hundred men; the press was destroyed, the type pied, and the house, a two-story brick building, pulled down. Loss of property, $6,700. Edward Partridge, the Presiding Bishop of the Church, was publicly stripped, tarred and feathered on the public square, in the presence of several hundred spectators. Mr. Charles Allen, a member of the Church, received the same compliment; the tar was mixed with some corrosive substance.

The store of Gilbert and Whitney was broken open, their goods promiscuously scattered in the streets—lives threatened, individuals whipped, and a great number of houses unroofed by parties visiting the different settlements.

About twelve hundred Saints were finally driven across the Missouri River into Clay County. All this happened in a little over two years from the first settlement of the Saints in Jackson County. During this period the Saints had conducted themselves as good citizens; and although their persecutors held all the civil offices in the county, there was not one case of crime against the Saints to be found on their court records. In this persecution sectarian priests acted a very conspicuous part, and nearly all the civil and military officers of the county were leaders of the mob.

As the Saints were scattered along the banks of the Missouri River, a plot was laid by a party of the mob to murder all who should be left on the Jackson side. On the morning of November 13, 1833, very early, they beheld the wonderful meteoric phenomenon of the stars falling from heaven, which caused the hearts of the Saints to rejoice, and the mob to abandon their purpose. Some of the mobbers were so affected by the sight that they wept, believing the day of judgment at hand.

In the fall of 1833 a printing press was established in Kirtland, Ohio, where Oliver Cowdery commenced the republication of the Evening and Morning Star, which afterwards changed its name to the Latter-day Saints' Messenger and Advocate.

In 1834, Joseph Smith, accompanied by 205 men, visited Clay County, Missouri, and attempted to bring about a reconciliation with the people of Jackson. His Excellency Daniel Dunklin, then governor of Missouri, notified the legislature in his annual message, that the means of enforcing the laws, both civil and military, were so insufficient that the "Mormons" could not be protected in the State. He had previously written to Colonel J. Thornton, under date of June 6, 1834, as follows: "I am fully persuaded that the eccentricity of the religious opinions and practices of the Mormons, is at the bottom of the outrages committed against them."

By industry, economy and prudence, the Saints in Clay and the adjoining counties had begun to acquire wealth and to enjoy prosperity, and were enabled to purchase considerable tracts of land. This led the cruel Jackson County mob to raise an excitement in Clay County. Public meetings were held, and the Saints notified by their official resolutions, that they must cease to make improvements in Clay County, or to purchase other lands; and required them to leave the county of Clay. A location was accordingly made in a new, uninhabited, naked prairie country, destitute of timber, by the unanimous consent of the mob, who said it was fit for nothing else but the "Mormons." The Saints of Clay County purchased the lands of the government, and moved immediately into Caldwell.

In 1833, Joseph Smith, senior, was set apart as Patriarch over the whole Church to bless the fatherless.

On the 14th day of February, 1835, Joseph Smith and the three Witnesses of the Book of Mormon, by a commandment of God, selected and ordained twelve Apostles, to be special witnesses in all the world of the fulness of the gospel, and to preside over the Church in all cases when the First Presidency was absent; and during the year 1835 they visited the States east of Ohio, and also the British provinces, comforting the scattered branches, preaching the gospel, and building up new branches. Many hundreds were baptized during the season. About the same time, Joseph Smith also ordained a quorum of seventy Elders for the same purpose, many of whom devoted the most of their time to traveling and preaching, going forth "without purse or scrip."

The Temple in Kirtland was so far completed as to be dedicated on March 27, 1836, 416 Elders being present in a general council on the evening of the dedication. This Temple is a stone building, 80 feet by 60 feet, the walls 50 feet high, and the tower 110 feet high. There are two main halls, 55 feet by 65 feet in the inner court, four vestries in the front, and five school-rooms in the attic. The whole building was well finished, and a fine specimen of architecture.

In June, 1837, Heber C. Kimball, Orson Hyde, Willard Richards and Joseph Fielding started from Kirtland on a mission to the British Islands. In New York they were joined by three others, arrived in England on the 20th of July, without a farthing in their pockets, and on the 23rd commenced preaching in Preston. At Christmas the Church had extended from Preston to Penwortham, Longton, Southport, Eccleston, Whittle and Hunter's Hill, the number of members amounting to about one thousand.

In 1837 the greater portion of the Saints in Kirtland, Ohio, moved to Missouri, and settled in Caldwell, Daviess, Clinton, Carroll and Ray counties. The county of Caldwell had been organized, and the city of Far West established.

In January, 1838, the printing office in Kirtland was destroyed by fire, which was the work of an incendiary.

In the spring of 1838, the emigration to Missouri continued, most of the Saints leaving Kirtland. The foundation of a town was laid on Grand River in Daviess County, called Adam-ondi-Ahman. Several hundred thousand acres of land had been entered at the land office, and some two thousand large and flourishing farms opened thereon. A village was also commenced in Carroll County, on the Missouri River, called De Witt.

Caldwell County had in three years been changed from a naked prairie to one of the most flourishing counties in the State. The corner stones were laid for a Temple at Far West, 110 feet long by 80 feet wide, a printing office established, and a monthly paper called the Elders' Journal was published.

In August, 1838, at an election held in Gallatin, Daviess County, a barrel of whisky was rolled out, and the crowd invited to drink heartily, and prevent the "Mormons" from voting. A riot ensued, ending in three of the eight "Mormons" who were present being knocked down, and twenty-three of the mob being carried off in a degree helpless. One of the "Mormons" was stabbed. Immediately the tocsin of mobocracy was again sounded, and several hundred men assembled at Millport, swearing extermination against the Saints. They were soon dispersed by the interference of General Doniphan, but it was only to shift their quarters. They removed to De Witt, in Carroll County, and drove out its inhabitants, robbing them of their property. Several of the Saints perished from want and suffering, and the remnant escaped into Caldwell.

The mob again renewed their operations in Daviess County, filling the country with false reports; but finding their undertaking likely to fail, Lilburn W. Boggs, then the governor of Missouri, issued an order for the extermination of the "Mormons" from the free Republic of Missouri; and ordered Major-General Clark, with 13,000 men, to proceed immediately to Far West, and put the cruel decree into execution. This force immediately proceeded to the settlements of the "Mormons," who, being but few in number comparatively, and finding themselves opposed by the form of legal proceeding, made no resistance to this military force, although they would have fought the whole of them, had they continued in their true colors as a mob. Under pledges of peace and protection, men, women and children were indiscriminately maltreated, women ravished, houses plundered, horses stolen, cattle and hogs shot in their pens for sport, corn fields robbed, thousands of acres of grain destroyed by turning horses into the fields, and fences burned up. Several hundred persons were driven in a defenceless condition into a hollow square of armed fiends, and compelled to sign away their property to the republic of Missouri, to defray the expenses which had been incurred in committing these crimes. About seventy of the brethren were selected for the purpose of execution. Public notice was given that they would be put to death, and the residue permitted to go home, take their families and leave the State on pain of death.

On November 1, 1838, Joseph Smith and his comrades were tried by a court martial, without their being present, or allowed to make any defence, and sentenced to be shot. The order for their execution was given by Major-General Lucas as follows:

"BRIGADIER-GENERAL DONIPHAN:—Sir, you will take Joseph Smith and the other prisoners into the public square of Far West, and SHOOT them at 9 oclock to-morrow morning."

Doniphan, possessing a knowledge of law, and having a good share of humanity, replied, "It is cold-blooded murder! I will not obey your order; my brigade shall march for Liberty to-morrow morning at 8 o'clock, and if you execute those men, I'll hold you responsible before an earthly tribunal, so help me God!"

Thus the lives of the prisoners were saved. The scene that followed beggars description; language is inadequate to describe it. Imagine fifteen thousand people, including nearly all ages, sexes, and conditions, driven in midwinter from every thing they possessed, destitute, hungry, naked, homeless and friendless, across trackless prairies, scattered two and three hundred miles from their homes, which they had erected on lands purchased from the Government of the United States, and under the protection of the American flag. Scores—perhaps hundreds—perished during the winter, spring and summer, because of their exposure. The men in consequence of their over-exertion and anxiety, failed first, leaving widows and orphan children in great numbers to still suffer.

After nearly all the Saints had left the State, Joseph Smith and fellow-prisoners, who had been confined in jails several months, succeeded in escaping from their enemies and arrived, after much suffering, among their friends in Illinois.

President Smith soon afterwards went to Washington, and made application to the President of the United States and to Congress for redress. The most favorable reply he there received was that of Mr. Van Buren, then President of the United States, who said: "Your cause is just, but I can do nothing for you."

Senator Clay coldly remarked: "You had better go to Oregon." Senator Calhoon said: "It involves a nice question, the question of States rights; it will not do to agitate it." And the committee of Congress reported that it was none of their business.

The scattered remnants of the Saints, not disheartened, though persecuted, clustered around President Smith, and commenced building the City of Nauvoo—a Hebrew name for beautiful—on the bank of the Mississippi River, in Hancock County, Illinois. This place was so sickly that two unsuccessful attempts had been made to settle it, only a few families living there; yet their burying yard contained such a number of graves as might frighten a new settler from the State of New York, even if there had been as many as three thousand inhabitants.

On September 14, 1840, the Patriarch, Joseph Smith, senior, worn out with exposure and toil, died at Nauvoo; and Hyrum Smith, his eldest son, who had previously received ordination and blessing under his father's hands, was subsequently acknowledged Patriarch over the whole Church.

The bluffs around Nauvoo were put in cultivation, the swamps drained, and in a few years Nauvoo became as healthy as any part of Illinois.

The people of Missouri, not content with their late system of robbery and extermination against the Saints, commenced a series of vexatious lawsuits against them, as soon as they became satisfied that they would not all die on the banks of the Mississippi.

In the year 1841 Joseph Smith was demanded by Governor Carlin of Illinois, on a requisition from the governor of Missouri, and a writ issued by Carlin for his apprehension. A writ of habeas corpus was issued, the case was investigated at Monmouth, before Judge Stephen A. Douglas, and the arrest declared illegal.

This proceeding, including the expense of counsel, fees of attendants, witnesses, etc., cost upwards of three thousand dollars — no inconsiderable sum for a person who had just been robbed of his all.

Dissatisfied with the result of legal proceedings, the Missourians commenced a system of kidnaping, by which means several individuals were carried forcibly, without form of law, into Missouri, whipped, imprisoned, and, some of them, hung by the neck and otherwise tortured.

The sum of $200,000 was appropriated by the legislature of Missouri to defray the expenses of the "Mormon" massacres, the plundered property not being considered sufficient to pay the robbers.

In 1842 a new demand was made by the governor of Missouri. Joseph Smith was again arrested, and an attempt made to kidnap him into that State. A writ of habeas corpus was obtained from the United States District Court for the State of Illinois. Judge Pope heard the case in Springfield, and decided that "the proceedings were illegal, and that Missouri had no claim on him." He ordered it entered on the docket that he should be troubled no more in the matter. This proceeding altogether cost about $12,000.

A foundation had been laid for a Temple in the city of Nauvoo. A charter had been obtained for the city, conferring liberal powers upon the city council. A university and manufacturing association were duly incorporated, and a Legion chartered. The university was organized and put in operation in general departments. The manufacturers' association commenced the erection of large buildings for the manufacture of pottery. Thousands of people flocked in from every part of the United States and the British Isles. Streets were opened, and hundreds of fine buildings erected. A company was incorporated for the purpose of building an extensive hotel with a capital of $200,000; a considerable amount of stock was sold, and the basement story of the building, with 240 feet front, was finished. An extensive printing establishment, stereotype foundry and book bindery was put in active operation, two masonic lodges established, and a large and commodious masonic temple built. Several flourishing villages of the Saints were established in different parts of Hancock and neighboring counties, as well as in Iowa. In the meantime, Joseph Duncan, an aspiring party leader, anxious to become governor of Illinois, took the stump at Edwardsville, and from that place visited different parts of the State, rousing all the vile passions and religious prejudices that could exist against the Saints, promising that if he could be elected governor of Illinois, he would exterminate the "Mormons." This formed an extensive anti-"Mormon" party, who, although unsuccessful in the election which elevated Thomas Ford to the executive chair, continued its operations.

In the month of June, 1843, Joseph Smith, while on a visit 250 miles from home, was arrested at Inlet Grove, Lee County, Illinois, by Officers Reynolds and Wilson, by virtue of a writ from Governor Thomas Ford, issued on a demand from the governor of Missouri; and strenuous attempts were made to kidnap him directly to Missouri, which would have been done, had not some high-minded citizens of Dixon and Pawpaw Grove lent their aid and come to his rescue. When the news of his arrest reached Nauvoo, hundreds of the Saints mounted their horses and started to his assistance. Another struggle against kidnaping, another series of legal proceedings, another writ of habeas corpus, another trial, and another discharge, were the result. The cost of this proceeding was immense, for so zealous were the Saints to protect their leader, that, in addition to filling the whole country with horsemen between the Illinois and Mississippi rivers, and sending a squadron across the Illinois to prevent his being kidnaped, about one hundred men chartered a steamboat which kept a constant watch of the boats on the Illinois and Mississippi rivers, to prevent his being carried into Missouri by steamboat. One hundred thousand dollars would not defray the expenses and damage to Nauvoo by this arrest.

The Illinois Legislature, in the session of 1843-1844, made an attempt to repeal the charters granted to the City of Nauvoo, which, although it did not succeed, had a tendency to depreciate the value of stock with the manufacturing and Nauvoo House associations. In June, 1844, a mob assembled in the neighborhood of Carthage, circulating reports that Joseph Smith and the "Mormons" had bid defiance to the laws of the State, and all manner of falsehoods were put in circulation, to inflame the public mind. The editors of several newspapers also devoted their time and space to propagating these falsehoods; and on the strength of the rumor that the "Mormons" were determined to resist the laws, Governor Ford came to Carthage and ordered into service several hundred men, mostly members of the mob. He then sent an officer to Nauvoo to arrest Joseph Smith and several others. The Prophet, apprehending that the intention was to murder him instead of trying him the forty-seventh time by law, requested the governor to protect him from mob violence, which he pledged the faith of the State to do. The matter of which he was accused being investigated, he was again dismissed, when a new writ was taken out, charging him with treason, and he was put in jail. Governor Ford then dismissed all his troops except one company (the Carthage Greys), which was known to possess the most violent feelings of hatred towards the "Mormons," and treacherously left them to be murdered, after having held a private council on the subject; and, concluding that this would be the best way to pacify the feelings of the mob, HE left them to their fate.

On June 27, 1844, at 23 minutes past five o'clock p. m., the prison was surrounded by about one hundred and fifty armed men, with their faces blackened, who massacred Joseph Smith and his brother Hyrum, the Patriarch of the Church, leaving Elder John Taylor severely wounded with four balls. Elder Willard Richards, who was in the same room, escaped unhurt. Although President Smith had repeatedly apprised the Saints that his stay among them would be short, and before leaving Nauvoo told his friends he was going like a lamb to the slaughter and would never return, no people on the face of the earth ever mourned more sincerely the loss of a benefactor and leader than did the Latter-day Saints on that occasion.

The "anti-"Mormons" rejoiced in his death and exulted loudly in their victorious treachery, while the Christian world generally exclaimed, "How barbarous to kill him so, but then it is a good thing he is dead!"

At the fall term of court, bills of indictment for murder in the first degree, were found against the principal leaders in the massacre, but they were allowed by the court to go at large on bail, and to go each other's security, only $1,000 being the sum required. In May, 1845, they had a sham trial and were acquitted, although the court, bar, jury and witnesses KNEW them to be guilty of the murder.

The Twelve Apostles, being the first quorum in authority in the Church, by the unanimous voice of the Saints, immediately returned from their mission abroad, and took their position at the head of affairs in Nauvoo; Brigham Young, president of the Twelve Apostles, presiding.

The Temple, which was one story high at the time of the Prophet's death, progressed rapidly, and the Saints continued to gather into Nauvoo.

The Seventies' Hall was built, a music hall and a large stone arsenal were also erected, and the Nauvoo House recommenced. The mob coming to the conclusion that the murder of the Prophet had not destroyed the progress of "Mormonism," commenced an organization for the extermination of the Saints from Nauvoo under the pretext that they were going upon a wolf hunt.

Being aware of the organization named, a council of the leading men of the Church directed a memorial to every State and Territory in the Union (except Missouri), couched in the most respectful language, setting forth the condition of the Saints, and asking the privilege of settling in their State, and receiving protection and religious liberty, which, with but one exception, was treated with perfect silence.

The old scheme of getting out vexatious writs for President Brigham Young and the members of his quorum was resorted to. But as he did not feel disposed to be murdered, as the Prophet and Patriarch had been, he provided himself with good and efficient weapons, and gave notice from the stand to assembled thousands that he would kill any man that laid hands on him, or read a writ to him, if he could do it with a pair of six-shooters (which he exhibited). Although many individuals volunteered to try the experiment, their nerve failed before coming to the sticking point.

The legislative session of 1844 repealed the Nauvoo City charter, and a combination was formed, composed of nine counties, for the extermination of the "Mormons." The work commenced on the 10th day of September, 1845, by burning all the houses in Morley Settlement belonging to "Mormons," and so continuing from one settlement to another.

An armed body of about one hundred and fifty men continued for two weeks burning houses, destroying property, and turning helpless women and children out of doors, homeless and destitute, to perish. Although the sheriff of the county called upon the GOOD CITIZENS who were not "Mormons" to turn out under his direction and disperse the burners, yet NOT ONE OBEYED his call, but a party of the armed burners pursued him and drove him out of the neighborhood. Finally, he was obliged to summon a posse of those who had been just burned out, and kill one of his pursuers to save his life.

Escaping to Nauvoo, the sheriff issued a proclamation, commanding the "Mormons," by virtue of his office as sheriff, to turn out and quell the riot. Five hundred men, who were employed on the Temple and Nauvoo House, were promptly dismissed by the trustees and made preparation for repelling the mob, and the sheriff succeeded temporarily in dispersing the rioters. General Harding soon after came to Nauvoo with four hundred of the State militia, camped there several days, inquired where the Prophet was buried, and said the governor could not do anything to protect the "Mormons." He did not go into the districts where the burning had been performed, although one hundred houses had been burned. The troops remained some time in the county. Several houses were burned within sight of their camp, and several persons lost their lives because they placed a little dependence upon the militia for protection.

Previous to this there was a council of the authorities of the Church, who had passed a resolution, which, as a matter of policy, was kept private, to send 1,500 men as pioneers to make a settlement in California, or Oregon, not intending to remain in Illinois. A proposition was accordingly made to the mob (for the State government had no power) that if they would let the Saints alone and assist them by buying out their property, and stopping vexatious lawsuits against them, they would remove from the State, which proposition was accepted. Accordingly, companies were immediately formed, several thousand wagons were put under contract, nearly all the wagons in the surrounding country were bought up, and all the movements possible were made to provide for an early start in the spring.

But the persecution being renewed in violation of the pledge mentioned, about one thousand persons commenced their journey in the beginning of February, 1846, thinking by that means to be able to allay the excitement against those who remained behind. Many of the teams crossed the Mississippi River on the ice, with President Young at the head, and the leaders of the Church with a scanty outfit then pursued their journey westward, having to make the road more than three hundred miles, bridging numerous streams, and encountering every vicissitude of weather that could be imagined. They arrived at Council Bluffs in June where they were met by Captain James Allen of the U. S. Army, who called upon them, in behalf of the President of the United States, for five hundred men to assist in the war with Mexico. The required battalion was made up, leaving the families of its members mostly in the Omaha country, on the west side of the Missouri River, in wagons, without protectors, or means of subsistence. Soon after the battalion started on the road for New Mexico.

The aged and infirm, halt, lame, blind, etc., who were unable to enlist into the battalion, gathered up their wagons, and established a place called Winter Quarters, where seven hundred cabins were erected during the fall and winter, and where the families suffered extremely from sickness, exposure and the want of the necessaries of life.

As soon as it was known in Illinois that the flower of the camp had enlisted in the service of the United States, the mob assembled with redoubled fury, formed a regular military encampment, provided with artillery, in the neighborhood of Nauvoo, which now contained the poor, helpless, sick and infirm, as all who were able to leave on any terms, had done so during the spring and summer.

The mob increased their force to about eighteen hundred men, and made several unsuccessful attacks upon the city (which could barely muster 123 efficient men), killing and wounding a number of its inhabitants, battering down many buildings, and finally succeeding, on the 16th day of September, after several days' bombardment, in driving the people helpless and destitute of every thing that could make earth desirable, across the river into Iowa, where many must have perished from starvation, had not their kind Creator fed them, by sending upon their camp flocks of quails, so tame that their women could catch them with their hands.

To crown their unhallowed victory, the mob some time afterwards set fire to the Temple of Nauvoo, which was the most beautiful building in the Western States. It was the first specimen of a new order of architecture introduced by Joseph Smith and had cost a million dollars. The light of its fire was visible for 30 miles.

In the spring of 1847 President Brigham Young, with 143 pioneers, started in search of a place of settlement, and were led by the hand of the Almighty—for no person among them knew anything of the country—directly to Great Salt Lake Valley, where the company arrived in July, having sought out and made a new road about six hundred and fifty miles, and traveled a trapper's trail nearly four hundred miles.

In the fall of 1847 about seven hundred wagons, laden with families, arrived in the Valley, which was so barren as to produce nothing but a species of dry grass, four or five inches high, and the ground was covered with myriads of large black crickets, the food of the Indians.

In this desolate place the site of Great Salt Lake City was surveyed. Not a single person in the whole company had a full supply of provisions, but all were on three-quarters' or half rations. While this condition prevailed, about one hundred of a detachment of the Mormon Battalion found their way to the Valley without any provisions.

President Brigham Young and a portion of the pioneers returned to Winter Quarters the same fall, and arrived again in Great Salt Lake City with about one hundred wagons in the fall of 1848. In the spring and summer of that year most of the Saints on the frontiers left for the Valley.

In the fall of 1847 the First Presidency of the Church was reorganized; Brigham Young being unanimously chosen President of the whole Church, with Heber C. Kimball and Willard Richards as his counselors. Their places were subsequently filled in the quorum of the Twelve Apostles. John Smith was ordained Patriarch over the Church.

During the year 1848, the crickets came down from the mountains in myriads and destroyed a great portion of the scanty crops; and the whole would have been destroyed, had not the Almighty in his kindness to his people sent gulls in large flocks, which devoured the large crickets and then vomited them up preparatory to devouring more.

So great, however, was the scarcity of provisions that many were compelled for months to subsist on raw hides, thistle roots and some other roots of the desert until the harvest of 1848.

Notwithstanding the Mormon Battalion was in the military service of the United States, and a great portion of their families located at Winter Quarters, the Indian Department compelled the Saints in the spring of 1848 to leave their cabins, and move across the river into Iowa, although, as was well known, they were only camped there until the return of the absent battalion.

In the month of January, 1848, some members of the Mormon Battalion first discovered gold on the American River, California, thus opening to the world an unparalleled source of wealth and adventure.

In March, 1849, a provisional government was formed, and a State Constitution adopted by a convention under the name of "The State of Deseret." A delegate was sent to Congress with a petition for admission into the Union. In September, 1850, an act passed the Congress of the United States, providing for the organization of the State of Deseret into the Territorial Government of Utah. The first Territorial legislative assembly met in Great Salt Lake City in 1851.

President Brigham Young was appointed the first governor, which office he filled to the entire satisfaction of the people for two consecutive terms, or until the time of the Utah expedition in 1858, when he was succeeded by Alfred Cumming, of Georgia.

THE TWELVE APOSTLES.

In a revelation, given through the Prophet Joseph Smith, at Fayette, Seneca County, New York, in June, 1829, the Lord made known that twelve Apostles should be called in this dispensation.

Nearly six years later, on February 14, 1835, at a special meeting, held in Kirtland, Ohio, twelve men were, in accordance with that revelation, selected by the Three Witnesses to the Book of Mormon, to constitute the quorum of Twelve Apostles. They were chosen in the following order: Lyman E. Johnson, Brigham Young, Heber C. Kimball, Orson Hyde, David W. Patten, Luke S. Johnson, Wm. E. McLellin, John F. Boynton, Orson Pratt, William Smith, Thos. B. Marsh and Parley P. Pratt. Most of these men had the previous year (1834) proven their faithfulness and integrity to the truth as members of Zion's Camp, which journeyed from Kirtland, Ohio, to Missouri and back, subject to much suffering and many privations. The brethren selected were ordained to the Apostleship by Joseph Smith, Oliver Cowdery, David Whitmer and Martin Harris as follows: Lyman E. Johnson, Brigham Young and Heber C. Kimball on February 14, 1835, Orson Hyde, David W. Patten, Luke S. Johnson, Wm. E. McLellin, John F. Boynton and William Smith on the following day (February 15), P. P. Pratt on February 21st, and Thomas B. Marsh and Orson Pratt, who had been absent on missions, in April, 1835. (Pratt was ordained April 26, 1835.) At a grand council, held in Kirtland, Ohio, May 2, 1835, at which the First Presidency was in attendance, the Twelve were arranged according to seniority, after which they stood as follows, commencing with the eldest:

1. Thomas Baldwin Marsh.
2. David W. Patten.
3. Brigham Young.
4. Heber Chase Kimball.
5. Orson Hyde.
6. William E. McLellin.
7. Parley Parker Pratt.
8. Luke S. Johnson.
9. William Smith.
10. Orson Pratt.
11. John F. Boynton.
12. Lyman E. Johnson.

In 1837 and 1838 four of the Twelve apostatized, namely, John F. Boynton, disfellowshiped September 3, 1837, at Kirtland, Ohio; Lyman E. Johnson and Luke S. Johnson, excommunicated April 13, 1838, at Far West, Missouri; and William E. McLellin, excommunicated May 11, 1838, also at Far West.

On July 8, 1838, John Taylor, John E. Page, Wilford Woodruff and Willard Richards were called by revelation to fill the places of those who had fallen. Page and Taylor were ordained December 19, 1838, Wilford Woodruff April 26, 1839, at Far West, Missouri, and Willard Richards April 14, 1840, in Preston, England.

In the meantime other vacancies occurred. David W. Patten was killed in the Crooked River battle, in Missouri, October 25, 1838, and Thomas B. Marsh was excommunicated for apostasy March 17, 1839, at Quincy, Illinois. To fill the two vacancies occasioned thereby, George Albert Smith (ordained April 26, 1839, at Far West, Missouri), and Lyman Wight (ordained April 8, 1841, at Nauvoo, Illinois) were chosen.

William Smith and John E. Page denied the faith and were both excommunicated. Smith was cut off October 12, 1845, and Page disfellowshipped January 9, 1846, at Nauvoo, Illinois. Amasa M. Lyman, who was ordained to the Apostleship as early as August 20, 1842, at Nauvoo, and Ezra Taft Benson, who was ordained July 16, 1846, at Council Bluffs, Iowa, were chosen to fill the vacancies.

In 1849 there were four vacancies in the quorum of the Twelve Apostles. Brigham Young, Heber C. Kimball and Willard Richards had in December, 1847, been chosen to constitute the First Presidency, and Lyman Wight was excommunicated for apostasy February 12, 1849, so at a meeting held in the Pioneer fort in Great Salt Lake City February 12, 1849, Elders Charles Coulson Rich, Lorenzo Snow, Erastus Snow and Franklin Dewey Richards were ordained members of the quorum of Twelve.

The next vacancy occurred on the 13th of May, 1857, when Parley P. Pratt was assassinated near Van Buren, Arkansas. George Q. Cannon was chosen to fill the vacancy, and ordained an Apostle August 26, 1860.

In October, 1867, Amasa M. Lyman was dropped from the quorum of the Twelve, and Joseph Fielding Smith who had previously been ordained to the Apostleship, was chosen to fill the vacancy, October 6, 1867.

On June 22, 1868, Heber C. Kimball, first counselor to President Brigham Young, died in Salt Lake City, and Apostle George A. Smith was called to fill the vacancy in the First Presidency. Elder Brigham Young, junior, succeeded George A. Smith as a member of the Twelve October 9, 1868.

Ezra T. Benson died September 3, 1869, in Ogden, Utah, and Albert Carrington was chosen to fill the vacancy; he was ordained July 3, 1870, at Salt Lake City.

Orson Hyde, who had acted as president of the Twelve, from the reorganization of the First Presidency, in 1847, to October, 1875, died November 28, 1878, in Spring City, Sanpete County, Utah. At the annual conference, April 7, 1879, Elder Moses Thatcher was elected to fill the vacancy.

A reorganization of the First Presidency took place for the second time in the history of the Church October 10, 1880, at the semi-annual conference, held in Salt Lake City. On this occasion John Taylor, who had been sustained as President of the Quorum of the Apostles since October 6, 1875, became President of the Church, with George Q. Cannon as his first and Joseph F. Smith as his second counselor. This made three vacancies in the quorum of the Twelve, two of which were filled shortly after, October 27, 1880, by the ordination of Francis Marion Lyman and John Henry Smith to the Apostleship.

October 3, 1881, the death of Orson Pratt, the last surviving member of the first quorum of Twelve Apostles organized in Kirtland, made another vacancy, which, together with the vacancy left since October, 1880, was filled by the calling of George Teasdale and Heber J. Grant to the Apostleship. These brethren were called by direct revelation and ordained in Salt Lake City October 16, 1882.

Charles C. Rich died November 17, 1883, at his residence in Paris, Bear Lake County, Idaho, and the vacancy caused thereby was filled by John Whittaker Taylor, who was ordained a member of the Twelve April 9, 1884, in Salt Lake City.

The Twelve Apostles, as they stood in October, 1885, were as follows:

Wilford Woodruff, President,
Lorenzo Snow,
Erastus Snow,
Franklin D. Richards,
Brigham Young,
Albert Carrington,
Moses Thatcher,
Francis M. Lyman,
John Henry Smith,
George Teasdale,
Heber J. Grant,
John W. Taylor.

In November, 1885, Albert Carrington was excommunicated from the Church for lewd and lascivious conduct and adultery.

THE TWELVE APOSTLES.

THOMAS B. MARSH,

President of the first quorum of Twelve Apostles, organized in Kirtland, was born in Acton, Middlesex County, Mass., November 1, 1799. He spent his early boyhood on a farm at Westmoreland, New Hampshire, and when 14 years of age, he left home and went to Vermont. After working on a farm in that State three months, he went to Albany, N. Y., and engaged in a public house as a waiter, where he remained 18 months. After this he spent four years in a New York City hotel, and then removed to Long Island, where he engaged as groom to Edward Griswald, in whose service he remained one and a half years, during which he married Elizabeth Godkin, November 1, 1820.

Immediately after marrying he commenced a grocery business in New York, in which, however, he did not succeed. He was then employed in a type foundry in Boston for seven years, and during this period he joined the Methodist Church; but he did not succeed in becoming a genuine Methodist, as he could not make the creed of that denomination correspond with the Bible. He subsequently withdrew from all sects, but by the spirit of prophecy, which rested upon him in some degree, he was led to anticipate the rise of a new church, which would have the truth in its purity. Finally he was, as he believed, led by the Spirit of God to make a journey westward, in company with Benjamin Hall. Having arrived in Lyonstown, N. Y., he heard for the first time of the golden book, that had been found by a youth named Joseph Smith. He immediately changed the course of his journey and went to Palmyra, where he found Martin Harris in Egbert B. Grandin's printing office. The first sixteen pages of the Book of Mormon had just been struck off, and he obtained a sheet from the printer to take with him. As soon as Martin Harris found out his intentions, he took him to the house of Joseph Smith, senior, where he found Oliver Cowdery, who gave him all the information he wanted at that time. After staying there two days, he started for Charleston, Mass., highly pleased with the information he had obtained.

After arriving home, and showing his wife the sixteen pages of the Book of Mormon, which he had brought with him, she also believed it to be the work of God. During the following year Marsh corresponded with Oliver Cowdery and Joseph Smith, the Prophet, and made preparations to move west.

Learning by letter that the Church of Jesus Christ had been organized on April 6, 1830, he moved to Palmyra, Ontario County, N. Y., in the following September, and was baptized by David Whitmer, in Cayuga Lake, in that same month. A few days later he was ordained an Elder, and by revelation appointed a physician to the Church.

He remained in the State of New York during the fall and winter, and in the spring of 1831 he removed with the main body of the Church to Kirtland, Ohio.

At the conference held in Kirtland, June 3, 1831, he was ordained a High Priest, and also received an appointment to go to Missouri and preach on the way, which he did in company with Selah J. Griffin.

In the beginning of 1832, Bishop E. Partridge having furnished him with an Indian pony, he returned to Kirtland, accompanied by Cyrus Daniels. After laboring and preaching through the country around Kirtland until summer opened, he, in company with Ezra Thayre, performed a mission to the State of New York, returning home early in the fall, and shortly after he removed to Jackson County, Missouri, as leader of a small company of Saints.

He arrived in Jackson County Nov. 10, 1832, and located with the brethren from Colesville, N. Y., receiving his inheritance—about thirty acres of land, set off by Bishop Partridge—on the Big Blue River, where he, during the winter, erected a comfortable log house, into which he moved his family in the spring, and commenced clearing land to raise some corn and potatoes. In the latter part of that year, he, in connection with the rest of the Saints in Jackson County, was driven from his home by the mob. While the majority of the exiles found temporary shelter in Clay County, he and others wintered in Lafayette County, where he taught school.

In the spring of 1834, having learned that Joseph Smith and a company of men were coming to relieve the Saints in Missouri, Marsh moved to Clay County, where he lived when Zion's Camp arrived. In the course of the summer he cultivated a small piece of land and succeeded in raising some corn. He was chosen as a member of the High Council.

In January, 1835, in company with Bishop Partridge, and agreeable to revelation, he returned to Kirtland, where he, in the month of April following, was ordained one of the Twelve Apostles. During the summer, in connection with the other members of the quorum of the Twelve, he performed a mission to the Eastern States.

In the winter of 1835-36 he attended school in Kirtland, and studied Hebrew under Professor Seixas, a Jew by birth. In the spring he returned to his place on Fishing River, in Clay County, Mo., where he arrived in April.

When, shortly after, difficulties arose between the Saints and the citizens of Clay County, Marsh was appointed a delegate from Fishing River for the purpose of amicably arranging matters. He was also elected a member of a committee to present resolutions in a meeting, held in Liberty. On that occasion he was enabled to speak so feelingly in relation to the former persecutions of the Saints, that Gen. Atchison, who was present, could not refrain from shedding tears. This meeting passed resolutions to assist the Saints in seeking a new location, and appointed committees to collect means to aid the poor.

The Church also appointed Marsh and Elisha H. Groves to visit the branches in Illinois, Kentucky and Tennessee, for the purpose of borrowing money to enter lands in the new settlement, at the land office, for the convenience of the immigrating Saints. The two started on this mission in July, and succeeded in borrowing upwards of $1,400, principally from the brethren in Kentucky and Tennessee, at 10 per cent. interest. On Sept. 19, 1836, they parted with Wilford Woodruff and the Saints in Kentucky, and, accompanied by D. W. Patten and his wife, returned to Missouri. Marsh proceeded immediately to the new city, which, during his absence, had been laid out and called Far West, procured a lot, built a house and spent the following winter in making improvements and preaching to the Saints.

In June, 1837, he started for Kirtland, in company with David W. Patten and Wm. Smith, and there tried to reconcile some of the Twelve and others of high standing, who had come out in opposition to the Prophet. In July and August, he accompanied Joseph Smith and Sidney Rigdon on a mission to Canada, after which he again proceeded to Missouri, where he arrived in October.

On Feb. 10, 1838, Marsh and David W. Patten were appointed presidents pro tem. of the Church in Missouri, the former presidency having been rejected. After the arrival of Joseph Smith, he assisted in exploring the country northward on Grand River, where Adam-ondi-Ahman was located at that time.

About the time the presecutions against the Saints in Caldwell County, Missouri, commenced, in August, 1838, Marsh became disaffected and turned traitor against his brethren. Shortly after he moved away from Far West and located in Clay County. Later he settled in Richmond, Ray County. He was finally excommunicated from the Church at a conference, held in Quincy, Illinois, March 17, 1839.

In July, 1857, Marsh was baptized in Florence, Nebraska, and came to Utah that same year. A few years afterwards he died at Ogden as a pauper and invalid. A little insignificant mound, covered with rock, and an old weather-beaten board, upon which the letters T. B. M. are faintly seen, is all that now marks the last resting place on the Ogden cemetery of this once distinguished Apostle.

DAVID W. PATTEN,

A member of the first quorum of Twelve Apostles, and also one of the early martyrs of the Church, was born in the State of New York about the year 1800. From his early youth he exhibited religious characteristics, and when twenty-one years old, the Holy Spirit called upon him to repent of his sins, which he did. During the three succeeding years many future events were made known unto him by dreams and visions. He also looked for the Church of Christ to arise in its purity and expected to live to see it.

In the year 1830 he first heard of and saw the Book of Mormon, and from that time he began to cry to God for more faith. In May, 1832, he received a letter from his brother in Indiana, telling him of the rise of the Church of Christ, the reception of the Holy Ghost and its gifts, etc. Soon after he was convinced that the work was true and was baptized by his brother John Patten, in Green County, Indiana, June 15, 1832. He was ordained an Elder on the 17th by Elisha H. Groves and appointed with a Bro. Wood to preach in the Territory of Michigan. During this his first mission many remarkable cases of healing occurred under his administration. In many instances he went to the sick, who said they had faith and promised to obey the gospel when they got better, and commanded them in the name of the Lord to arise and be made whole, and they were instantly restored. Sixteen persons were baptized by him and his companion near the Maumee River.

In October he went to Kirtland, where he spent two or three weeks, after which he started out on his second mission, this time going east into Pennsylvania. He traveled sometimes in company with John Murdock and sometimes with Reynolds Cahoon, baptizing several on the way. When he found any sick, he preached to them faith in the ordinances of the gospel, and where the truth found a place in their hearts, he commanded them in the name of Jesus Christ to arise from their beds of sickness and be made whole. In many instances the people came to him from afar to have him lay hands on their sick, because of this gift, which the Lord had bestowed upon him, and almost daily the sick were healed under his hands. Among others a woman who had suffered from an infirmity for nearly twenty years, was instantly healed. From this mission he returned to Kirtland February 25, 1833.

In the following March the Elders were sent out from Kirtland to preach the gospel and counsel the Saints to gather to Ohio. Patten started with Reynolds Cahoon east, and on reaching Avon he preached at Father Bosley's, where a man was present who had disturbed several meetings and would not be civil or quiet. He had defied any man to put him out of the house, or make him be still. Patten felt stirred up in spirit and told the man to be quiet, or he certainly would put him out. The fellow said: "You can't do it." Patten replied: "In the name of the Lord I will do it," after which he walked up to him, and, seizing him with both hands, carried him to the door and threw him about ten feet on to a pile of wood, which quieted him for the time being. From this circumstance the saying went out that David Patten had cast out one devil, soul and body.

In Orleans, Jefferson County, New York, Patten raised up a branch of eighteen members, through much persecution and affliction and all manner of evil speaking. Also in Henderson he found a noble people who received his testimony, and he baptized eight persons. When hands were laid upon them, the Holy Ghost fell on them, and they spake with tongues and prophesied. During the summer Patten raised up several other branches, containing in all eighty members. He writes: "The Lord did work with me wonderfully, in signs and wonders following them that believed in the fulness of the gospel of Jesus Christ; insomuch that the deaf were made to hear, the blind to see, and the lame were made whole. Fevers, palsies, crooked and withered limbs, and in fact all manner of diseases common to the country, were healed by the power of God, that was manifested through his servants."

In the fall of 1833 Patten returned to Kirtland, Ohio, where he worked on the House of the Lord one month. He then made a trip to Michigan Territory to his former place of residence, after which he moved to Florence, Ohio. After remaining there about seven weeks, being sick most of the time, he commended himself into the hands of God and went out to preach again until the Spirit of the Lord came upon him, saying: "Depart from your field of labor and go unto Kirtland, for behold I will send thee up to the land of Zion, and thou shalt serve thy brethren there."

He obeyed the word of the Lord, and was sent in company with William D. Pratt to bear despatches to the brethren in Missouri, arriving in Clay County March 4, 1834, after much suffering from cold and fatigue. Much good, however, was accomplished by his mission. He tarried in Missouri until the arrival of Zion's Camp in June, 1834, when the people of Clay County pleaded with the Saints not to go over to Jackson County, as they would use their utmost endeavors to give them their rights, according to the laws of the land.

A violent persecutor stepped up to Patten and, drawing his bowie knife, said, "You damned Mormon, I will cut your damned throat." Patten looked him full in the face, at the same time putting his hand in his left breast pocket, and said, "My friend, do nothing rashly." "For God's sake, don't shoot," exclaimed the mobocrat, and put up his knife and left Patten, who, by the way, was unarmed.

In company with Warren Parrish, Patten started on another preaching mission September 12, 1834. They went to Paris, Henry County, Tennessee, where they remained about three months, preaching the gospel in that vicinity and the regions round about. Twenty were baptized, and several instances of the healing power of God were made manifest. Among these the wife of Mr. Johnston F. Lane deserves special mention. She had been sick for eight years, and for the last year been unable to walk. Hearing of the Elders and the faith they preached, she prevailed on her husband to send for them. Patten went with him immediately and taught him the gospel, showing what power was exercised by the Lord upon those who had faith. The woman believed the testimony of Patten, who laid his hands upon her, saying, "In the name of Jesus Christ I rebuke the disorder, and command it to depart." He then took her by the hand and commanded her to arise in the name of Jesus Christ, and be made whole. She arose and was perfectly healed. He then commanded her to go to the water and be baptized, which she did the same hour. After he had baptized and confirmed her, he told her that she should mend and gain strength, and in less than one year she should have a son. Although she had been married some twelve years and had no children, this prophecy was fulfilled. She bore a child, whom the parents called David Patten, and she afterwards had several children.

Patten returned from Tennessee to Kirtland some time during the following winter, and on February 15, 1835, he was ordained one of the Twelve Apostles. Shortly after, when the Twelve left Kirtland on their first mission, he traveled eastward, through New York, Canada, Vermont, Maine and other States, holding meetings, attending conferences and setting the branches in order, returning to Kirtland in September.

After receiving his blessings and endowments in the Temple, Patten took his wife and started on another mission to Tennessee. There he met Wilford Woodruff on April 15, 1835, in whose company he then traveled and preached for some time. On May 17, 1835, Patten and Woodruff laid hands on a woman by the name of Margaret Tittle, who was lying at the point of death, and she was instantly healed through the power of God. Patten had preached faith, repentance and baptism to her, and she covenanted to be baptized. But after she was healed, she refused to attend to that ordinance. Patten told her that she was acting a dangerous part, and she would again be afflicted, if she did not repent. The brethren pursued their journey, and on their return found her very low with the same fever. She begged them to lay hands upon her and heal her, and she would obey the gospel. They complied with her request, and she was healed, after which Wilford Woodruff baptized her.

On May 22, 1835, Patten preached three times at the house of Father Fry in Benton County, Tennessee. Many hardened their hearts, and a Mr. Rose, who rejected his testimony, asked him to raise the dead. Patten rebuked him for his wickedness, when he and others came with arms and threatened to mob the brethren. At the close of the meeting Patten walked out into the door yard and told the mob to shoot him, if they wished. He had nothing but a walking stick in his hand, but the mob fled and left him.

A few days later Warren Parrish arrived from Kirtland and joined Patten and Woodruff. These three brethren then traveled together from town to town, through Kentucky and Tennessee, preaching the gospel, and healing the sick. The spirit of God was with them and attended their administrations.

While Patten and Parrish were staying at Seth Utley's house in Benton County, Tennessee, on June 19, 1835, about forty men, armed with deadly weapons, led by Sheriff Robert C. Petty, a colonel, a major and other officers, besides a Methodist priest with a gun on his shoulder, surrounded the house. The sheriff informed the brethren that he had a States' warrant for David W. Patten, Warren Parrish and Wilford Woodruff, issued on complaint of Matthew Williams, the Methodist priest, who swore that those brethren had put forth the following false and pretended prophecy: "That Christ would come the second time, before this generation passed away, and that four individuals should receive the Holy Ghost within twenty-four hours." After examination, Patten and Parrish were bound over to appear on June 22nd, under $2,000 bonds.

"Early on the 22nd," writes Wilford Woodruff, "Patten and Parrish had their trial. The mob gathered to the number of one hundred, all fully armed. They took from Elder Patten his walking stick and a pen knife, and went through with a mock trial; but would not let the defendants produce any witnesses; and without suffering them to say a word in defense, the judge pronounced them guilty of the charge preferred.

"Brother Patten, being filled with the Holy Ghost, arose to his feet, and by the power of God bound them fast to their seats while he addressed them. He rebuked them sharply for their wicked and unjust proceedings. Brother Parrish afterwards said, 'My hair stood up straight on my head, for I expected to be killed.' When Patten closed, the judge addressed him, saying, 'You must be armed with concealed weapons, or you would not treat an armed court as you have this.' Patten replied, 'I am armed with weapons you know not of, and my weapons are the Holy Priesthood and the power of God. God is my friend, and he permits you to exercise all the power you have, and he bestows on me all the power I have.'

"The court finally concluded to let the brethren go, if they would pay the cost of court and leave the country in ten days. The sheriff advised the brethren to accept these propositions, as it was the only means of escaping the violence of the mob. The Saints in that vicinity paid the cost. Elders Patten and Parrish left and went to Brother Seth Utley's. They had not been gone long when the mob began to quarrel among themselves and were mad because they had let the prisoners go. They soon mounted their horses and started after them with all possible speed. The news of this movement reached the brethren and they immediately mounted their mules and went into the woods. By a circuitous route they reached the house of Albert Petty, put up their mules, went to bed and slept. They had not been long asleep when some heavenly messenger came to Brother Patten and told him to arise and leave that place, for the mob was after them and would soon be at that house. Elder Patten awoke Parrish and told him to arise and dress himself, as the mob would soon be upon them. They arose, saddled their animals and started for Henry County in the night. They had not been gone long before the house was surrounded by a mob, who demanded Patten and Parrish. Brother Petty informed them that they were not there, but the mob searched the house and remained till daybreak, when they found the tracks of the brethren's animals, which they followed to the line of the next county, when they gave up the chase."

After attending a conference on Damon's Creek, Calloway County, Kentucky, September 2, 1836, Thomas B. Marsh presiding, Patten left the Saints in Kentucky and Tennessee, accompanied by his wife, and started for Far West, Missouri, where they arrived in peace and safety.

Elder Patten remained in Missouri until the spring of 1837, when he performed a mission through several States, preaching by the way until he arrived in Kirtland. It was a time of great apostasy in the Church. Warren Parrish, his brother-in-law and fond associate, apostatized and labored diligently to draw away Elder Patten from the Church. Those things troubled Patten very much and caused him great sorrow. He soon afterwards returned to Missouri, where he (Feb. 10, 1838), together with Thos. B. Marsh, was appointed to take the presidency in Far West until President Joseph Smith arrived. Patten wrote an epistle and delivered what proved to be his last testimony to the world and Church, which was published in the Elders' Journal, No. 3. He continued to labor in the Church in Missouri through the summer of 1838, and when the persecution and mobbing commenced, he was foremost in defending the Saints.

On October 24, 1838, news came to Far West that Rev. Samuel Bogart with a mob of seventy-five men were committing depredations on Log Creek, destroying property and taking prisoners. Patten with about seventy-five others were sent out to meet the mobbers, with whom they had an encounter early the next morning (Oct. 25th), when Patten was mortally wounded, receiving a large ball in the bowels. (See under Crooked River Battle.)

When the battle was over, the brethren started towards Far West with their dead and wounded. After traveling a few miles in a wagon the sufferings of Apostle Patten became so great that he begged to be left. He and Brother Seeley, another of the wounded, were then placed upon litters and carried by the brethren. When they arrived near Log Creek, they were met by Joseph Smith, Hyrum Smith, Heber C. Kimball and others. At this place Patten became so ill that he could not stand to be borne any further. He was therefore conveyed into the house of Brother Stephen Winchester, about three miles from Far West. During his removal his sufferings were so excruciating, that he frequently asked the brethren to lay him down that he might die. He lived about an hour after his arrival at Winchester's house and was perfectly sensible and collected until he breathed his last at ten o'clock at night. Although he had medical assistance, his wound was such that there was no hope entertained of his recovery; of this he was fully aware.

"In this situation," writes Heber C. Kimball, "when the shades of time were lowering, and eternity with all its realities were opening to his view, he bore a strong testimony to the truth of the work of the Lord, and the religion he had espoused. The principles of the gospel, which were so precious to him before, were honorably maintained in nature's final hour, and afforded him that support and consolation at the time of his departure, which deprived death of its sting and horror. Speaking of those who had apostatized, he exclaimed, 'O, that they were in my situation; for I feel I have kept the faith; I have finished my course; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give to me.' Speaking to his beloved wife, who was present and who attended him in his dying moments, he said, 'Whatever you do else, do not deny the faith!' "

The brethren, who felt very much attached to their beloved brother, beseeched the Lord to spare his life, and endeavored to exercise faith for his recovery. Being aware of this he expressed a desire that they should let him go, as he wished to be with Christ, which was far better. A few minutes before he died, he prayed as follows: "Father, I ask thee in the name of Jesus Christ that thou wouldst release my spirit and receive it unto thyself." He then said to those who surrounded his dying bed, "Brethren, you have held me by your faith, but do give me up and let me go, I beseech you." The brethren then committed him to God, and he soon breathed his last without a groan.

Patten was buried at Far West Saturday, October 27, 1838. In pointing to the lifeless body the Prophet Joseph said, "There lies a man who has done just as he said he would: he has laid down his life for his friends."

"Brother David W. Patten," writes Joseph Smith, "was a very worthy man, beloved by all good men who knew him. He . . . . died as he had lived, a man of God, and strong in the faith of a glorious resurrection in a world where mobs will have no power or place."

BRIGHAM YOUNG,

A member of the first quorum of Twelve Apostles and President of the Church from 1847 to 1877, was born in Whitingham, Windham County, Vermont, June 1, 1801. In 1804 his parents moved from Vermont to Sherburne, Chenango County, New York, where, as he grew in years, he assisted in the arduous labors incident to opening farms in a heavily timbered region, enduring the privations and hardships common to forming new settlements at that period, and was restricted by circumstances to only eleven days' schooling.

At the age of sixteen, by his father's permission, he began engaging in business for himself. Though trained by his parents, who were Methodists, to lead a strictly moral life, he made no profession of religion until he was in his twenty-second year, when he also joined the Methodists.

October 8, 1824, he married Miriam Works, and resided in Cayuga County, New York, until the spring of 1829, following the occupation of carpenter, joiner, painter and glazier, when he removed to Mendon, Monroe County, New York. In the spring of 1830 he first saw the Book of Mormon, which was brought there by Samuel H. Smith. In the fall of 1831 Elder Alpheus Gifford, Elial Strong and others came to that place to preach the gospel as taught by Joseph Smith. He heard and believed, and after careful and prayerful reflection upon the principles revealed in the Book of Mormon, he was baptized April 14, 1832, a member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, and ordained an Elder immediately after confirmation, Eleazer Miller officiating in each instance. Three weeks after, his wife was also baptized. During the following summer he preached the gospel in the regions adjacent to Mendon, baptizing many and organizing branches. His wife died September 8, 1832, leaving him two little girls, one two years and the other seven years of age. In the fall of 1832 he visited Kirtland, Ohio, in company with Heber C. Kimball and his brother Joseph Young, and made the acquaintance of the Prophet Joseph Smith. During the evening of the day they first met, Joseph called upon Brother Brigham to pray. While doing so he spoke in tongues. The Prophet declared that he spoke in the pure Adamic language, and, after he had left the room, Joseph said, "The time will come when Brother Brigham Young will preside over this Church."

In company with his brother Joseph he spent a portion of the winter of 1832-1833 in and around West Laboro, Canada, preaching, baptizing and organizing branches. He spent most of the spring and summer of 1833 in missionary labors in Canada and northern New York. In July he conducted a small company of Saints to Kirtland, removed his family there in the fall, and labored at his trade, preaching as opportunities were offered.

In February, 1834, he married Mary Ann Angell, who took charge of his children and kept house for him faithfully.

On the 5th of May, 1834, he started for Missouri, in Zion's Camp, in which he was captain of ten; arrived in Clay County on the 23rd of June, returned to Kirtland in August, having performed a journey of 2,000 miles on foot, and spent the remainder of the year in finishing the printing office and school room and laboring on the Temple.

He was selected and ordained one of the quorum of the Twelve Apostles on February 14, 1835. From this time till 1837, he spent most of the winter in Kirtland, in laboring at his trade and upon the Temple, and spent the remainder of his time in traveling, holding conferences, preaching, and regulating and organizing branches in the East. He attended the Hebrew school at Kirtland in the winter of 1835-1836, and from February 22nd to March 27, 1836, he superintended the painting and finishing of the Temple. He attended the solemn Assembly at the dedication and received his blessings, after which he traveled through New York, Vermont, Massachusetts and Rhode Island, attended conference at Portland, Maine, returned to Kirtland, defended the Prophet Joseph Smith against accusers and apostates, took a special business mission to the Eastern States, in company with Dr. Willard Richards, which he accomplished, and returned in May, 1837. Later in the year he performed another short mission to the State of New York.

On the 22nd of December, 1837, he left Kirtland in consequence of the fury of the mob, and arrived in Far West, Caldwell County, Missouri, on the 14th of March, 1838. While in Missouri he purchased land and improved a handsome farm, labored diligently in the duties of his Apostleship, especially in planning for and assisting the Saints in leaving the State under the exterminating order of Governor Lilburn W. Boggs, and on the 14th of February, 1839, removed from that State with his family, leaving all his land and nearly all of his personal property. During this journey he left his family no less than eleven times to return with his teams to assist in bringing up the poor and the helpless. He tarried a few weeks in Atlas, Pike County, Illinois; then removed to Quincy, where he efficiently continued his labors in furthering the removal from Missouri.

On the 18th of April he left Quincy for Far West to assist with a majority of the Twelve in fulfilling a revelation given by the Prophet Joseph Smith, July 8, 1838, which was accomplished April 26, 1839, notwithstanding the mob had said that that revelation should not be fulfilled. He returned to Quincy on the 2nd of May, and on the 3rd visited Brothers Joseph and Hyrum Smith—his first interview with them after their escape from their enemies in Missouri.

On May 16th he started for Commerce, since called Nauvoo, Hancock County, Illinois, and on the 23d moved across the Mississippi River to Montrose, Iowa, opposite Nauvoo, and resided in a room in some old military barracks, where he labored assiduously, so far as his health would permit, to aid the Saints in making their new settlement at Nauvoo, until September 14th, when he started 'without purse or scrip," on a mission to England, his health being so poor that he was unable, without assistance, to go thirty rods to the river, leaving his wife ill and feeble, with a babe only ten days old, and all his children sick, unable to wait upon each other. After considerable hindrance by sickness on the way, and much teaching and preaching, he sailed from New York on the 9th of March, 1840, and arrived in Liverpool, England, April 6th. In Preston, on the 14th of April, at the first council held in a foreign land by a majority of the quorum of the Twelve Apostles, he was unanimously chosen president of that quorum. In May he took steps for selecting the hymns and publishing 3,000 Hymn Books, 5,000 copies of the Book of Mormon, and a periodical entitled "The Latter-day Saints Millennial Star," of which Parley P. Pratt was appointed editor. He organized the first company of emigrating Saints, numbering 41 souls, who sailed from Liverpool, June 6th. His faithful and diligent labors in England in behalf of the gospel were signally blest. In the short space of a year, between 7,000 and 8,000 persons were baptized into the Church; branches were organized in all the principal cities of the land, a permanent shipping agency was established and over a thousand souls emigrated. On April 21, 1841, he and others of the Twelve sailed from the river Mersey, and on July 1st arrived in Nauvoo, where he was cordially welcomed by the Prophet Joseph Smith, by his family and the Saints generally.

In a revelation given to Joseph Smith, January 19, 1841, the Lord said, "I give unto you my servant Brigham Young to be a president over the Twelve traveling Council, which Twelve hold the keys to open up the authority of my kingdom upon the four corners of the earth, and after that to send my word to every creature."

On July 10th the Prophet Joseph Smith requested the Twelve to take the burden of the Church in Nauvoo, and attend to selling its lands, to locating and advising the immigrating Saints, and to transact other busines, which request President Young energetically complied with, also with his duties as a member of the city council, to which he was elected September 2nd, occupying the intervals of time in laboring for the support of himself and family, until July 7, 1843, when he started on a mission to the Eastern States, preaching, gathering funds for aiding the building of the Temple and the Nauvoo House, and returned on the 22nd of October. He continued his labors as before, was often in council with Joseph and the Twelve, preached frequently in Nauvoo and the neighboring settlements, and on the 21st of May again went on a mission to the East. Receiving information of the assassination of the Prophet Joseph and Hyrum Smith, in Carthage Jail, while under the pledged protection of Thomas Ford, then governor of Illinois, President Young returned to Nauvoo on the 6th of August. On the 8th, at a meeting of all the authorities of the Church in Nauvoo, the Twelve Apostles were sustained as the Presiding Quorum of the Church. It was on this occasion that the spirit of the departed Joseph rested down upon Brigham Young in so powerful a manner as to convince all the Saints assembled that he was the man chosen to lead Israel. It was a critical time. Efforts were being made to divide the people, and Sidney Rigdon, one of the late Prophet's counselors, claimed authority to preside as "guardian of the Church." But when President Young stepped forth in his place and calling at the head of the Twelve, the whole assembly heard, as they thought, the voice, saw the form and felt the spirit and influence of the Prophet Joseph. And even non-members of the Church were startled, and expected to see the presence as well as hear the voice of the departed Seer. All uncertainty fled from that moment, and faith and union banished discord and defeated vain ambition.

Amid threats, house burnings, plunderings, whippings, murders, and the fury of mob violence, he stood firm in the steady performance of the many and arduous duties devolving upon him, in caring for and defending the rights of the Saints, planning and directing the organizations and operations preparatory to vacating Nauvoo and forwarding the Temple to completion, and laboring therein until February, 1846, when he crossed the Mississippi River to the camp of the emigrating Saints, a few miles west of Montrose, Iowa, and in March began with them a toilsome journey in quest of a location beyond the pale of bigoted intolerance, where he would be free to worship God according to his commandments.

Having established two settlements, Garden Grove and Mount Pisgah, as resting and recruiting points for such as could not well keep pace and for others who would follow, he reached, with the main camp, the Missouri River, near Council Bluffs, in June. From this point, at the request of the Government of the United States, he sent over 500 volunteers (the Mormon Battalion) to aid in the war with Mexico, who raised and sustained the flag of the Union in Mexico and California until the treaty of Guadaloupe-Hidalgo. He crossed the Missouri and camped a few miles above where Omaha has since been built, at a point named Winter Quarters, since called Florence, Nebraska, and laid out streets and blocks, upon which numerous comfortable log houses were soon erected; planned to the utmost for the comfort and well-being of the people during their sojourn there; built a much-needed grist mill, and in April, 1847, with a company of 142 men, who elected him their leader, started to pioneer a location where the Saints could build and inhabit in peace, and on July 24th arrived where now stands Salt Lake City, and unfurled the "Stars and Stripes" on Mexican soil.

He at once took steps for surveying the beautiful city site, designated the block around which houses were to be built, joining each other, with portholes and gates until the people should be strong enough to build on the lots in safety; was busily engaged in directing and assisting in the daily labors and visiting neighboring localities; and, on August 26th, started on his return to Winter Quarters, where he arrived on the 31st of October, having met nearly 2,000 of the Saints on their way to Salt Lake City, where they arrived in good season.

December 5, 1847, he was elected President of the Church by the unanimous vote of the Quorum of the Twelve, and also, on the 27th, by the unanimous vote of all the authorities and members assembled in a conference held at Council Bluffs, Iowa, with Heber C. Kimball and Willard Richards as his counselors. On the 26th of May, 1848, he started from Winter Quarters, with his family, for Salt Lake City, leaving his houses, mills and other property (this being the fifth time he had left home and property for the gospel's sake), superintended that season's emigration of over 2,000 souls, arrived in Salt Lake City, September 20th, and at once began to give counsel conducive to the general welfare. At a conference held on October 8, 1848, he was sustained President of the Church by unanimous vote.

A provisional government being recquisite until Congress should otherwise provide, on the 12th of March, 1849, he was elected governor of the then named State of Deseret, which continued until Feb. 3, 1851, when he took the oath of office as governor of the Territory of Utah, commander-in-chief of the militia, and superintendent of Indian affairs, to which positions he had been appointed by President Millard Fillmore, and performed the duties of those offices with signal ability and integrity, until the arrival of his successor, Governor Alfred Cumming, in the spring of 1858.

During the thirty years in which he resided in Utah, he labored indefatigably for the welfare of all who love truth, liberty and equal rights; he engaged in and encouraged agriculture, the erection of mills, and factories, the manufacture and importation of machinery and labor-saving implements, the opening of roads and the construction of bridges and public edifices; pursued a conciliatory policy with the Indians, wisely deeming it not only cheaper but much more humane to feed than to fight them, and instituted the Perpetual Emigrating Fund for gathering the poor, by which thousands upon thousands were brought from poverty to the acquisition of pleasant homes and the comforts of life. He also successfully completed a contract to grade over 100 miles of the Union Pacific Railroad, much of it the most difficult portion; was the prime mover in the construction of the Utah Central and the Utah Southern railroads; aided in building the Utah Northern and Utah Western narrow gauge roads; introduced and fostered co-operation in all branches of business, as the plan best adapted to equalize the benefits of trade; extended telegraph wires to most of the principal towns and cities of the Territory; promoted the spread of the everlasting Gospel among the nations, and the gathering of the honest therefrom; traveled and preached year after year in the settlements of the Saints; and in his teachings, acts and administrations uniformly pursued a course characteristic of an able and upright man, laboring with all his might for the happiness of mankind and the prevalence of righteousness upon the earth.

Like all great men, he had bitter enemies. No man was more villified, misrepresented and falsely accused than Brigham Young. His life was frequently sought. The bullet and the knife of the assassin were often prepared to shed his heart's blood, and plots were illegally laid by the emissaries of the law to rob, imprison and destroy him. But the hand of the Lord delivered him on every occasion, and the calmness and serenity with which he invariably looked upon calumny and persecution, stamped him as one of the broadest-minded men of the century.

He had a strong desire to live to dedicate a Temple to the Most High God in the Rocky Mountains, and set in order the Priesthood and organize the various Stakes of Zion, according to the pattern revealed from heaven. These privileges were granted to him. He saw the Temple at St. George fully dedicated and prepared for the administration of the ordinances for the living and the dead. He arranged and explained the duties of the various quorums of the Priesthood. And the Sunday preceding his death the organization of the different Stakes of Zion was completed. His desire had thus been fulfilled, when he, after several days' illness, departed this life, August 29, 1877, at his residence in Salt Lake City. The last words he uttered that were distinctly understood were, "Joseph, Joseph, Joseph, Joseph." About 30,000 people were present at his funeral, which took place on the following Sunday, September 2nd.

President Young was the head of a numerous family and laid the foundation for a kingdom and a glory which will increase throughout eternity. He was the father of fifty-six children, and left seventeen wives, sixteen sons and twenty-eight daughters, when he died.

The marks of the genius of this great man is stamped on the history and travels of the whole Church, on Salt Lake City, which he loved so dearly, and on the towns, farms, orchards, canals, highways, railroads, telegraphs, private and public buildings, and the thousand and one witnesses to his guiding hand and counseling voice over five hundred miles of country redeemed from a desert. They have uttered his fame with a voice that has penetrated to the uttermost parts of the earth.

MISCELLANEOUS.

ARNAGER is a small fishermen's village, five miles from the city of Ronne, on the island of Bornholm, Denmark, where the first Latter-day Saint baptism on that island took place, July 10, 1851, the candidate being Jens Nielsen. During the terrible persecutions which raged against the first missionaries there, an armed mob, consisting mostly of young men from the neighboring farming districts, surrounded Arnager on the evening of December 2, 1851, for the purpose of whipping two Elders (Nielsen and Jorgensen), who were stopping over night in the house of Jens Nielsen. As soon as the villagers became aware of this, they hastily armed themselves with clubs, axes, iron rods, an old gun, etc., and drove the marauders away, saying, "The Mormons teach us correct doctrines, and, therefore, we will defend them." Most of the men who thus defended the missionaries soon afterwards embraced the gospel and emigrated to Utah. Among them were the late Didrik Funk (Lund), of Plain City, M. P. Ibsen, Jens Kofod, P. Poulsen, Geo. K. Riis, Lars Thorsen and others. Arnager was for many years one of the main resting-places for the missionaries on Bornholm.

CARTWRIGHT, (—,) an English Lady, who was accidentally drowned by an attempt to be baptized by Elder Jonathan Pugmire, sen., in the evening of November 23, 1843, near Chester, England. Her husband and Elder Pugmire were soon after arrested and confined in the Chester jail for more than six weeks, after which they had their trial and were acquitted. Mrs. Cartwright, who became exceedingly enraged when her husband, a few weeks previous, was baptized, had said that if she should ever be such a fool as to be baptized, she hoped to God that she would be drowned in the attempt. Elder Pugmire was in no wise to blame for the accident.

DENNISON, (—,) a doctor, who assisted to mob Joseph Smith in Hiram, Ohio, March 25, 1832, was, some time after that event, convicted of a terrible crime, for which he was sent to the penitentiary for ten years and died before the term expired.

DESPAIN, (Solomon J.,) Bishop of the Granite Ward, Salt Lake County, Utah, was born December 3, 1823, in Lauderdale County, Alabama, removed, when a young boy, with his parents to Tennessee, afterwards to Kansas, and still later to Calhoun County, Ill., where he married in 1842 and soon after joined the Campbellites, with whom he remained until August 30, 1851, when he and wife were baptized into the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. In 1854 he visited his relatives in Arkansas and succeeded in baptizing quite a number of them. Agreeable to counsel from Orson Pratt, who at that time was publishing the Seer in Washington, D. C., Despain made his home in Arkansas, where he presided over a branch of the Church for seven years, until he, in 1861, removed with his family to Utah, and located near the mouth of Little Cottonwood Canyon, where he yet resides. When the Salt Lake Stake of Zion was reorganized in 1877, he was ordained a Bishop and appointed to preside over the Granite Ward.

"EVENING AND MORNING STAR" (THE), a monthly periodical of large octavo size, published in Independence, Jackson County, Missouri, and Kirtland, Geauga (now Lake) County, Ohio. It was the first paper published in the interest of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. The first number was issued in Independence, Missouri, in June, 1832, with W. W. Phelps as editor, after which it was published regularly every month until July, 1833, when the printing office was destroyed by the mob. In December, 1833, another Church printing office was opened in Kirtland, Ohio, and the publication of the Star recommenced, by Oliver Cowdery. It was continued until September, 1834, when the name of the paper was changed to the Messenger and Advocate. Only twenty-four numbers, or two volumes, were published altogether; namely, fourteen in Missouri and ten in Ohio. All the Missouri numbers were republished in Kirtland. The subscription price was $1.00 a year.

FAYETTE, a town pleasantly situated near the north end of Seneca Lake, in Seneca County, N. Y. The township had about three thousand inhabitants in 1880. Fayette was the home of the Whitmer family from 1809 to 1831; also the temporary home of Joseph Smith, the Prophet, from June, 1829, to June, 1830, and from August, 1830, to January, 1831. Here, also, he finished the translation of the Book of Mormon, while he shared the hospitality of the Whitmer family, and, on April 6, 1830, organized the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, with six members. The first public discourse delivered by any Latter-day Saint Elder was preached by Oliver Cowdery in the house of Peter Whitmer, in Fayette, April 11, 1830; and the first three conferences, held by the Church, convened in Fayette respectively June 1, 1830, September 1, 1830, and January 2, 1831. Quite a number of the early members of the Church were baptized by Joseph Smith and others in Seneca Lake and Seneca River, near Fayette. Among their number was the Whitmer family, Hiram Page, William Jolly and R. Ziba Peterson. It was also at, or near, Fayette that the Three Witnesses of the Book of Mormon received a divine testimony of that book, and where the Eight Witnesses were shown the plates by Joseph Smith. Twenty of the revelations recorded in the book of Doctrine and Covenants were given through Joseph Smith at Fayette, besides the Words of Moses and the Prophecy of Enoch, published in the Pearl of Great Price. Since the removal of Joseph Smith to Kirtland and the Whitmer family to Missouri in 1831, Fayette has not been connected with any important event in Church history. It has frequently been visited by missionaries, who have passed through the State of New York.

FOLLETT, (KING,) an honored and worthy Elder of the Church, was born July 24, 1788, in Vermont, and moved in his youth to Cuyahoga Co., Ohio, where he first heard the gospel and was baptized in the spring of 1831. From that time he shared with the Saints in their persecutions and afflictions. As he was leaving the State of Missouri in April, 1839, he was dragged away from his distressed family, being falsely accused of robbery, and cast in jail in Richmond, where Parley P. Pratt and fellow-prisoners had already been confined for months. After suffering in the Richmond and Columbia jails about six months, he finally obtained a trial, and was honorably discharged in October, 1839, being acquitted of all the crimes of which he falsely had been accused. After his release from confinement he was again permitted to join his family and the Saints, in Illinois, and continued faithful and true until his death, which occurred in Nauvoo, Hancock County, Ill., March 9, 1844. His death was occasioned by the accidental breaking of a rope, and the falling of a bucket of rock upon him, while engaged in walling up a well.

HEAD, (JAMES,) of Macomb, McDonough Co., Ill., one of the murderers of Joseph and Hyrum Smith, was, after having committed the fiendish deed, always gloomy and troubled in his mind, and frequently declared that he saw the two martyrs before him! He never had any peace.

JOHNSON, (JOHN,) father of Apostles Luke S. and Lyman E. Johnson, was born in Chesterfield, New Hampshire, April 11, 1779. He followed the occupation of farming on a large scale and was noted for his independent living. He moved from Pomfret, Vermont, to Hiram, Portage County, Ohio, and belonged to the Methodist Church four or five years previous to receiving the gospel. Soon after Joseph Smith's removal from New York State to Ohio, Johnson, together with his wife and Ezra Booth, went to Kirtland to investigate "Mormonism." While there Mrs. Johnson was miraculously healed from a case of chronic rheumatism, under the administration of the Prophet. Some time during that year (1831) Johnson and family were baptized by Joseph Smith. In the month of September, the Prophet removed from Kirtland to Hiram, Johnson furnishing him and family with a home, while he translated a portion of the Bible. It was while living in Bro. Johnson's house that the Prophet and S. Rigdon were so cruelly mobbed, on March 25, 1832. Johnson had his collar-bone broken on that occasion, in his attempt to defend the Prophet, but was immediately healed under the administration of David Whitmer. Some time afterwards the family moved to Kirtland, where Johnson was ordained a High Priest and became a member of the first High Council, organized February 17, 1834. When the great apostasy took place in Kirtland, in 1837 and 1838, Johnson, like many others, was affected thereby, and finally died as a non-member, in Kirtland, July 30, 1843.

LINNELL, (HENRY,) a faithful member of the Church and for many years president of the Northampton branch, England, was born Feb. 28, 1822, in Northampton, England, and died in Salt Lake City, Utah, January 10, 1886. He was known in England for his great hospitality to the Elders.

MASON, (CAROT,) a mobocrat, who on the night of March 25, 1832, dragged Joseph Smith out of his bed in Hiram, Ohio. Soon after he had an attack of the spinal affection and became a great sufferer.

NIELSEN, (JENS,) the first Latter-day Saint on the island of Bornholm, Denmark, was born in Arnager, Bornholm, February 24, 1796, and baptized July 10, 1851. He came to Utah in 1854 and located in Lehi, but moved in 1869 to Newton, Cache County, Utah, where he was ordained a High Priest and died June 2, 1875.

TOWNSEND, (—,) one of the mobbers who assaulted and forced in the door of the Carthage jail on June 27, 1844. He lived near Fort Madison, Iowa. The pistol discharged by Joseph Smith wounded him in the arm, near the shoulder, and it continued to rot without healing until it was amputated, and even then it would not heal. About six months after he was shot, Mrs. E. C. Lawn, widow of John Lawn, captain of a company of the Illinois militia, saw his arm and dressed it. He stayed over night with Mrs. Lawn's father and groaned through the night without sleeping. He asked the old gentleman (Mr. Lawn) what he thought of Joseph Smith being a Prophet. Mr. Lawn replied that he did not know. "Well," said Townsend, "I know he was a Prophet of God! And, oh, that I had stayed at home and minded my own business, and then I would not have lost my life and been tormented with a guilty conscience, and with this dreadful wound, which none can heal!" He died two or three months afterwards, having literally rotted alive!

WEILER, (JOSEPH,) a diligent and faithful Elder of the Church and son of Bishop Jacob Weiler, of the 3rd Ward, Salt Lake City, was born in Chester County, Penn., Nov. 17, 1836, removed with his parents to Nauvoo in 1841, arrived in the Valley in 1847 and helped to lay the foundation of Salt Lake City. In 1864-67 he performed a mission to England and Holland, acquiring in the latter country, by patient study, the Dutch language and superintended the translation of the Voice of Warning. Elder Francis A. Brown, of Ogden, was his companion. He died at his residence in Salt Lake City, Aug. 4, 1885, leaving a wife and seven children.

THE TWELVE APOSTLES.

HEBER CHASE KIMBALL,

A member of he first quorum of Twelve Apostles, and first counselor to President Brigham Young from 1847 to 1868, was born June 14, 1801, in the town of Sheldon, Franklin County, Vermont. In 1811 he moved to West Bloomfield, Ontario County, New York, with his parents and the rest of the family. His father was a blacksmith and farmer. In 1806 he first went to school, continuing most of the time until he was fourteen years of age, when he began to learn blacksmithing with his father. During the war of 1812, his father lost his property, and when Kimball arrived at the age of 19, he found himself dependent on his own resources, and frequently suffering for the necessaries of life. His elder brother Charles, hearing of his destitute condition, offered to teach him the potter's trade. The offer was accepted, and he continued with his brother until he was 21 years old. In this interim they moved to Mendon, Monroe County, where they pursued the pottery business. After having learned this trade, he worked six months for his brother for wages.

In November, 1822, he married Vilate Murray, daughter of Roswell and Susannah Murray, who was born in Florida, New York, June 1, 1806, and immediately after purchased the premises from his brother Charles, and went into business for himself as a potter, which trade he followed for upwards of ten years.

Some time in 1823 he received the three first degrees of masonry, and in 1824, with five others, he petitioned the Chapter ot Canandaigua, asking to receive all the degrees up to that of Royal Arch Mason. The petition was granted, but just previous to the time they were to receive those degrees, the anti-Masons burned the Chapter buildings.

In his early life Kimball received many pressing invitations to unite himself with the different religious sects of the day, but did not see fit to comply until a revival occurred in his neighborhood, shortly after which he and his wife were baptized, and they joined the Baptists. About three weeks after this occurrence, some Elders of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints came from Pennsylvania to the residence of Phineas H. Young, in Victor, and learning of their arrival, curiosity prompted Kimball to see them, and he then heard for the first time the everlasting gospel. He desired much to learn more, and in company with Brigham and Phineas H. Young and their wives, he started for Pennsylvania, where they stayed with the Church six days, regularly attending the meetings. One day in April, 1832, Alpheus Gifford called at Kimball's shop; after a few moments conversation, he expressed his readiness to be baptized, and he went with Elder Gifford to a small stream in the woods, about one mile distant, where the holy ordinance was administered to him. About two weeks later, his wife Vilate was baptized by Joseph Young.

Kimball was ordained an Elder by Joseph Young, and in company with him and Brigham Young, he preached in Genesee, Avon and Lyonstown, where they baptized many and built up branches. In September, 1832, with Brigham and Joseph Young, he went to Kirtland, Ohio, and visited the Prophet Joseph Smith.

In the fall of 1833, having sold his possessions, he started for Kirtland, accompanied by Brigham Young and his two children, arriving about the last of October or first of November.

On May 5, 1834, he left Kirtland, in company with President Joseph Smith and about a hundred others, and arrived in New Portage, where Zion's Camp was organized. He was appointed captain of the third company. At the reorganization of the Camp at Salt River, Missouri, he was selected as one of President Smith's lifeguards. While on Fishing River, and after assisting to inter a number of the brethren who fell by the cholera, he himself was very severely attacked. Shortly after he received an honorable discharge in writing and (in accordance with the instructions of President Joseph Smith), on the 30th he started for home, reaching Kirtland on the 26th of July. About two weeks after his return, he established a pottery, and continued to work at his business until cold weather set in. In the winter of 1834-1835 he attended the theological schools, established in Kirtland. On February 14, 1835, he was chosen and ordained one of the Twelve Apostles. On May 3rd he started in company with the Twelve on a mission to the Eastern churches, and visited, among other places, Sheldon, where he was born, preaching to his friends and relatives. He crossed the Green Mountains on foot and alone, and attended a conference in St. Johnsbury with the Twelve. August 3rd, he started for home, and at Buffalo met others of the Twelve. They arrived in Kirtland September 25th.

March 27, 1836, he attended the dedication of the House of the Lord at Kirtland, and received his washings and anointings with the Twelve Apostles. From May to October he was engaged on a mission in the northern part of the United States.

Having been called by the Prophet Joseph, on June 13, 1837, accompanied by Orson Hyde, Willard Richards and Joseph Fielding, he started on a mission to England. On the 1st of July, in company with Hyde, Richards, John Goodson, Isaac Russell and others, he sailed on the ship Garrick, landing in Liverpool on the 20th. On the 22nd he, in company with others, went to Preston, and on the following Sunday they heard the Rev. James Fielding preach, who, without being requested, gave out an appointment for them to preach in the afternoon, when a large concourse of people assembled to hear them. Kimball presented the first principles of the gospel. A number believed and rejoiced exceedingly. The Reverend Fielding, however, shut his doors against the Elders and would not suffer them to preach in his chapel again, but Kimball and his companions continued to preach in private houses, on street corners and in market places, and by Christmas there were about one thousand members of the Church in England.

April 9, 1838, in company with Orson Hyde and Isaac Russell he took coach for Liverpool, and on the 20th embarked on the Garrick. After 22½ days' sailing, they landed in New York, from where they continued their journey to Kirtland, arriving May 22nd, having been absent eleven months, and having been instrumental, in connection with his brethren in establishing the work in Great Britain, and baptizing about fifteen hundred persons.

As President Smith and most of the authorities of the Church had removed to Far West, Missouri, Kimball took his family and journeyed mostly by water, via the Ohio, Mississippi and Missouri rivers, and arrived at Far West, Missouri, July 25th, where he had a happy meeting with the Prophet and other leading men of the Church. Bishop Partridge gave him a lot and sufficient timber to build a house. While it was in course of erection, the family lived in a small shanty about eleven feet square, in which Brother Kimball could hardly stand upright.

During the summer of 1838, he accompanied the Prophet Joseph and others to Daviess County, Missouri, to help to protect the Saints and their families from mobocratic fury. When Far West was surrounded, he was in line with his brethren, momentarily anticipating the awful tragedy of a bloody massacre.

In company with President Young he visited the Prophet Joseph Smith and his fellow-prisoners, who were chained together in the Richmond jail and exerted himself for their welfare and deliverance. He also counseled with and aided the committee in removing the wounded, helpless and poor of the Saints, who were still left from the assaults and ravages of the mob.

After attending the secret conference, held April 26, 1839, in Far West, he accompanied the Twelve to Quincy, Illinois, where he found his family. Thence he removed to Hancock County and built himself a log house on the site of the City of Nauvoo.

In September, 1839, he started in company with Brigham Young on his second mission to England, arriving in Liverpool April 6, 1840. After a little over one year's diligent missionary labors he returned to America, arriving in Nauvoo July 1, 1841.

On the 23rd of October he was elected a member of the city council of Nauvoo, where he labored in various capacities to build up the Church.

September 10, 1842, he started on a mission through Illinois, in company with Brigham Young, Geo. A. Smith and Amasa M. Lyman, laboring diligently to allay excitement and correct false doctrines. He returned to Nauvoo November 4th.

About the first of July, 1843, he started on a mission to the Eastern States, to preach the gospel, returning to Nauvoo October 22nd. May 21, 1844, he started as delegate to Washington, to petition the rulers of the nation for redress for grievances. Returning, he received news of the massacre of the Prophets Joseph and Hyrum. After the expulsion of the Saints from Nauvoo, he was one of the 143 pioneers who led the way to Utah. In December, 1847, when Brigham Young was sustained as President of the Church, in the place of Joseph Smith, Heber C. Kimball was chosen to be his first counselor. In 1849 he was elected lieutenant-governor of the provisional government of the State of Deseret, which office he sustained until his death.

He was a member of the legislative council of Utah Territory from its organization until 1858, when he declined re-election, and for the last three years of that time he was president of the council.

President Kimball was known for the purity of his life, his faithfulness, his prophetic qualifications, and his benevolence, diligence and energy in assisting in every way to build up the Church and Kingdom of God. His life was spent in the work, in preaching and counseling, and in administering in the Lord's House. He visited every settlement in Utah Territory many times, preaching and exhorting the Saints to faithfulness. A severe fall at Provo some time in May, 1868, laid the foundation of the sickness, which resulted in his death on June 22, 1868, at his residence in Salt Lake City, Utah. He was buried on the 24th, lamented by all the Saints, who loved him most dearly.

ORSON HYDE,

One of the first Twelve Apostles in this dispensation, and president of the quorum from December, 1847, to October, 1875, was the son of Nathan and Sally Hyde, and was born in Oxford, New Haven County, Connecticut, January 8, 1805.

His father, who was an athletic, witty and talented man, fought, and was several times wounded, in the U. S. Army, serving in Canada, under General Brown, and on the frontier in the war of 1812. His mother having died when he was seven years old, Orson and his eight brothers and three sisters were scattered, and he was placed under the care of a gentleman named Nathan Wheeler, with whom he stayed till he was eighteen years of age. Mr. Wheeler moving from Derby, Connecticut, to Kirtland, Ohio, when Orson was fourteen years old, the boy had to walk the whole distance, 600 miles, carrying his knapsack. On striking out into the world for himself he worked at several occupations, and part of the time served as clerk in the store of Gilbert & Whitney, in Kirtland.

In 1827 a religious revival made quite a stir in the neighborhood of Kirtland, and he became converted to the Methodist faith, and was appointed as class leader. Subsequently, under the preaching of Sidney Rigdon, he embraced the doctrine of the Campbellites and was baptized by immersion. He then took up his abode in the town of Mentor, Ohio, and commenced to study under the care of Sidney Rigdon and others, becoming proficient in several branches of education.

He then began to preach, assisting in the formation of several Campbellite branches in Loraine and Huron Counties, Ohio, over which he was appointed pastor in 1830. In the fall of the year several "Mormons" visited that neighborhood, bringing the so-called "golden Bible," of which he read a portion, and by request preached against. But feeling that he had done wrong, he determined to oppose it no more until he had made further investigation. He accordingly went to Kirtland to see the Prophet, and there found that Sidney Rigdon and others of his former friends had embraced the "new gospel." After diligent inquiry he became himself convinced of its truth, and was baptized by Sidney Rigdon, October 31, 1831, and was confirmed on the same day under the hands of Joseph Smith the Prophet. He soon received the witness of the Spirit in a powerful manner, and began to bear testimony to his former friends. He was shortly after ordained a High Priest, and took a mission with Elder Hyrum Smith among the Campbellites of Ohio, when several branches were organized and many sick people were healed by the laying on of hands.

In the spring of 1832, in company with Elder Samuel H. Smith, he performed an arduous mission in New York, Massachusetts, Maine and Rhode Island, traveling two thousand miles on foot without purse or scrip. Early in 1833, with Elder Hyrum Smith, he took a mission to Pennsylvania and Ohio, baptizing many persons into the Church. In the summer of this year he was appointed, with Elder John Gould, to carry instructions to the Saints in Jackson County, Missouri, and went on foot a distance of a thousand miles, traveling forty miles a day and swimming the rivers. They performed their mission and returned to Kirtland in November. He subsequently performed another mission to Pennsylvania, in company with Elder Orson Pratt.

In May 1834, he started with the company which went to Missouri, calling on the way, with Elder Parley P. Pratt, to see Governor Daniel Dunklin, to intercede for the restoration to the Missouri Saints of the lands from which they had been driven. Their labor was in vain. September 4, 1834, he married Marinda N. Johnson, daughter of John and Elsa Johnson, and sister to Luke S. and Lyman E. Johnson. In the following winter he was chosen as one of the Twelve Apostles, and was ordained to that high and holy calling in Kirtland, Ohio, February 15, 1835. Soon after he traveled with his quorum through Vermont and New Hampshire. In 1836 he was sent to the State of New York and afterwards to Canada, where, in company with Elder Parley P. Pratt, he helped to raise up several branches of the Church.

In the spring of 1837 he went with others to England, where about fifteen hundred persons were baptized by their united labors. He returned to Kirtland May 22, 1838, and in the summer moved to Far West, Missouri. Upon the settlement of the Saints in Commerce, afterwards called Nauvoo, he moved there, and at the April conference in 1840, was sent on a mission to Jerusalem. Elder John E. Page was appointed to accompany him, but failed to fill the appointment, and Elder Hyde proceeded alone. He crossed the ocean to England, passed over to Germany, staying in Bavaria to learn the German language, went to Constantinople, also to Cairo and Alexandria, and after encountering many hardships, reached the Holy City. On the morning of Sunday, October 24, 1841, he went up on to the Mount of Olives, and dedicated and consecrated the land for the gathering of Judah's scattered remnants. He also erected a pile of stones there, as a witness, and one upon Mount Zion, according to a vision given to him previous to leaving Nauvoo, and the predictions of the Prophet Joseph upon his head. He returned home in December, 1842.

Elder Hyde accompanied the Saints in the expulsion from Nauvoo, and in 1846 was appointed, with Elders John Taylor and Parley P. Pratt, to go to England and set in order the churches there. They left their families on the frontier. Elder Hyde took charge of the Millennial Star, while Elders Taylor and Pratt traveled through the conferences. He returned in 1847, and when the pioneers left for the mountains he remained in charge of the Saints at Winter Quarters. He published the Frontier Guardian at Council Bluffs, and came to Salt Lake City in 1851. In 1855 he went in charge of several missionaries to Carson, and organized the county, which was then in Utah, but subsequently was included in Nevada. Elder Hyde was afterwards sent to take charge of affairs in Sanpete County. He took up his residence in Spring City, and was the leading spirit in that region until his decease. He was for many years an active member of the legislative assembly. At the time of his death, which occurred at his residence in Spring City, Sanpete Co., Utah, November 28, 1878, he was a member of the committee for the construction of the Manti Temple.

Elder Hyde was a man of great natural ability, and by industrious application had acquired a good education, which with his great and varied experience and extended travels, rendered him a powerful instrument in the hands of God for the defense and dissemination of the gospel and the building up of the Latter-day Work. He left a numerous family and a host of friends.

WILLIAM E. McLELLIN,

A member of the first quorum of Twelve Apostles, was born in Tennessee, probably in the year 1806. He heard the gospel preached by Elders Samuel H. Smith and Reynolds Cahoon, while they were on their mission to Jackson County, Missouri, in the summer of 1831; he wound up his business and followed them to Jackson County. While on the way, he was baptized, and ordained an Elder. He visited Kirtland, Ohio, in the fall. At his request, Joseph Smith inquired of the Lord concerning him, and received a revelation. (See Doc. & Cov., Sec. 66.) Soon after he and other members began to critizise the language used in some of the revelations, and "Wm. E. McLellin," writes Joseph Smith, "as the wisest man in his own estimation, having more learning than sense, endeavored to write a commandment like unto one of the least of the Lord's, but failed; it was an awful responsibility to write in the name of the Lord. The Elders and all present that witnessed this vain attempt of a man to imitate the language of Jesus Christ, renewed their faith in the fulness of the gospel, and in the truth of the commandments and revelations which the Lord had given to the Church through my instrumentality; and the Elders signified a willingness to bear testimony to their truth to all the world."

In the winter of 1832-33, he performed a mission, in company with Elder P. P. Pratt, through Missouri and into Green County, Illinois, where they preached with much success.

In a revelation given March 8, 1833, the Lord said, "I am not well pleased with my servant William E. McLellin."

He was one of the corresponding committee in behalf of the Saints, to confer with the Jackson and Clay County Committee, in trying to settle the Missouri difficulties.

On July 3, 1834, he was chosen one of the High Council in Clay County, Mo., and on the 9th started in company with the Prophet Joseph from Missouri to Kirtland, Ohio. He was chosen an assistant teacher in the school of the Elders in Kirtland, during the winter of 1834-35.

He was chosen one of the Twelve Apostles, at the organization of that quorum, and ordained Feb. 15, 1835.

With the quorum of the Twelve, in the spring and summer of 1835, he went on a mission to the East, and baptized five. While upon this mission, he wrote a letter to Kirtland, casting censure upon the Presidency, for which he was suspended from fellowship, but meeting with the council of the First Presidency after his return to Kirtland, Sept. 25th, he confessed, was forgiven and restored to fellowship. He attended the Hebrew school in Kirtland during the winter of 1835-36, and officiated as clerk for the Twelve.

On Friday, May 11, 1838, he came before a Bishop's court, in Far West, Mo., where he said he had no confidence in the Presidency of the Church; consequently, he had quit praying and keeping the commandments of the Lord, and indulged himself in his sinful lusts. It was from what he had heard, that he believed the Presidency had got out of the way, and not from any thing that he had seen himself. He was cut off from the Church for unbelief and apostasy.

After his excommunication he tried to establish a church of his own, that he might be the head thereof, but without success. He took an active part with the mob in Missouri, in robbing and driving the Saints. At the time Joseph Smith was in prison, he and others robbed Joseph's house and stable of considerable property.

While Joseph was in prison at Richmond, Mo., McLellin, who was a large and active man, went to the sheriff and asked for the privilege of flogging the Prophet; permission was granted, on condition that Joseph would fight. The sheriff made known to Joseph, McLellin's earnest request, to which Joseph consented, if his irons were taken off. McLellin then refused to fight, unless he could have a club, to which Joseph was perfectly willing; but the sheriff would not allow them to fight on such unequal terms.

McLellin was a man of a superficial education, though he had a good flow of language. He adopted the profession of medicine.

He finally died in obscurity at Independence, Jackson Co., Mo., April 24, 1883.

PARLEY PARKER PRATT,

A member of the first quorum of Twelve Apostles, was born on the 12th day of April, 1807, in Burlington, Otsego County, State of New York. He was the third son of Jared and Charity Pratt; Jared was the son of Obadiah and Jemima Pratt; Obadiah was the son of Christopher and Sarah Pratt; Christopher was the son of William and Hannah Pratt; William was the son of Joseph Pratt; Joseph was the son of Lieutenant William and Elizabeth Pratt, who were found among the first settlers of Hartford, Connecticut, in the year 1639. They are supposed to have accompanied the Rev. Thomas Hooker and his congregation, about one hundred in number, from Newtown, now called Cambridge, Massachusetts, through a dense wilderness, inhabited only by savages and wild beasts, and became the first founders of the colony at Hartford, in June, 1636.

This ancient Pilgrim, William Pratt, was a member of the legislature for some twenty-five or thirty sessions; and the general court gave him one hundred acres of land in Saybrook, Connecticut, for service performed as lieutenant in the Pequot war; he was one of the judges of the first court in New London County. Parley P. Pratt is a lineal descendant, of the seventh generation, from that distinguished pilgrim and humble pioneer to the new world.

The youthful days of Parley P. Pratt were characterized by the soberness and thoughtfulness of manhood. Though from adverse circumstances his education was extremely limited, yet he displayed, even in youth, an originality of mind seldom exhibited. In September, 1830, he, being led by the Spirit of the Lord from his home in the State of Ohio, came several hundred miles eastward, where he fortunately obtained a copy of one of the most remarkable works of modern times—the Book of Mormon. He read the same, was convinced of its divine authenticity, and traveled in search of the highly favored men of God who had seen angels and heard the voice of the Almighty. He soon succeeded in finding some of them, from whom he learned that about five months previous the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints had been organized. He requested baptism, and was immediately after ordained an Elder. The same month he visited Canaan, Columbia County, New York—the county where he had spent many of his youthful days—and after preaching a few times in different neighborhoods, and baptizing Orson Pratt, his brother, he returned to Seneca County.

Receiving a revelation through Joseph the Prophet, he, in company with three or four others, performed a mission, some fifteen hundred miles, to the western boundaries of the State of Missouri, and was among the first of the Saints to stand upon that choice land where the city of Zion is hereafter to be built, preparatory to the second advent of our Savior.

In the spring of 1831 he returned to the northern part of Ohio, where he met Joseph the Prophet. In the summer he again performed a mission through Ohio, Indiana, Illinois and Missouri, preaching, baptizing and building up the Church.

In the autumn of 1833 he and about twelve hundred men, women and children were driven by a murderous, furious mob from their own houses and lands in Jackson County, Missouri. Two hundred houses were burned, cattle shot, hay stacks and grain burned, many whipped until their bowels gushed out; others killed, and the afflicted remnant driven across the river into Clay County.

Soon after this Elder Pratt performed a long journey of about fifteen hundred miles east, preaching repentance and strengthening the Saints. In 1834 he again returned to Clay County, Missouri, officiating in his holy calling wherever he went.

In February, 1835, having returned to the northern part of Ohio, he was chosen and ordained one of the Twelve Apostles of this last dispensation, and the same year performed a lengthy journey through Pennsylvania, New York, and several of the New England States, and returned again to Ohio. In 1836 he visited Canada, and established a large branch of the Church in Toronto, and other branches in adjoining towns. In 1837 he visited New York City, where he founded a large branch of the Church.

In 1838 he removed to Caldwell County, in the western boundaries of Missouri, and in the same year another dreadful persecution commenced against the Saints, and they were again driven from their own houses and inheritances, and their property to the amount of millions was destroyed; some scores of defenseless men, women and children were murdered; scores of others incarcerated in dungeons, among whom was Parley P. Pratt; the balance, about fifteen thousand, were driven from the State, and found refuge in Illinois. Elder Pratt was kept in prison, without trial, about eight months, when by the kind providence of God, he made his escape on July 4, 1839. Immediately after gaining his liberty he published a history of the Missouri persecutions, written while in prison. The first edition appeared in Detroit in 1839.

In 1840 he, in company with others of the Twelve, went to England, and in the city of Manchester commenced the publication of a periodical entitled the Millennial Star, which has continued until the present time—this being the forty-eighth volume.

In 1841 he was appointed the president over all the British conferences, and remained in this high and honorable station until the autumn of 1842, during which he edited the Star, superintended the Saints' emigration, and published several small but interesting works. The following winter he returned to Illinois, where he continued laboring in the ministry for one or two years.

About the beginning of the year 1845 he was appointed the president over all the branches in the New England and Middle States, his headquarters being at New York City, where he published a periodical entitled The Prophet. In the summer he returned to Nauvoo.

In February, 1846, he was again driven from his home by a ruthless mob. Some fifteen or twenty thousand Saints were also driven from the United States about the same time, with the loss of houses and lands, and an immense amount of property which the mob are in the unmolested possession of until the present day. After wading through unparalleled sufferings with his family, he and the persecuted Saints succeeded in reaching the Indian country at Council Bluffs, and being called by the Holy Ghost, through the Prophet Brigham Young, to go to England, he left his family upon the broad prairie, without house or scarcely any food, to comply with the word of the Lord. He arrived in England, assisting in setting the Church in order, and in strengthening the Saints throughout the British Islands.

In the spring of 1847 he returned to his family and brethren; and in the summer and autumn of that year he removed to Great Salt Lake Valley, and suffered incredible hardships until the harvest of 1848.

He assisted in forming a constitution for the provisional government of Deseret, and was elected a member of the senate in the general assembly; and was afterwards elected to the legislative council when Utah became a Territory of the United States.

In the year 1851 he was sent on a mission to the Pacific Islands and to South America.

In the summer of 1855 he returned over the Sierra Nevada Mountains to his home, and occupied a part of his time in preaching in the various settlements of Utah, and at other times laboring with his own hands in the cultivation of his farm. The following winter he officiated as chaplain in the legislative council at the State House in Fillmore City.

In the autumn of 1856 he accompanied about twenty missionaries across the plains to the States. During the winter and part of the following spring he visited the Saints at St. Louis, Philadelphia, New York and other places, preaching, writing and publishing the glad tidings of the kingdom of God.

And finally, on the 13th of May, 1857, he fell a noble martyr for the cause of the truth, which he had advocated with such untiring perseverance for nearly twenty-seven years.

Among the numerous writings of this martyred Apostle may be mentioned first, the "Voice of Warning," printed in New York in 1837, and which has since passed through many editions, and been translated into several foreign languages; second, his "History of the Missouri Persecutions;" third, his "Poems;" fourth, his "Key to Theology," a masterly production. The history of his life, up to near the time of his martyrdom, was written by himself, and was published in the year 1874 by his son P. P. Pratt. To this work (The Autobiography of Parley Parker Pratt) the reader is referred for a full history of the life of this great and illustrious Apostle.

LUKE S. JOHNSON,

A member of the first quorum of Twelve Apostles, was born in Pomfret, Windsor Co., Vermont, Nov. 3, 1807. In early life he assisted his father in farming, and remained with him until he received the gospel and was baptized by Joseph Smith May 10, 1831. In the meantime the family had removed from Pomfret, Vermont, to Hiram, Portage Co., Ohio. Soon after his baptism Johnson was ordained a Priest by Christian Whitmer and performed a mission to southern Ohio, in company with Robert Rathburn, where they baptized several and organized a branch in Chippewa. Shortly after, together with Sidney Rigdon, he baptized fifty or sixty in New Portage, Ohio, and organized a branch. From there they went to Pittsburgh, Penn., where Johnson baptized Rigdon's mother and eldest brother and several others; they also organized a branch. At a conference held in Orange, Cuyahoga Co., Ohio, Johnson was ordained a High Priest by Joseph Smith, and in 1832-33, in company with Seymour Brunson and Hazen Aldrich, traveled as a missionary through Ohio, Virginia and Kentucky. They baptized over a hundred persons and organized branches of the Church in Lawrence County, Ohio, and Cabell County, Virginia.

Nov. 1, 1833, Johnson married Susan H. Poteet, in Cabell County, Virginia. At the organization of the first High Council of the Church, Feb. 17, 1834, he was chosen one of its members. In the following summer he went as a member of Zion's Camp to Missouri and back. On Feb. 14, 1835, he was chosen, and on the 15th ordained, one of the Twelve Apostles, at the organization of that quorum in Kirtland, Ohio, and traveled during the summer through the Eastern States, holding conferences, preaching the gospel and regulating the branches, returning to Kirtland in September. The following winter he attended the Hebrew school, and received his blessings in the House of the Lord in the spring of 1836, after which he performed a mission to the State of New York and Canada. After having baptized quite a number and organized a branch in Canada, he returned to Kirtland in the fall, where he upon two different occasions rendered the Prophet Joseph efficient aid in protecting him from his enemies.

On another occasion he heard that a vexatious writ had been sworn out against Joseph Smith, sen., it being supposed that he was liable to a prosecution in consequence of his manner of solemnizing marriages. Johnson got the privilege of serving the writ and after arresting Smith, he took him to the magistrate's office. The court not being ready to attend to the case, Johnson put the prisoner in a small room adjoining the entrance from the office and allowed his son Hyrum to accompany him. He then took a nail out from over the window sash, left the room, locked the door and commenced telling stories in the court room, to raise a laugh. When finally the court called for the prisoner, Johnson walked into the room in the dark, put the nail into its place in the window, and went back and told the court that the prisoner had escaped. The officers rushed to the door and examined the fastenings which they found all secure. This created much surprise, and they swore that it was another "Mormon" miracle. Johnson had arranged with John F. Boynton to help Smith out of the window.

Having partaken of the spirit of speculation, which at that time was possessed by many of the Elders and Saints in Kirtland, Johnson's mind became darkened, and he neglected his duties as an Apostle and Saint. At a conference held in Kirtland, Ohio, Sept. 3, 1837, he was disfellowshipped together with his brother Lyman E. and John F. Boynton. On the following Sunday, however, he confessed his fault, and was received back into fellowship, but was finally cut off for apostasy in Far West, Mo., April 13, 1838. From this time up to the death of Joseph Smith, he spent his time in teaching school in Cabell County, Virginia, for about a year, devoting his leisure time in studying medicine. He then returned to Kirtland, where he practiced as a physician and also engaged in various other occupations in order to obtain a living. He continued friendly to the Church and his former associates in the Priesthood, and in 1846 he was baptized in Nauvoo and came to Salt Lake Valley in 1847 as one of the pioneers. In 1858 he settled St. John, Tooele County, Utah, and was appointed Bishop when that ward was first organized. On the 9th of December, 1861, he died in the house of Orson Hyde, Salt Lake City. Since his return to the Church he lived to the truth to the best of his ability and died in the faith.

WILLIAM SMITH,

A member of the first quorum of Twelve Apostles, was the fifth son of Joseph Smith, sen., and Lucy Smith, born in Royalton, Windsor County, Vermont, March 13, 1811. He was baptized at an early period, and was a Teacher in the Church in 1831. He took a mission to Erie County, Pennsylvania, in December, 1832, to preach the gospel and call the Elders to Kirtland to attend a School of the Prophets. He was ordained to the office of a High Priest under the hands of Sidney Rigdon in council on the 21st day of June, 1833. During the winter of 1833, he worked on a farm and chopped cord wood near Kirtland.

He married Miss Caroline Grant, daughter of Joshua and Thalia Grant, February 14, 1833, by whom he had two daughters—Mary Jane and Caroline L. He went to Missouri in Zion's Camp in 1834, and returned to Kirtland the same fall. He was appointed one of the Twelve Apostles at the organization of that quorum. He accompanied the Twelve on their first mission through the Eastern States and returned with them to Kirtland in the fall. While Joseph Smith was presiding in a High Council, William rebelled against him in a very headstrong manner.

At a debating school held in the house of Father Joseph Smith, Dec. 16, 1835, the Prophet Joseph told the brethren he feared it would not result in good, whereupon William in a rage commanded Joseph to leave the house, attempted to put him out and inflicted upon him personal injury, the effects of which he occasionally felt until his death. After Hyrum and the Twelve had labored with William for several days, he made confession and was forgiven.

He removed to Far West with his family in the spring of 1838. After Joseph was taken prisoner and the mob began to drive out the Saints, William expressed himself in such a vindictive manner against Joseph that the Church suspended him from fellowship, May 4, 1839, at a general conference near Quincy.

He went to Illinois and settled in Plymouth, Hancock County, keeping a tavern. William was restored to the fellowship of the Church through the intercession of Joseph and Hyrum; but when the Twelve went to England, instead of accompanying them, according to the commandment of the Lord, he remained on his farm at Plymouth.

He published a letter in the Times and Seasons, Dec. 1, 1840, making an apology for neglecting to go on his mission upon the ground of poverty, but it came with an ill grace as he was better situated to leave his family than any of the members of the quorum who went.

In the spring of 1841 he visited the branches of the Church in Pennsylvania and New Jersey and collected means for his own benefit, returning to Nauvoo the same season.

He was elected a member of the House of Representatives of the Legislature of Illinois in the winter session of 1842-43. His acts as a member of the legislature were highly approved by the people; he displayed considerable energy in defending the Nauvoo charter and the rights of his constituents.

He took a journey to the East on business in the spring of 1843, and spent his time among the churches.

William returned to Nauvoo April 22, 1844, with about forty or fifty Saints from New Jersey. After staying a short time in Nauvoo, he had his last interview with his brother Joseph under the following circumstances:

He asked Joseph to give him a city lot near the Temple. Joseph told him that he would do so with great pleasure, if he would build a house and live upon it; but he would not give him a lot to sell. William replied he wanted it to build and live upon. The lot was well worth $1,000. In a few hours afterwards, an application was made by Mr. Ivins to the recorder to know if that lot was clear and belonged to Wm. Smith, for William had sold it to him for $500. Joseph, hearing of this, directed the clerk not to make a transfer; at which William was so offended that he threatened Joseph, who deemed it prudent to keep out of the way, until William left on a steamboat for the East accompanied by his family. He spent his time mostly in the various branches of the Church, and collected a good deal of money for the Temple, which he used for his own accommodation.

In all his missions the course of conduct he pursued towards the females subjected him to much criticism.

In a general conference of the Church held in Nauvoo Oct. 6, 1845, Wm. Smith was dropped as one of the Twelve Apostles and Patriarch of the Church, and on the following Sunday (Oct. 12th) he was excommunicated, as more of his mean acts had come to light. Some time after he associated himself with the apostate James J. Strang, who tried to organize a church of his own, but failed.

Wm. Smith is yet alive and officiates as a patriarch in the Josephite Church, in Elkader, Clayton County, Iowa. He is about seventy-five years old, and the only brother of the Prophet Joseph yet alive.

ADAM-ONDI-AHMAN.

Adam-ondi-Ahman, once a settlement of the Saints, was beautifully situated on an elevated spot of ground, on the north side of Grand River, in Daviess Co., Mo., about twenty-five miles north of Far West. It is the place where Father Adam, three years previous to his death, blessed his posterity, when they rose up and called him Michael, the Prince, the Arch-angel, and he, being full of the Holy Ghost, predicted what should befall his posterity to the latest generation. (Doc. & Cov. 107:53-56.)

After the arrival of the Prophet Joseph Smith in Missouri in the spring of 1838, he began to plan for new locations for the gathering of the Saints, whose numbers continually increased in Caldwell and surrounding counties. On May 19th, in company with Sidney Rigdon, Thomas B. Marsh, David W. Patten, Bishop Edward Partridge and others, he visited a place on Grand River, near Wight's ferry, in Daviess County, Mo., where they laid claim to a city plat, which was surveyed in township 60, ranges 27 and 29. They called the place Spring Hill, but "by the mouth of the Lord it was named Adam-ondi-Ahman," because "it is the place where Adam shall come to visit his people, or the Ancient of days shall sit, as spoken of by Daniel the Prophet." In a council, held two days later, it was decided that the Saints should secure the land on Grand River, and that region of country lying between the new location and Far West, which was subsequently done. On June 28, 1838, a Stake of Zion was organized at Adam-ondi-Ahman, with John Smith as president and Reynolds Cahoon and Lyman Wight as his counselors. Vinson Knight was chosen as acting Bishop, and the following named brethren members of the High Council: John Lemon, Daniel Stanton, Mayhew Hillman, Daniel Carter, Isaac Perry, Harrison Sagers, Alanson Brown, Thomas Gordon, Lorenzo D. Barnes, Geo. A. Smith and Ezra Thayer. Lorenzo D. Barnes was chosen as clerk of the Stake. Immediately after, the Saints commenced to gather in from all parts of the country, including Canada; and Adam-ondi-Ahman, having about two hundred families, became the center of what promised to be a flourishing farming district.

Soon after the election difficulty in Gallatin (See under Gallatin), the capital of Daviess County, a mob gathered in the neighborhood of Adam-ondi-Ahman, and notwithstanding an agreement entered into between the Saints and the older citizens two days later, in which both parties pledged themselves to preserve the peace, every preparation was made by the mobbers, who gathered from eleven counties, to drive the Saints away from Daviess County. On Sept. 8, 1838, a report reached Far West, Caldwell County, that the mobbers were about to attack Adam-ondi-Ahman, and a company of men started immediately for Daviess County to help defend their brethren. Also a wagon, loaded with arms and ammunition, was captured on its way from Richmond, Ray Co., to the mobbers in Daviess County. In the meantime a portion of the State militia had been ordered out for the purpose of aiding the civil authorities to bring the "Mormons to justice," as several inflammatory letters, containing falsehoods and misrepresentations of the worst kind against the Saints, had been forwarded to Gov. L. W. Boggs, in Jefferson City. But when Gen. Alexander W. Doniphan, with a company of about three hundred men, arrived in Daviess County about the 13th of September, and camped half way between Adam-ondi-Ahman and Millport, he soon discovered that the "Mormons" were not the aggressors, as they were willing to submit to every demand of the authorities, and very anxious to be protected in their rights and possess their homes in peace. On the 15th David R. Atchison arrived with additional troops from Ray County and ordered the mobbers to disperse and go home, but instead of obeying this order, most of them repaired to Carroll County and there attacked another settlement of the Saints called De Witt. The troops, however, were discharged for the time being, with the exception of two companies under General Parks, and General Atchison made a somewhat fair and truthful report to the governor about the whole affair.

In the beginning of October a large company of Saints from Kirtland, Ohio, located at Adam-ondi-Ahman.

After the fall of De Witt, Carroll County, on October 11, 1838, Sachiel Woods, a notorious mobocrat, called the mob together and made an inflammatory speech, in which he pointed out the advantages they could derive by driving the "Mormons" out of Daviess County. The land sales, he said, were coming on, and if they could get the "Mormons" driven out, they could get all the lands back again, as well as the pay they had received from them. He assured the mob that they had nothing to fear from the authorities, as they already had full proof that they would not assist the "Mormons," and they might therefore just as well as not take their property. His advice was complied with, and the whole banditti, taking their cannon with them, proceeded to Daviess County.

In the meantime Cornelius Gillum was busily engaged in raising a mob in Platte and Clinton counties, and about eight hundred men renewed their depredations around Adam-ondi-Ahman, by burning houses, and driving off horses, sheep, cattle, hogs, etc. The Saints who lived in scattered and lonely situations fled into town for safety. Women and children, some in the most delicate situations, were obliged to leave their homes, and travel several miles, in order to effect their escape, some almost destitute of clothing, glad to escape with their lives. The brethren in Adam-ondi-Ahman prepared for self-defense as best they could, and about one hundred of their friends from Caldwell County came up to their assistance.

During this state of affairs General Parks arrived in Daviess County and ordered Colonel Lyman Wight, who held a commission in the 54th regiment under Parks' command, to call out his men immediately and disperse the mob. Accordingly a force was raised for that purpose, and in a short time was on its march, with a determination to drive off the mob, or die in the attempt. The mob, having learned the orders of General Parks, and likewise being aware of the determination of the oppressed Saints, broke up their encampment and fled, and, seeing that they could not succeed by force, now resorted to stratagem. Thus, after removing their property out of their houses, which were nothing but log cabins, they fired them, and then reported to the authorities of the State, that the "Mormons" were burning and destroying all before them. Among other things they reported that the town of Gallatin and Millport had been destroyed, and all the public records burned by the "Mormons." These lies, and similar falsehoods communicated about the Saints in Caldwell County, and the willingness of Governor Boggs, and other State authorities to listen to the most vile and absurd accusations against the Saints, led to the calling out of the mob-militia, the issuing of the governor's exterminating order, and the final expulsion of the Saints from Missouri.

After the capitulation of Far West, General Moses Wilson proceeded to Adam-ondi-Ahman, on November 8th, and placed guards around the town, so that no person might pass out or in without permission. All the men were then taken and put under guard, and a court of inquiry instituted with the notorious mobocrat Adam Black on the bench. After three days' investigation every man was honorably acquitted, But, notwithstanding this, General Wilson ordered every family out of town within ten days, with permission to go to Caldwell and tarry there until spring, then to leave the State under pain of extermination. The weather was very cold, more so than usual for that season of the year; and in keeping this order of General Wilson, they had to leave their crops and houses, and to live in tents and wagons. As for their flocks and herds, the mob had delivered them from the trouble of taking care of them or from the pain of seeing them starve to death—by stealing them. A committee of twelve was granted the privilege of going from Far West to Daviess County, for four weeks, for the purpose of bringing the crops of the Saints away.

At present there is not the least sign of a town where Adam-ondi-Ahman stood, but the people in the neghborhood are well acquainted with the importance the Saints attached to the place, and take considerable pains to point out to travelers the ruins of the ancient altar, the theory about which, however, they seem to have got somewhat mixed, as they call it "Adam's grave," instead of an altar, upon which he is supposed to have offered sacrifice.

MISCELLANEOUS.

BADGER, (RODNEY,) one of the Pioneers of 1847, was a son of John and Lydia Chamberlain, born Feb. 4, 1823, in Waterford, Caledonia County, Vermont, baptized in Iowa Territory 1839, and ordained an Elder in 1845. He acted as Counselor to Bishop N. V. Jones of the 15th Ward, Salt Lake City, and as special agent of the Perpetual Emigrating Fund to gather up and preserve stray stock. He also served as constable and deputy sheriff of Great Salt Lake County, and was captain of a company of the life guards of the Nauvoo Legion. On April 29, 1853, he was drowned in the Weber River, into which he fearlessly plunged to save the lives of a California emigrant family.

DANITES was a term made use of by some of the brethren in Far West, Mo., and grew out of an expression Joseph Smith made use of when the brethren in the fall of 1838 were preparing to defend themselves from the Missouri mob. He referred to the stealing of Micah's images (Judges 18th Chap.) when he said that the Danites would be after them, meaning the brethren in self-defense. An apostate by the name of Sampson Avard tried to organize a secret band called Danites in Far West for wicked purposes, but this was without the knowledge of the leaders of the Church, and the companies organized by the legal authorities for the defense of the city was in no wise connected with Avard's movement. The repeated stories about Danites, or destroying angels, among the Saints in the Rocky Mountains no doubt has its origin in the wild fancy of wicked and corrupt men, whose object has been to slander and misrepresent the "Mormons."

THE TWELVE APOSTLES.

ORSON PRATT,

A member of the first quorum of Twelve Apostles, was born in Hartford, Washington County, N. Y., September 19, 1811. He was a son of Jared and Charity (Dickinson) Pratt, and a brother of Apostle Parley P. Pratt. His parents were hardworking and poor people, and he was accustomed to labor from his boyhood, during which time the family removed to New Lebanon, in Columbia County, where he attended school part of the time each year until 1825, acquiring a common school education, and becoming familiar with arithmetic and bookkeeping. He also studied the Bible. From the time he was eleven years old, he worked at farming in different places, attending school in the winter, going to Lorain County, Ohio, in the fall of 1827, and in the fall of 1828 performed a journey of nearly seven hundred miles to Connecticut; went thence to Long Island, and in the winter of 1829-30 studied geography, grammar and surveying, at a boarding academy.

He was a prayerful as well as studious youth, although neither he nor his parents connected themselves with any of the religious denominations. In September, 1830, his brother Parley P. Pratt, who had embraced the gospel as taught by Joseph Smith, the Prophet, came with another Elder to Canaan, Columbia County, N. Y., where Orson was residing. He then received their testimony and was baptized September 19, 1830, his birthday, being then nineteen years old. In the following month he traveled two hundred miles to see Joseph Smith, in Fayette, Seneca County, N. Y., and on the 4th of November received through the Prophet the revelation to be found in the Doctrine and Covenants, Section 34, in which he was called of God to preach the gospel, to lift up his voice both long and loud, to cry repentance, and prepare the way before the coming of the Lord.

He was confirmed and ordained an Elder December 1, 1830, and went on his first mission to Colesville, Broome County, N. Y., and in the early part of 1831, went on foot to Kirtland, Ohio, where the Prophet had removed, a distance of about three hundred miles. He then performed several missions in Ohio, Illinois and Missouri, baptizing many converts. At a conference held in Amherst, Ohio, he was set apart, June 25, 1832, to preside over the Elders, and was sent on a mission to the Eastern States. February 2, 1832, he was ordained a High Priest, after which he traveled and preached without purse or scrip, through Ohio, Pennsylvania, New Jersey and New York City to Long Island, thence northeast through part of Vermont into New Hampshire, preaching and baptizing by the way and making many converts in Bath, N. H., and Charleston, Vt. Next he proceeded to the southern part of Connecticut, and had continued success. After laboring in these parts till the fall of 1832, he started west, traveling some three or four hundred miles, preaching, baptizing, ordaining men to the ministry, and laboring in many parts of New York. He returned to Kirtland, Ohio, February 17, 1833, having traveled on foot about 4,000 miles, baptized 104 persons and organized several new branches.

In Kirtland he attended the School of the Prophets during the winter, boarding with the Prophet Joseph, and in the following spring he again went East, performing another successful mission, traveling 2,000 miles in six months, and baptizing over fifty persons. After this he remained in Kirtland about two months, laboring on the House of the Lord, and on November 27th started on another mission to the eastern churches. He returned to Kirtland February 13, 1834, having traveled about one thousand miles.

Thirteen days later he was started out again with Elder Orson Hyde on a special mission, on which he was absent about two months, traveling 800 miles. He next traveled with Zion's Camp to Missouri, being captain of a company. On July 7th he was ordained one of the standing High Council in Missouri, where he also visited the scattered churches in Clay County, and in August was sent eastward, traveling through Illinois and Indiana to Ohio, suffering severely through fatigue and ague, arriving in Kirtland April 26, 1835, on which day he was ordained one of the Twelve Apostles, under the hands of David Whitmer and Oliver Cowdery. On May 4th, he went on another mission to the Eastern States, being absent a little over six months. During the winter and early spring he taught a grammar school in Kirtland, and also studied Hebrew, and then received his endowments in the Kirtland Temple. His next mission was to Canada West, on which he left April 6, 1836. While absent he baptized many persons and raised up several branches of the Church.

On July 4th he married Sarah M. Bates, whom he had baptized in Sackett's Harbor, N. Y., June 18, 1835. In the fall, having returned to Kirtland, he studied algebra, and after providing a home for his wife, went to the State of New York and labored in the ministry during the winter of 1837-38. In April, 1839, the Saints having been driven from Far West, he went there to fulfill a revelation, and with several of the Twelve, met at the corner stone of the Temple, whence they parted to preach the gospel to foreign nations. On July 4th he was the means of delivering his brother Parley from prison in Columbia, Missouri.

In the fall he preached through the Eastern churches, and in the spring of 1840 embarked for England, preached nine months in Edinburgh, Scotland, raised up a branch of over 200 persons, and in the spring of 1841 returned to America. He went to Nauvoo, where he took charge of a mathematical school, then took a mission through the Eastern States in the summer of 1843, and on his return in the fall was elected a member of the city council, helped to draw up a memorial to Congress and went to Washington to present it in the spring of 1844. He labored among the churches east until the news of the martyrdom of the Prophet was received, when he returned to Nauvoo.

During the difficulties that succeeded the death of the Prophet and Patriarch, he labored with the Twelve, which was the presiding quorum of the Church, in the management of its affairs, shared in the expulsion from Nauvoo, crossed the plains with the Pioneers in 1847, and on the way, when weather would permit, took astronomical and other scientific observations, determining, by the aid of the sextant and circle of reflection, the latitude and longitude of the most prominent places, the changes in elevation above sea level, etc., in anticipation of the great highway which even then it was expected by the Saints would span this vast continent. He was the first to enter Salt Lake Valley, having preceded the main body of the company three days.

In 1848 he was appointed president over all the branches of the Church in England, Scotland, Wales, Ireland and adjacent countries, starting from Winter Quarters on the 11th of May. The number of Church members in Great Britain then was about eight thousand, which during his presidency of two years was increased to about thirty-one thousand. In this short period he chartered and fitted out about twenty ships loaded with Saints for Utah. In the midst of this press of business, he wrote some fifteen pamphlets, and published and circulated several hundred thousand of them in different languages. At the same time he edited the Millennial Star, and increased its circulation from less than four thousand to nearly twenty-three thousand. He lectured, at different times, to large audiences in the principal cities of England and Scotland.

In 1850 he returned to Great Salt Lake Valley, and in the winter of 1851 delivered a series of twelve astronomical lectures to crowded audiences in the old Tabernacle, which were published in the Deseret News. He was elected a member of the Legislative Assembly during its first session, and at each successive session when he was in the Territory, and seven times was chosen speaker of the House.

In 1852 he was appointed on a mission to Washington, to take the presidential charge of all the churches in the United States and British Provinces east of the Rocky Mountains, and there published The Seer. In the spring and summer of 1853 he again went on a mission to Europe, returning the following year. On April 22, 1856, he again started for England and presided over the European Mission, publishing more pamphlets, and returned by way of California, while the army was en route to Utah, arriving home in January, 1858. On September 23, 1860, he was called on a mission to the United States, being gone about one year. On April 24, 1864, he was set apart for a mission to Austria. He went to that land in 1865, accompanied by Elder W. W. Riter, but in consequence of the stringent laws was unable to open the door of the Kingdom to that nation. He bore his testimony to the authorities and left, going over to England, where he visited the conferences and labored assiduously, returning August 4, 1867. In 1869 he went to New York City and transcribed and published the Book of Mormon in phonetic characters called the Deseret Alphabet.

On August, 1870, he held the famous three days' discussion with Dr. J. P. Newman on the subject of polygamy, totally routing that debater, for which he never forgave the "Mormons."

At the adjourned General Conference in 1874, he was appointed and sustained Historian and General Church Recorder, which position he retained till his decease.

On July 18, 1876, he once more left his home to cross the ocean, this time to transcribe and publish an edition of the Book of Mormon in the Pitman phonetic characters. He was, however, soon called home and returned September 27th. On the 3rd of September, 1878, he started east with Apostle Joseph F. Smith, visiting the Whitmers in Missouri, the Hill Cumorah and other places figuring in the history of the Church, and returned on the 3rd of October. On December 3rd, of the same year, he started again for England to stereotype the Book of Mormon and Doctrine and Covenants, which he arranged in verses, with foot notes and references. From this important and laborious mission he returned September 2, 1879. After his arrival home he attended a number of Stake conferences, and was again elected a member of the legislature, acting in his usual capacity of speaker of the House. After this his health was poor, and finally he finished his long and useful career, on October 3, 1881, when he died at his residence in Salt Lake City. For a little over a year he had suffered severely from diabetes, and was much of the time unable to leave his room. On Sunday, September 18, 1881, he delivered his last public address in a clear and forcible manner, speaking to a large congregation in the Tabernacle about twenty minutes.

Orson Pratt was the last of the original council of the Twelve Apostles of the Church. He crossed the Atlantic Ocean sixteen times on missions of salvation. He found time to study the higher mathematics, and in addition to his published scientific books left an elaborate work in manuscript on the Differential Calculus, containing original principles. He was the father of sixteen sons and sixteen daughters, and had forty-three grandchildren.

Following is a list of some of the works which he has published: Divine Authority; Kingdom of God, in four parts; Remarkable Visions; Divine Authenticity of the Book of Mormon, in six parts; Reply to "Remarks on Mormonism;" Great First Cause; New Jerusalem; Absurdities of Immaterialism; The Seer, in eighteen numbers; Eight Tracts on the First Principles of the Gospel; Cubic and Biquadratic Equations; Key to the Universe, or a New Theory of its Mechanism, etc., etc.

By way of finishing his obituary, the editor of the Deseret News wrote at the time of his death:

"Orson Pratt was truly an Apostle of the Lord. Full of integrity, firm as a rock to his convictions, true to his brethren and to his God, earnest and zealous in defense and proclamation of the truth, ever ready to bear testimony to the latter-day work, he had a mind stored with scripture, ancient and modern, was an eloquent speaker, a powerful minister, a logical and convincing writer, an honest man and a great soul who reached out after eternal things, grasped them with the gift of inspiration, and brought them down to the level and comprehension of the common mind. Thousands have been brought into the Church through his preaching in many lands, thousands more by his writings. He set but little store on the wealth of this world, but he has laid up treasures in heaven which will make him eternally rich."

JOHN F. BOYNTON,

A member of the first quorum of Twelve Apostles, was born September 20, 1811, in Bradford, Essex County, Mass., baptized in September, 1832, by Joseph Smith, in Kirtland, Ohio, and ordained an Elder by Sidney Rigdon. He performed a mission, together with Zebedee Coltrin, to Pennsylvania in 1832 and another one to Maine in 1833 and 1834. On February 15, 1835, he was ordained an Apostle in Kirtland, Ohio, after which he accompanied the Twelve on their mission to the Eastern States and Canada. He was married to Susan Lowell by Joseph Smith, January 20, 1836. During his last mission he borrowed all the money he could among the brethren, with which he entered into the mercantile business with Lyman E. Johnson, and followed it until he apostatized and was disfellowshipped from the quorum of Apostles September 3, 1837, in Kirtland, Ohio. On the following Sunday he made confession and was forgiven, but as he did not repent of his evils, he was finally cut off from the Church.

About Boynton's subsequent life Ariot H. Hale, of Grantsville, writes: "Since the Nauvoo days Boynton has resided in Syracuse, N. Y., where he still lives. He has always been considerate to his former friends and colaborers in the ministry, and never said or did anything against the Church. When he visited Utah in 1872, he called on President Brigham Young twice, in my company. The President was then a prisoner in his own house, guarded by U. S. marshals, and Boynton denounced in strong terms the persecutions then being carried on against the Saints. He also met Erastus Snow who, when only sixteen years of age, was ordained a Teacher by Boynton. Brother Snow told him that he had been preaching the same gospel ever since. Boynton remarked, 'Stick to it, for it is good.' He also called on Orson Pratt and others, with whom he was very friendly, and they all called him Brother John."

Since leaving the Church Boynton has never joined himself to any other denomination and does not believe in any religion whatever. He says, however, that if anything is right "Mormonism" is. For twenty years he traveled throughout the United States lecturing on natural history, geology and other sciences. In 1853 or 1854 he was appointed by the government to make a trip to California on a geological surveying expedition, and during the war of the rebellion he was employed in the invention of torpedoes and other destructive implements of war. He has his name in the national patent office for thirty-six patents on different inventions. During the last eight or ten years he has been gathering the genealogy of the Boynton family, and is in this respect doing a great deal of good. He has been married thrice. His first wife died, the second left him, and he is now living with his third wife.

LYMAN E. JOHNSON,

A member of the first quorum of Twelve Apostles, was born in Pomfret, Windsor County, Vermont, Oct. 24, 1811. He was baptized in Feb., 1831, by Sidney Rigdon, ordained an Elder and subsequently a High Priest by Joseph Smith, called to the ministry in Nov., 1831 by revelation, and performed missionary labor in Ohio, the Eastern States and Nova Scotia. In 1834 he went to Missouri as a member of Zion's Camp, and was ordained an Apostle Feb. 14, 1835, in Kirtland, Ohio, after which he performed a mission to the Eastern States. He studied the Hebrew language in the winter of 1835-36, and after returning from another mission to the East in the fall of 1836 he entered into merchandising and soon after apostatized. At a conference held in Kirtland, Sept. 3, 1837, he was disfellowshipped, but made confession and was restored to his former standing a few days later. His repentance, however, was not genuine, and on April 13, 1838, he was excommunicated from the Church in Far West, Caldwell County, Mo. Until his death he remained friendly to his former associates, making frequent visits to Nauvoo, after the Saints had located there. He relinquished his business of merchandising and commenced to practice law, locating himself in Davenport, Iowa. A few years later he removed to Keokuk, Iowa, where he continued his practice, and was finally drowned in the Mississippi River at Prairie du Chien, Wis., Dec. 20, 1856.

THE CROOKED RIVER BATTLE.

Late in the evening of October 24, 1838, news reached Far West, Caldwell County, Mo., that the Rev. Samuel Bogart with a mob of about seventy-five men were committing depredations on Log Creek, destroying property and taking prisoners. On hearing the report, Elias Higbee, the first judge of the county, ordered Lieutenant-Colonel George M. Hinkle, the highest officer in command in Far West, to raise a force to disperse the mob and retake their prisoners, whom, it was reported, they intended to murder that night. The trumpet sounded, and the brethren assembled on the public square about midnight. Captain David W. Patten, Parley P. Pratt and Charles C. Rich, with about forty others, volunteered, which number the judge thought sufficient, but upon the suggestion of Brother Rich, who believed a battle was inevitable, more men were raised by him in the small settlements on Goose and Log creeks, which increased the force to about seventy-five men when they all met together about six miles from Far West. The company was divided into small companies of ten, and then proceeded by the main road, four miles, to a point near Crooked River.

About this midnight march Parley P. Pratt writes: "The company was soon under way, having to ride through extensive prairies, a distance of some twelve miles. The night was dark, the distant plains far and wide were illuminated by blazing fires, immense columns of smoke were seen rising in awful majesty, as if the world was on fire. This scene of grandeur can only be comprehended by those acquainted with scenes of prairie burning, as the fire sweeps over millions of acres of dry grass in the fall season, and leaves a smooth surface divested of all vegetation. The thousand meteors, blazing in the distance like the camp fires of some war host, threw a fitful gleam of light upon the distant sky, which many might have mistaken for the Aurora Borealis. This scene added to the silence of the midnight, the rumbling sound of the tramping steeds over the hard and dried surface of the plain, the clanking of swords in their scabbards, the occasional gleam of bright armor in the flickering firelight, the gloom of surrounding darkness, and the unknown destiny of the expedition, or even of the people who sent it forth—all combined to impress the mind with deep and solemn thought, and to throw a romantic vision over the imagination, which is not often experienced, except in the poet's dreams, or in the wild imagery of sleeping fancy. In this solemn procession we moved on for some two hours, when it was supposed we were in the neighborhood of danger."

The company dismounted and tied the horses to Randolph McDonald's fence, and, leaving a few men to guard them, the remainder proceeded further on foot. Captain Patten divided the party into three companies, taking command of the first himself, and put Charles C. Rich in charge of the second and James Durfee of the third. Apprehending that the mob was encamped at a Mr. Field's house, Capt. Patten took his men and went around to the right of the field, Durfee through the field and Rich round to the left. Rich arrived at the house about five minutes before the other companies, which gave him a little time to reconnoitre the premises. Capt. Patten made a short speech, exhorting the brethren to trust on the Lord for victory, then ordered a march to the ford, along the road.

It was just at the dawning of light in the East, and when near the top of the hill which descends to Crooked River, the words "who comes there" were heard and at the same instant the report of a gun. Young Patrick O'Banion reeled out of the ranks and fell mortally wounded, whereupon Capt. Patten ordered a charge and rushed down the hill. At a short distance the camp fires of the enemy could now be seen, but it was still so dark that little could be seen by looking to the west, while the mob looking towards the dawning light could see Patten and his men quite distinctly. When within about fifty yards of the camp, the brethren formed a line, with Capt. Patten's company at the right, which brought Bro. Rich's company in the road. Patten's company was partly shielded by a clump of trees, and Durfee's by a thicket of hazel brush.

The mob formed under the bank of the creek, below their tents, and fired all their guns upon the brethren. By this volley James Hendricks and Bro. Hodges, of Rich's company, and others were wounded. Capt. Patten ordered the company to fire, which was obeyed immediately and the whole wilderness seemed for a few moments one continued echo of the reports of the deadly rifle. The watch word "God and Liberty" was then given, and Capt. Patten ordered a charge, which was instantly obeyed. The parties immediately came in contact with their swords, and the mob was soon put to flight, crossing the river at the ford and such other places, where they could get over. In the pursuit one of the mob wheeled around from behind a tree and shot Capt. Patten, who instantly fell mortally wounded, having received a large ball in the bowels. He wore a white blanket coat, which made him a conspicuous mark.

The mob left all their animals and camp equipage and dispersed in nearly all directions, and were so completely routed that almost every one of them reported that Bogart's whole company was destroyed, and he alone was left to tell the tale. When the truth became known, however, only one of the mobbers seemed to have been killed, while a number were wounded.

The battle ground was soon cleared, and the brethren gathered up a wagon or two, and making beds therein of tents, blankets, etc., took their wounded and retreated slowly towards Far West. Brother Gideon Carter was shot in the head and left dead on the ground, so defaced that his comrades did not know him, but as soon as it was discovered who he was, his body was brought away and buried. Three brethren, including Patten, were wounded in the bowels, one in the neck, one in the shoulder, one through the hips, one through both thighs and one in the arm, all by musket balls.

When the returning posse came within five miles of Far West, it was met by a surgeon and several brethren from the city. Capt. Patten, who had suffered intense pains during the transportation from the battle ground, was carried into the house of Stephen Winchester, where he died the following night. About the same time young Patrick O'Banion died. They were buried together under military honors at Far West, on the 27th. The others, who were wounded, all recovered, but Hendricks remained a cripple during his whole natural life.

The prisoners (Nathan Pinkham, Wm. Seeley and Addison Green), who had been kidnapped from their home by Bogart's company the day previous, broke away from their enemies at the commencement of the engagement. Pinkham and Green escaped unhurt, but Seeley was severely wounded in attempting to run over to the lines of his brethren.

After the arrival of the posse in Far West, the spoils of the enemy were delivered to the colonel of the regiment, who afterwards delivered them to the higher civil or military authorities of the State.

THE TWELVE APOSTLES.

JOHN E. PAGE,

A member of the quorum of Twelve Apostles, was born in Trenton Township, Oneida County, New York, February 25, 1799, baptized by Emer Harris (brother to Martin Harris) August 18, 1833, in Ohio, ordained an Elder by Nelson Higgins in September, 1833, and moved to Kirtland in the fall of 1835. In May, 1836, he was called to go on a mission to Canada, to which he objected for the reason that he was destitute of clothing. The Prophet Joseph took off his coat and gave it to him, telling him to go, and the Lord would bless him. He started May 31, 1836, for Leeds County, Canada West, and returned after seven months' and twenty days' absence. On February 16, 1837, he again left Kirtland, taking with him his family, consisting of wife and two children, and continued his mission in Canada. During his two years' labor there he baptized upwards of six hundred persons, and traveled more than five thousand miles, principally on foot. In May, 1838, he started for Missouri with a company of Saints, occupying thirty wagons, and arrived at De Witt, Carroll County, Mo., in the beginning of October, while that place was being attacked by a ruthless mob, which a few days later succeeded in driving all the Saints away. The exiles, including Page and his company, sought protection in Far West, Caldwell County, where they shared in all the grievous persecutions, which the Saints there had to endure. Page buried his wife and two children, who died as martyrs for their religion, through extreme suffering, for the want of the common comforts of life.

Having been called by revelation to the Apostleship, Page was ordained one of the Twelve Apostles Dec. 19, 1838, at Far West, under the hands of Brigham Young and Heber C. Kimball. He filled the vacancy caused by the apostasy of Luke S. Johnson. Early in 1839 he started with his family for Illinois, but on the way he met President Brigham Young and others of the Twelve who persuaded Page to return to Far West to attend the secret conference held in the morning of April 26, 1839. Soon after he located below Warsaw, Hancock County, Ill., and neglected to go to England with his brethren of the Twelve, according to the word of the Lord. In April, 1840, he was appointed by a general conference at Nauvoo to accompany Orson Hyde on a mission to Jerusalem, and although he started on this mission, he never left the shores of America. He traveled through Indiana and Ohio, and spent the winter of 1840-41 preaching occasionally in Cincinnati and vicinity. In June, 1841, he arrived in Philadelphia, where George A. Smith on his return from England met him, and knowing the Saints were willing to raise ample means to carry Elder Page on his journey, Elder Smith urged him to proceed on his mission to Jerusalem, but he did not go. Soon after he became involved in difficulty with the branch in Philadelphia, and in the fall President Hyrum Smith wrote to him to come home.

He did not return to Nauvoo until the spring of 1842; on his way he delivered several discourses at Pittsburgh, and formulated a petition which was signed by the Saints and others, to President Joseph Smith, praying that he might be sent to Pittsburgh.

At the conference held at Nauvoo in April, 1843, he was sent to Pittsburgh, where he organized a branch of the Church composed of those baptized by himself and other Elders, and some who emigrated thither. In organizing this branch he drew up a constitution, requiring their president to be elected every four months. At the first election he was chosen president; at the second election Elder Small was chosen president, having received the most votes. Page moved his family to Pittsburgh, where he continued to preach.

During the summer of 1843, the quorum of the Twelve went eastward from Nauvoo on a mission. Elder Heber C. Kimball, Orson Pratt and John E. Page met at Cincinnati and there reorganized the branch. Elders Kimball and Pratt proceeded on their mission, and as soon as they were gone, Elder Page called the members of the branch together and annulled the organization, re-establishing the old one. A few days later Brigham Young, Wilford Woodruff and George A. Smith visited Cincinnati, and disapproved of Elder Page's proceedings, for the reason, that it was not right for one of the Twelve to undo what three had done.

Elder Page, in company with his brethren of the Twelve, went to Philadelphia, New Jersey, New York and Boston; in the latter city he remained for some time. President Joseph Smith, disapproving of his course in Boston, directed him to proceed to Washington and build up a branch there. He went to Washington, remained a short time, and baptized several, then returned to Pittsburgh.

Soon after President Smith's death, an advertisement appeared in the Beaver (Penn.) Argus, that Elder John E. Page was out of employment and would preach for anybody that would sustain his family.

In a council of the Twelve held in Nauvoo Feb. 9, 1846, Page was disfellowshipped from that quorum, after which he became very bitter against his former associates and advised the Saints to accept the apostate James J. Strang as their leader. He soon afterwards left Nauvoo, and after traveling about one hundred and twenty miles he met a company of Saints coming from Canada. He told them that he was one of the Twelve sent by council to inform them that they must turn about and go to Voree, Wisconsin, Mr. Strang's place of gathering. He deceived some, but most of the Saints would not believe him and sent a messenger to Nauvoo to find out the truth of the matter. On June 26, 1846, Page was excommunicated from the Church, and he soon afterwards dwindled into obscurity, on account of which we have been utterly unable to obtain the exact date or place of his death.

JOHN TAYLOR,

A member of the quorum of Twelve Apostles from 1838 to 1880, and since then President of the whole Church, is a son of James and Agnes Taylor, and was born at Milnthorpe, Westmoreland County, England, November 1, 1808. His parents owned a small estate at the village of Hale, in that county. They were members of the Church of England, and he was brought up in the doctrines of that church until he was fifteen years old. He then joined the Methodists, and was soon after appointed a local preacher, and continued as such until he left England about the year 1828 or 1829. His father's family had left about two years previously and gone to the neighborhood of the city of Toronto, Upper Canada. After a short residence in New York, Brooklyn and Albany, he visited his parents in Canada, and took up his residence at Toronto. At that city he married Miss Leonora Cannon, daughter of Captain Cannon, of the Isle of Man, who was a member of the Methodist society to which John Taylor had attached himself on his arrival at Toronto. Here he united with a few sincere and well educated gentlemen in the search of the Scriptures, some of whom belonged to the Methodist society. In the course of their researches they became convinced of many important truths, such as the gathering of Israel, the restoration of the ten tribes, and the personal reign of Jesus on the earth. They also believed in the necessity of revelation; of men being called of God to preach as they were formerly; of the gifts of prophesy, tongues, healings and other gifts of the Holy Ghost. They came to the conclusion that the churches of the day had departed from the order of God, and were consequently corrupt and fallen, and that if the Bible was true, the religions of the day were false. With these convictions they fasted and prayed much, that if God had a Church on the earth, he would send a messenger unto them. John Taylor heard, investigated and rejected Irvingism, and shortly after was waited upon by Elder Parley P. Pratt, with a letter of introduction from a merchant of their mutual acquaintance. Having heard many of the stories current about the Book of Mormon and Joseph Smith, he received Elder Pratt cautiously. After a rigid scrutiny, however, he and several of his friends believed the doctrines laid before them, and were baptized. Taylor was ordained an Elder by Elder Pratt, and was shortly afterwards set apart, by Elders Pratt and Hyde, as presiding Elder in Upper Canada. During a visit of Joseph Smith, Sidney Rigdon, and Thomas B. Marsh, the latter then being president of the quorum of the Twelve, to Toronto in 1837, Elder Taylor was ordained a High Priest under their hands. He paid several visits to the Temple at Kirtland, and was Joseph Smith's guest while there. After the great apostasy at Kirtland, in 1837-38, he was designated by revelation for the Apostleship. By request of the Prophet he removed to Kirtland, and from thence to Missouri, and on his way to the latter place preached the gospel and organized a branch of the Church near Indianapolis, Indiana. On arriving in Missouri, he and his party, numbering about twenty-four, encountered a part of the mob, numbering about one hundred and fifty, led by Abbott Hancock, a Baptist minister, and Sashiel Woods, a Presbyterian minister. He reached Far West, and at a quarterly conference, held there on Oct. 5, 1838, it was voted that he fill the vacancy in the quorum of the Twelve, occasioned by the apostasy of Elder John F. Boynton, having previously been called by direct revelation to that position. The High Council of Zion voted the same on December 19th, following, when he was ordained to the Apostleship by Brigham Young and Heber C. Kimball.

While in Missouri Elder Taylor suffered in the persecution of the Saints, and witnessed the mobbings in Caldwell and Daviess counties, at Adam-ondi-Ahman and Far West. He was one of a small company of men selected to go and protect Adam-ondi-Ahman from a portion of the mob, which numbered some thousands, and who, notwithstanding their overwhelming numbers, retreated before the little army of the Saints. During the imprisonment of Joseph and Hyrum and other brethren at Liberty Jail he paid them several visits. Before leaving Missouri for Illinois, with the body of the Saints, he was appointed, by those of Caldwell County, one of a committee to draft and sign a memorial to the legislature of the State, setting forth the most prominent features of the persecution, and praying for redress. He was also appointed, in connection with Bishop Edward Partridge, by the High Council of Zion, to draft a petition to the General Government.

Soon after Elder Taylor's arrival in Quincy he returned to Far West, in company with a number of the Twelve and other Elders. They went to fulfil a revelation given July 8, 1838, requiring the Twelve to take farewell of the Saints, on the 26th of April, following, on the building spot of the Lord's House in Far West, and go from thence over the "Great Waters" to promulgate the gospel. The mob loudly boasted that this revelation could not be fulfilled, as no "Mormon" was then permitted to be in the State. It was, however, fulfilled. The brethren arrived at the spot early in the morning of the day appointed, soon after midnight, and held a conference, at which a number of persons were disfellowshipped from the Church; the foundation of the Temple was recommenced to be laid; Wilford Woodruff and Geo. A. Smith were ordained to the Apostleship, and Darwin Chase and Norman Shearer to the office of Seventies. This done, the Twelve offered up prayer respectively, took leave of the Saints present, and departed immediately.

Elder Taylor started from Commerce, Illinois, for England Aug. 8, 1839, leaving his family in a soldiers' barracks, at Montrose, Iowa. On his journey he was sick for eleven weeks; the rest of the Twelve were also sick, which, indeed, was the case at that time with most of the Saints who had suffered so much in Missouri.

On January 11, 1840, he arrived in England, and immediately began to preach and baptize in Liverpool and other places. He was the first who reared the standard of the gospel in Ireland and the Isle of Man. His labors also extended into Scotland. While in that country he corrected the proof sheets of the Book of Mormon, and with President Brigham Young and Elder Parley P. Pratt arranged the first edition of a hymn book for the Saints in the British Isles. He also wrote several tracts in reply to false charges against the Church, and returned to Nauvoo July 1, 1841, where he found his wife at the point of death. He called in twenty Elders, who prayed for her, and she recovered. At a conference in Nauvoo, in October, 1841, he was appointed, with Elias Higbee and Elias Smith, a committee to petition Congress for redress of wrongs and injuries received in Missouri. He was appointed also to present the petition. By appointment of Joseph Smith, he edited the last three volumes of the Times and Seasons and he also edited and published the Nauvoo Neighbor. In Nauvoo he was a member of the city council, one of the regents of the Nauvoo University, and judge advocate of the Legion. Under all circumstances he was firmly attached to the Prophet Joseph, and attended him in many scenes of persecution and trial, and finally at his place of assassination. In attempting to leap out of the window of the jail on June 27, 1844, when the mob were firing into the chamber in which he had been sitting with Joseph and Hyrum, he was wounded with four bullets, and would, in all probability, have been killed by a fifth but for his watch in the left pocket of his waistcoat, which prevented the ball from entering his vitals. In his wounded condition he was carried by Dr. Willard Richards into the inner prison, and secreted from the mob.

At the expulsion of the Saints from Nauvoo Elder Taylor left with others of the Twelve, and proceeded to Winter Quarters. He assisted in organizing the Mormon Battalion for the Mexican war. Just about this period, at a particular juncture in the history of the Church in the British Isles, he was deputed, with Elders Orson Hyde and Parley P. Pratt, to go to England, where he again landed Oct. 3, 1846, having left his family in the wilderness in tents and wagons. He returned in the following spring, and went to Great Salt Lake Valley with Elder Parley P. Pratt, in the first companies, where he remained two years. On the 12th of March, 1849, he was elected one of the associate judges under the provisional State of Deseret, and in the following October, agreeable to appointment by a general conference, he left Great Salt Lake City, with Elders Curtis E. Bolton and John Pack, on a mission to France, passing through England on his way. During this mission the Book of Mormon was translated, under his direction, into French, and was published by him at Paris. He also edited and published a monthly paper called L' Etoile du Deseret. Several branches of the Church were organized during his mission in France. Prior to finally quitting the Continent he went to Hamburg, and introduced the gospel, where, under his direction, the Book of Mormon was translated into German, and published in that city. A periodical, Zion's Panier, was also commenced there by him to advocate the faith of the Saints.

On his first appearance at Boulogne sur mer, France, he was challenged to discussion by several clergymen which he accepted, and a report of the proceedings was published in pamphlet form at Liverpool. Another work, The Government of God, written while on this mission, was published after his return home. He arrived in Great Salt Lake Valley again on the 20th of August, 1852, and was elected in 1854, a member of the council of the legislature, which office he resigned to come to New York on a mission, without purse or scrip, to preside over the Saints in the Eastern States, superintend emigration, and publish a paper, the first number of which, under the significant title of The Mormon, appeared Feb. 17, 1855. This paper was continued under his management until 1857, when he was recalled to Utah, and on account of the threatened "Buchanan war" the paper was soon discontinued. In the meantime he had also labored incessantly to get the inchoate State of Deseret admitted into the Union.

For many years afterwards he traveled and preached extensively throughout the Territory of Utah and performed much literary work for the Church. He also served as probate judge of Utah County, and was for many terms a member of the Utah Legislature, and speaker of the House.

At the death of President Brigham Young in 1877, he, by virtue of his position as president of the quorum of the Twelve Apostles, became the highest official in the Church, at the head of his quorum, and when the First Presidency was reorganized in October, 1880, he was unanimously chosen as President of the Church, with Geo. Q. Cannon and Joseph F. Smith as his counselors. This high and holy position he has filled since with becoming dignity and marked ability, possessing the love and confidence of the Saints generally, and showing by his zeal and unselfishness that his heart is in the Kingdom of God, and his highest ambition to perform the duties of his office strictly according to the will of heaven. Forced into exile, on account of the wicked and unhallowed persecutions now raging against the Saints, he is still dictating the affairs of the Church as if he was in his place of general business, and the instructive epistles of the First Presidency, which at a few of the later general conferences have been read and afterwards published, portray in the most unmistakable manner the sentiments dwelling in the hearts of those who dictated them.

Notwithstanding his age, President Taylor's mind is yet bright and active, and his physical organization of such a nature that he, under ordinary circumstances, may yet live quite a number of years.

KIRTLAND.

Kirtland is the name of a township and village in Lake (formerly Geauga) County, Ohio. The village known as Kirtland is pleasantly located on the east fork of the Chagrin River, about three miles southeast of Willoughby, the nearest railroad station, some twenty miles from the center of Cleveland, and nearly six miles in a straight line from the shore of Lake Erie.

In 1830 Kirtland and neighborhood was the home of Edward Partridge, Frederick G. Williams, Newel K. Whitney, Isaac Morley and others, who subsequently became prominent in the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. Sidney Rigdon lived a few miles north, in the neighboring township called Mentor. In the village of Kirtland proper a number of Reformed Baptists, subsequently known as Campbellites, lived together in a kind of "united order" and had many of their temporal affairs in common, when Parley P. Pratt, Oliver Cowdery, Richard Ziba Peterson and Peter Whitmer visited them in the fall of 1830. These brethren were on a journey from the State of New York to fill a mission to the Lamanites on the western boundary of the State of Missouri. Parley P. Pratt, who formerly had been a prominent member and preacher among the Reformed Baptists, called on his old friend and instructor Sidney Rigdon, one of the founders of the sect, and presented him with a copy of the Book of Mormon. After perusing it carefully, he became convinced of its truth and was baptized by Elder Pratt, together with many others of his church. Some two or three weeks after the arrival of the missionaries from New York, one hundred and twenty-seven souls had been baptized in Kirtland and vicinity and this number soon increased to one thousand.

After ordaining Sidney Rigdon and many others to the Priesthood, and after having organized the newly baptized members into a branch of the Church, Elder Pratt and companions continued their journey westward, while Sidney Rigdon and Edward Partridge started on a trip to the State of New York to visit the Prophet Joseph. They arrived at his home in Fayette in December, and when they returned in January, 1831, Joseph Smith and wife accompanied them to Kirtland, where they arrived in the beginning of February. The Prophet was kindly received by Newel K. Whitney and family, with whom he resided for several weeks.

Early in the spring the Saints from the State of New York began to gather to Kirtland, where preparations were subsequently made for the building of a city, as a Stake of Zion. In the meantime the Lord, by revelation through the Prophet Joseph, made known to his Saints that Jackson County, Missouri, was the place where the Center Place of Zion should be established and the New Jerusalem built. And when that country was dedicated for the gathering of the Saints, who immediately commenced to emigrate thither, Kirtland became for some time a place of only secondary importance. The removal of the Prophet Joseph from Kirtland to Hiram also had a tendency to detract from the importance of the former place, and it was not until after the exodus of the Saints from Jackson County, in 1833, that Kirtland rose to that prominence, which has made it so famous in the history of the Church.

After the Prophet's return from his second visit to Missouri, in the summer of 1832, he again located in Kirtland, where he spent most of the following winter translating the Bible. A school called the School of the Prophets was organized, and many important and instructive meetings were held, in which the Saints were favored with great and glorious manifestations of the power of God. The gift of tongues was enjoyed by many of the Elders in a great measure, and the ordinance of the washing of feet, according to the practice recorded in the 13th chapter of St. John, was attended to by the Elders. The Lord also continued to give revelations through his chosen Prophet, and in compliance with these the various quorums of the Priesthood were more perfectly organized and set in order. Thus the First Presidency of the Church was first organized in Kirtland on March 18, 1833, the first High Council Feb. 17, 1834, the quorum of Twelve Apostles Feb. 14, 1835, and the first quorum of Seventies shortly after. The second and third quorum of Seventies were also organized in Kirtland in 1836 and 1837. On the occasion when the First Presidency was organized many of the High Priests present had heavenly visions and saw many glorious things. Some of them even saw the Savior and concourses of angels.

In a council held March 23, 1833, a committee was appointed to purchase land in Kirtland, upon which to build a Stake of Zion. Several large farms were subsequently bought; among these the so-called French farm, on which there was a stone quarry and excellent facilities for brick-making. A city plat was surveyed and the Saints gathered in from the surrounding States, until the Kirtland branch numbered about fifteen hundred souls. Preparations were also made for erecting a House of the Lord. (See under Kirtland Temple.) On July 4, 1833, a revelation was given, showing the order of the city and assigning certain duties to various individuals in the Church.

On December 18, 1833, a printing office was established in Kirtland, and the publication of the Evening and Morning Star, which formerly had been published in Jackson County, Missouri, was recommenced. The following year it changed name to the Latter-day Saints' Messenger and Advocate, and in 1837 to the Elders' Journal. When two numbers of the latter had been published, the printing office was burned, through the acts of an incendiary.

In May, 1834, Kirtland was the rendezvous for the brethren who assembled from the eastern branches and went up to Missouri in Zion's Camp, under the direction of Joseph, the Prophet.

During the winter of 1835-1836 a Hebrew school was established in Kirtland, which was largely attended by many of the Elders, including the Prophet himself. Joshua Seixas, a Hebrew scholar from Hudson, Ohio, was engaged as teacher.

In January, 1836, a series of important meetings, attended by the leading authorities of the Church, were held in Kirtland, at which the ordinances of washing, anointing with holy oil, etc., were attended to. The presidents of the various quorums were first anointed, after which they in turn anointed the members of their respective quorums. About one of these meetings, held January 21, 1836, the Prophet Joseph writes:

"The heavens were opened unto us, and I beheld the celestial kingdom of God, and the glory thereof, whether in the body or out I cannot tell. I saw the transcendant beauty of the gate through which the heirs of that kingdom will enter, which was like unto circling flames of fire; also the blazing throne of God, whereupon was seated the Father and the Son. I saw the beautiful streets of that kingdom, which had the appearance of being paved with gold. I saw Fathers Adam and Abraham, and my father and mother, my brother Alvin, that has long since slept, and marveled how it was that he had obtained an inheritance in that kingdom, seeing that he had departed this life before the Lord had set His hand to gather Israel the second time, and had not been baptized for the remission of sins.

"Thus came the voice of the Lord unto me, saying:

" 'All who have died without a knowledge of this gospel, who would have received it if they had been permitted to tarry, shall be heirs of the celestial kingdom of God; also all that shall die henceforth without a knowledge of it, who would have received it with all their hearts, shall be heirs of that kingdom; for I, the Lord, will judge all men according to their works, according to the desire of their hearts.'

"And I also beheld that all children who die before they arrive at the years of accountability are saved in the celestial kingdom of heaven. I saw the Twelve Apostles of the Lamb, who are now upon the earth, who hold the keys of this last ministry in foreign lands, standing together in a circle, much fatigued, with their clothes tattered and feet swollen, with their eyes cast downward, and Jesus standing in their midst, and they did not behold him. The Savior looked upon them and wept.

"I also beheld Elder McLellin in the South, standing upon a hill, surrounded by a vast multitude, preaching to them, and a lame man standing before him supported by his crutches; he threw them down at his word, and leaped as an hart, by the mighty power of God. Also Elder Brigham Young standing in a strange land, in the far South and West, in a desert place, upon a rock in the midst of about a dozen men of color, who appeared hostile. He was preaching to them in their own tongue, and the angel of God standing above his head, with a drawn sword in his hand protecting him, but he did not see it. And I finally saw the Twelve in the celestial kingdom of God. I also beheld the redemption of Zion, and many things which the tongue of man cannot describe in full.

"Many of my brethren who received the ordinance with me saw glorious visions also. Angels ministered unto them as well as myself, and the power of the Highest rested upon us; the house was filled with the glory of God, and we shouted hosanna to God and the Lamb. My scribe also received his anointing with us, and saw in a vision the armies of heaven protecting the Saints in their return to Zion, and many things which I saw.

"The Bishop of Kirtland with his counselors, and the Bishop of Zion with his counselors, were present with us, and received their anointings under the hands of Father Smith, and were confirmed by the Presidency, and the glories of heaven were unfolded for them also.

"We then invited the counselors of Kirtland and Zion into our room, and President Hyrum Smith anointed the head of the president and of the counselors in Kirtland, and President David Whitmer the head of the president and of the counselors of Zion.

"The president of each quorum then anointed the heads of his colleagues, each in his turn, beginning at the oldest.

"The visions of heaven were opened to them also. Some of them saw the face of the Savior, and others were ministered unto by holy angels, and the spirit of prophecy and revelation was poured out in mighty power; and loud hosannas, and glory to God in the highest, saluted the heavens, for we all communed with the heavenly host. And I saw, in my vision, all of the presidency in the celestial kingdom of God, and many others that were present. Our meeting was opened by singing, and prayer offered up by the head of each quorum; and closed by singing and invoking the benediction of heaven, with uplifted hands; and retired between one and two o'clock in the morning."

At another meeting held one day later (January 22nd) the heavens were again opened and angels administered to a number of the brethren. While the Twelve were anointing and blessing the presidency of the Seventy, the heavens were opened to Elder Sylvester Smith, who, full of joy and enthusiasm, leaped up, exclaiming, "The horsemen of Israel and the chariots thereof." After President Sidney Rigdon had closed the meeting with prayer, the congregation shouted a long hosanna, and "the gift of tongues," writes Joseph Smith, "fell upon us in mighty power; angels mingled their voices with ours, while their presence was in our midst, and unceasing praises swelled our bosoms for the space of half an hour."

In a meeting of the Twelve Apostles and Seventy, held January 28th, "Sylvester Smith saw a pillar of fire rest down and abide upon the heads of the quorum," and "Elder Roger Orton saw a mighty angel riding upon a horse of fire, with a flaming sword in his hand, followed by five others, encircle the house, and protect the Saints, even the Lord's anointed, from the power of Satan and a host of evil spirits, which were striving to disturb the Saints. President William Smith, one of the Twelve, saw the heavens opened, and the Lord's host protecting the Lord's anointed. President Zebedee Coltrin, one of the seven presidents of the Seventy, saw the Savior extended before him, as upon the cross, and, a little after, crowned, with glory upon his head, above the brightness of the sun."

In a meeting of the Seventy held February 6, 1836, William Smith saw a vision of the Twelve, and seven in council in Old England, and prophesied that a great work would be done by them in the old countries; God was already beginning to work in the hearts of the people. Zebedee Coltrin saw a vision of the Lord's host; others were filled with the spirit of God and spoke with tongues and prophesied.

After more than two years and a half of diligent and incessant labor, the Saints, although few in numbers and most of them poor, succeeded in finishing the Temple, which finally was dedicated on March 27, 1836. On this occasion Sidney Rigdon delivered one of his stirring and eloquent speeches, and Joseph Smith offered the dedicatory prayer. The spirit of God was poured out upon the large congregation, which rejoiced exceedingly and shouted hosanna to God and the Lamb. President Frederick G. Williams testified that an angel, during the services, entered the window and took his seat between Joseph Smith, sen., and himself, and remained there while Sidney Rigdon prayed. David Whitmer also saw angels in the house. President Brigham Young and David W. Patten spoke in tongues, and others had the interpretation of tongues.

In the evening the quorums of the Priesthood met, and Joseph Smith gave instructions concerning the washing of feet, the spirit of prophecy, etc. He told the brethren not to be afraid of prophesying good concerning the Saints; "for," said he, "if you prophesy the falling of these hills, and the rising of the valleys, the downfall of the enemies of Zion, and the rising of the kingdom of God, it shall come to pass. Do not quench the spirit, for the first one that opens his mouth shall receive the spirit of prophecy."

Brother George A Smith arose and began to prophesy, when a noise was heard like the sound of a rushing, mighty wind, which filled the Temple, and all the congregation simultaneously arose, being moved upon by an invisible power. Many began to speak in tongues and prophesy; others saw glorious visions, and the Prophet Joseph beheld that the Temple was filled with angels, which fact he told the congregation. The people of the neighborhood, hearing an unusual sound within the Temple, and seeing a bright light like a pillar of fire resting upon it, came running together, and were astonished at what was transpiring. Four hundred and sixteen Elders were present on that occasion.

On Tuesday, March 29, 1836, the First Presidency and some others met in the Temple and were commanded to remain there all night. They were told that they must cleanse their feet and partake of the sacrament that they might be made holy before the Lord, and thereby be qualified to officiate in their calling upon the morrow, in washing the feet of the Elders.* This they did, and after attending to these ordinances they continued prophesying and giving glory to God.

The next day (March 30th) Joseph Smith and the leading Elders, with all the official members of the Kirtland Stake of Zion, met in the Temple to attend to the ordinance of washing of feet. The Presidency washed the feet of the presidents of the several quorums. Many prophecies and blessings were pronounced and sealed with Hosanna and Amen. A number of predictions were also uttered concerning the enemies of Christ, which since have been fulfilled to the very letter. These labors occupied the time from eight o'clock in the morning until seven in the evening. Then bread and wine were brought in (for all had fasted through the day), and Joseph and his counselors blessed the bread and gave it to the Twelve, and they to the other brethren present.

The Prophet afterwards gave much instruction, saying, among other things, that he had now completed the organization of the Church, as they had passed through all the necessary ceremonies they were prepared to receive; and for the present he had given them all the instruction they needed, and they were now at liberty, after obtaining their licenses, to go forth and build up the Kingdom of God. The First Presidency then retired, having been up all the preceeding night, and left the meeting in charge of the Twelve. The entire night was occupied in exhorting, prophesying and speaking in tongues. The Savior made his appearance to some, while angels administered to others and, in the language of the Prophet, "it was a Pentecost and an endowment indeed, long to be remembered; for the sound shall go forth from this place into all the world, and the occurrences of this day shall be handed down upon the pages of sacred history, to all generations. As the day of Pentecost, so shall this day be numbered and celebrated as a 'year of Jubilee' and time of rejoicing, to the Saints of the Most High God."

On Sunday, April 3, 1836, after the administering of the sacrament, Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery retired to the pulpit, the vails being dropped, and bowed in solemn and silent prayer.

"After rising from prayer," writes the Prophet, "the following vision was opened to both of us: The vail was taken from our minds and the eyes of our understanding were opened. We saw the Lord standing upon the breastwork of the pulpit, before us, and under his feet was a paved work of pure gold in color like amber. His eyes were as a flame of fire, the hair of his head was white like the pure snow, his countenance shone above the brightness of the sun, and his voice was as the sound of the rushing of great waters, even the voice of Jehovah, saying:

" 'I am the first and the last, I am he who liveth, I am he who was slain, I am your advocate with the Father. Behold, your sins are forgiven you, you are clean before me, therefore lift up your heads and rejoice, let the hearts of your brethren rejoice, and let the hearts of all my people rejoice, who have, with their might, built this house to my name, for behold, I have accepted this house, and my name shall be here, and I will manifest myself to my people in mercy in this house, yea, I will appear unto my servants, and speak unto them with mine own voice, if my people will keep my commandments, and do not pollute this holy house; yea, the hearts of thousands and tens of thousands shall greatly rejoice in consequence of the blessings which shall be poured out, and the endowment with which my servants have been endowed in this house; and the fame of this house shall spread to foreign lands, and this is the beginning of the blessings which shall be poured out upon the heads of my people. Even so. Amen.'

"After this vision closed the heavens were again opened unto us, and Moses appeared before us, and committed unto us the keys of the gathering of Israel from the four parts of the earth, and the leading of the Ten Tribes from the land of the North.

"After this Elias appeared, and committed the dispensation of the gospel of Abraham, saying, that in us, and our seed, all generations after us should be blessed.

"After this vision had closed, another great and glorious vision burst upon us, for Elijah the Prophet, who was taken to heaven without tasting death, stood before us, and said:

" 'Behold, the time has fully come, which was spoken of by the mouth of Malachi, testifying that he (Elijah) should be sent before the great and dreadful day of the Lord come, to turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, and the children to the fathers, lest the whole earth be smitten with a curse. Therefore the keys of this dispensation are committed into your hands, and by this ye may know that the great and dreadful day of the Lord is near, even at the doors.' "

The endowment of the Elders caused the work of God to take mighty strides, and from that time the preaching of the gospel took a much wider range. The following year (1837) the first missionaries were also sent to England, which was the first foreign mission of the Church.

In the beginning of 1837 the Kirtland Safety Society was organized as a banking institution and commenced the issue of notes. Joseph Smith afterwards resigned his position therein and withdrew from the institution, being fully convinced, as he said, that no institution of the kind, established upon just and righteous principles, would be suffered to continue operations in such an age of darkness, speculation and wickedness. Through the swindling and roguery of Warren Parrish and his confederates the institution subsequently failed, whereby many of the Saints sustained heavy losses, and the apostates sought by means of this to bring the leaders of the Church into bad repute.

In the early part of the summer of 1837, the spirit of speculation in lands and property of all kinds took possession of many men in the Church at Kirtland. It was the beginning of a season of trial, which stands unequalled in the history of the Church, and which those who passed through it will never forget. Evil surmisings, faultfinding, disunion, dissension and apostacy followed in quick succession, as the fruits of the spirit that prevailed. It seemed as though all the powers of earth and hell were combining their influence to an extraordinary extent to overthrow the Church at once and make a final end of the work of God. No quorum in the Church was entirely exempt from the influence of those false spirits who were striving against Joseph for the mastery. The enemy abroad and apostates in the midst of the Saints, were united together in their schemes. Disobedience to council brought many evils upon the people, but instead of their ascribing them to the true cause, they became disaffected towards Joseph and looked upon him as the man who had brought all their trouble upon them! Even some of the Twelve Apostles were so far lost to their high and responsible calling that they began to take sides secretly with the enemy. (Juvenile Instructor, Vol. 12, page 63.)

In these days of trial it was almost as much as a man's life was worth to be found defending the Prophet Joseph; and among the prominent men in the Church there were but few who had enough of the Spirit of the Lord and of courage to stand by him. There were, however, some of the Elders who never wavered or flinched; the hatred and opposition of the enemy only made them cling closer to the Prophet; their courage rose with the occasion, and they rallied round him with devotion of true friendship. Prominent among these Elders was Brigham Young, who stood forward with great fearlessness and distinguished himself by his steadfastness in maintaining the truth in the face of all opposition. So general became the apostasy that it was found necessary to hold a conference in Kirtland Sept. 3, 1837, for the purpose of reorganizing the Church. On that occasion Frederick G. Williams, second counselor to the Prophet, was not sustained, three of the Twelve, namely, Luke S. Johnson, Lyman E. Johnson and John F. Boynton were disfellowshipped, and several other prominent men objected to. A few weeks later Joseph Smith left Kirtland on his fourth visit to Missouri. During his absence William Parrish, John F. Boynton, Luke S. Johnson, Joseph Coe and other apostates in Kirtland united together for the overthrow of the Church, and soon after the Prophet's return in the following December, this dissenting band openly and publicly renounced the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, and claimed that they were the old standard. They called themselves the Church of Christ, but dropped the name of Saints; they also said that Joseph was a fallen Prophet and that he and the Church were heretics.

At the close of the year and at the beginning of 1838 the spirit of apostate mobocracy continued to rage and grow hotter and hotter in Kirtland. Brigham Young, to escape the fury of the mob, started for Missouri Dec. 22, 1837, and on the evening of Jan. 12, 1838, Joseph Smith, accompanied by Sidney Rigdon, was compelled to leave Kirtland on horseback to escape mob violence. He removed to Caldwell County, Missouri. After his departure from Kirtland the faithful Saints felt a great desire to follow him to Missouri, in order to get away from the apostate element. For the purpose of devising means of removing, the Seventies assembled in the Temple, and by vision and prophecy it was made known that they should go up to Missouri in a camp, pitching their tents by the way. Under the leadership of their presidents, the Seventies and others went into camp July 5, 1838, started on the 6th, numbering 515 souls, and traveled to Missouri, where they located at Adam-ondi-Ahman, in Daviess County. (See under Kirtland's Camp.)

After the departure of this large company only a few Saints were left in Kirtland, and they were continually exposed to persecution and ill-treatment by the apostates. Still a branch organization was continued for some time, and in October, 1840, Almon W. Babbitt was appointed to preside in Kirtland. At a conference held there May 22, 1841, he was sustained as president, with Lester Brooks and Zebedee Coltrin as his counselors. Shortly afterwards, however, the First Presidency at Nauvoo declared all Stakes outside of Hancock County, Ill., and Lee County, Iowa, discontinued, after which all the Saints in Kirtland who complied with counsel moved west as soon as possible.

In point of interesting events no place ever inhabited by the Latter-day Saints equals Kirtland. At no other place in this dispensation has the Lord manifested his power to his Saints in such a degree as he did there, and at no other period in the history of the Church has the devil and his emissaries tried harder to overthrow the Church than he did in 1837-38 in that formerly obscure Ohio village. Such apostacy among the leading men of the Church has never happened since. But the Lord strengthened His faithful servants, and although the wicked took possession of the Temple of God, and have it until this day, the Church outlived the storm, and the scenes enacted brought to light God's noble men and noble women, who afterwards figured so prominently among the Saints, while it brought the hypocrite and sinner out in his true character, and thus purified the Church

Forty-two of the revelations, contained in the Book of Doctrine and Covenants, were given through Joseph Smith in Kirtland, among which are the two important revelations on Priesthood (Secs. 84 and 107) and the Word of Wisdom (Sec. 89).

In later years Kirtland has been visited by many Latter-day Saint Elders, but the only thing that reminds the visitor of the former glory of the place is the Temple, which in its dilapidated condition stands like a lone sentinel, pointing its little spire to heaven as if bearing witness of what once took place inside its walls.

According to the census of 1880, Kirtland Township, including the village, had at that time 984 inhabitants.

MISCELLANEOUS.

BEVAN, (JAMES,) a member of the Mormon Battalion, was born in Herefordshire, England, October 18, 1821, baptized in October, 1840, emigrated to America in 1842, crossing the Atlantic in the ship Hope, and arrived at Nauvoo, Ill., May 14, 1846. He enlisted as a private in company A of the Battalion, at Council Bluffs, and on account of sickness became a member of Lieutenant W. W. Willis' detachment, which wintered at Pueblo. He arrived in Great Salt Lake Valley the following summer under James Brown. After remaining in the Valley about fourteen months, Bevan returned to the States, in company with Howard Egan and others, but came back to the Valley in the spring of 1852 as a married man, and located in Tooele County, Utah, where he has resided ever since.

GEE, (GEORGE WASHINGTON,) surveyor, was born in Rome, Ashtabula County, Ohio, August 13, 1815, was baptized at Kirtland, Ohio, Feb. 17, 1833, removed in 1838 to Missouri, from where he was driven by the mob in the spring of 1839. After being ordained an Elder at Nauvoo he removed to Ambrosia, Lee County, Iowa, where he was appointed postmaster and deputy county surveyor; he surveyed the city plats of Nashville and Zarahemla, under the direction of President Joseph Smith. He was sent to Pittsburgh, Penn., in the fall of 1841, as a missionary, where he died Jan. 20, 1842, in the faithful discharge of his duties. His opportunity for schooling had been limited, but by his own exertion he attained an excellent education and collected quite a respectable library. He won the affection of all the Saints with whom he became acquainted, by his integrity and perseverance. With his wife, Mary Jane Smith, whom he married in Kirtland in 1838, he had two sons, named Elias S. and Geo. W.

PHELPS, (LAURA,) wife of Morris Phelps, suffered great persecution in Missouri in 1833-1838. In 1839 she went from Iowa to Missouri to assist in liberating her husband, who was imprisoned in Columbia, Boone Co., and she "was left in the prison yard when he made his escape, willing to suffer all the abuses a savage horde could inflict upon her, to set her companion safe from the grasp of his murderous enemies." She died in Nauvoo, Ill., Feb. 2, 1842.

SMITH, (HYRUM,) Patriarch of the whole Church and brother to the Prophet Joseph, was born in Tunbridge, Vermont, Feb. 9, 1800, and married Jerusha Barden Nov. 2, 1826, by whom he had six children, Lovina, Mary, John, Hyrum, Jerusha and Sarah. He became a widower on the 13th of Oct., 1837, while absent at Far West, and married Mary Fielding the same year, by whom he had two children, Joseph F. and Martha. Like his brother Joseph, Hyrum spent his early years in agricultural labors, and nothing of particular note characterized that period of his life. He speedily became a believer in Joseph's mission, and by him was baptized in Seneca Lake, in June, 1829. He was one of the eight persons permitted to view the plates from which the Book of Mormon was translated, and bis name is prefixed to it as a witness. On Nov. 7, 1837, at a conference assembled in Far West, Mo., he was appointed second counselor to President Joseph Smith, instead of Frederick G. Williams, who was rejected. On Jan. 19th, 1841, he was called by revelation to take the office of Patriarch to the whole Church, to which he had been appointed by his deceased father, by blessing and also by birth-right, and was likewise appointed a Prophet, Seer and Revelator. He was personally connected with many of the principal events of the Church, up to the time of his death, and in the various offices he filled won the love and esteem of all persons. In the revelation calling him to be the chief Patriarch, the Lord thus spoke of him: "Blessed is my servant Hyrum Smith, for I the Lord love him, because of the integrity of his heart, and because he loveth that which is right before me, saith the Lord." (Doc. & Cov., 124: 15.) He was tenderly attached to his brother Joseph, whom he never left more than six months at one time, during their lifetime. He was arrested with him at Far West, Mo., and imprisoned with him at Liberty, and finally spilt his blood with him at Carthage, Ill., June 27, 1844. In this catastrophe he fell first, exclaiming, "I am a dead man," and Joseph responding, "Oh, dear brother Hyrum!" In the Times and Seasons we find the following beautiful eulogy: "He lived so far beyond the ordinary walk of man, that even the tongue of the vilest slanderer could not touch his reputation. He lived godly, and he died godly, and his murderers will yet have to confess, that it would have been better for them to have had a mill-stone tied to them, and have been cast into the depths of the sea, and remain there while eternity goes and eternity comes, than to have robbed that noble man of heaven of his life." At his death he held various military and civil offices in the Nauvoo Legion and in the municipality.

THOMSTORFF, (AUGUST FREDERICK,) a son of "Friherre-Baron" August von Thomstorff, was born in Flensburg, Schleswig-Holstein, March 31, 1838. He studied for an officer in the army under General de Meza, but disliking the business, he turned his attention to the art of lithography, which he learned thoroughly. After serving his time of apprenticeship he traveled extensively through Prussia as a journeyman, working in many of the larger cities, including Berlin. Finally he went to Copenhagen, Denmark, where he married "Jomfru" Gerhardine Marcusen, and together with her embraced the fulness of the gospel, being baptized by Elder Jens Hansen, May 27, 1866. Shortly afterwards he was stricken down with pneumonia and reduced to the point of death. When the physicians had given him up to die, his wife sent for Elder Carl Widerborg, who administered to him in the name of the Lord and prophesied that he should recover, get home to Zion and have a family of children. Up to that time his marriage had been childless. When the physicians came the next day to "examine the corpse," they were startled to find the patient recovering and to be entirely out of danger, declaring that a great miracle had been done, which indeed was the case, although they would not acknowledge the hand of the Lord in it. In a few days Thomstorff was able to attend to his usual avocation. He was ordained an Elder and labored in the Copenhagen branch, together with his brethren, in various capacities until 1873, when he and his wife emigrated to America, locating in Salt Lake City. During his thirteen years residence there he was mostly engaged as a painter, working a great deal of his time for the Church, there not being much opportunity for him to find employment as a lithographer. By his kind, winning ways he gained a large circle of friends, and died quite suddenly at his residence in the 11th Ward, Salt Lake City, April 24, 1886, in the prime of his manhood. For a number of years he acted as a Ward teacher and was a counselor to the president of the German meetings. He was also a member of a quorum of Seventy. He left two wives and five children, while one wife and two children preceded him beyond the vail.

THE WASP, a weekly newspaper, published by the Church in Nauvoo, Hancock County, Illinois. (Size: 4 column folio. Subscription price: $1.50 a year. Motto: Truth crushed to the earth will rise again.) The first number was issued April 16, 1842, and the last April 26, 1843; it then changed name to The Nauvoo Neighbor. Wm. Smith's name appears at the head of the columns as editor of the first 31 numbers, but he did not write much for it. John Taylor edited the remaining 21 numbers.

WILDING, (WILLIAM,) a centenarian, was born in Northamptonshire, England, Nov. 11, 1783, baptized in January, 1840, by Elder Geo. Simpson, and emigrated to Utah in 1868. From that time to his death, June 6, 1885, he lived in the 17th Ward, Salt Lake City, with his youngest daughter, Mrs. O. B. Shaw, who was 64 years old when he died. He was a man of steady habits and never allowed his peace of mind to be seriously disturbed. During his long life, covering nearly 102 years, he never was sick.

THE FIRST PRESIDENCY.

The First Presidency of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, consisting of Three, was first organized in Kirtland, Ohio, March 18, 1833, according to a revelation given through Joseph Smith a few days previous (March 8, 1833). On that occasion Sidney Rigdon was ordained to be first and Frederick G. Williams second counselor to President Joseph Smith, who himself had been called of God to be an Apostle of the Lord Jesus Christ, and to be the first Elder of the Church; and he had already been acknowledged as the president of the High Priesthood at a conference held in Amherst, Lorain County, Ohio, Jan. 25, 1832, and also at a general council, held at Independence, Jackson County, Mo., April 26, 1832.

At an important conference held at Far West, Mo., Nov. 7, 1837, Frederick G. Williams was rejected as a counselor to President Smith, charges having previously been made against him at the conference held in Kirtland September 3, 1837; and Hyrum Smith, by unanimous vote, was appointed in his stead. Hyrum filled this position with honor and ability, until after his father Patriarch Joseph Smith, senior, died in September, 1840, when he, in a revelation given through Joseph Smith, at Nauvoo Jan. 19, 1841, was called to take the office of Patriarch to the Church, as his father's successor. William Law was called in the same revelation to take Hyrum Smith's place in the First Presidency as second counselor to President Smith. William Law occupied this position until April 18, 1844, when he, together with a number of other apostates, was excommunicated from the Church.

About two months later Joseph the Prophet was martyred in Carthage, after which the Twelve Apostles constituted the presiding quorum of the Church until Dec. 5, 1847, when a council of that quorum was held near Council Bluffs, Iowa, at which Brigham Young was chosen President of the Church, with Heber C. Kimball and Willard Richards as his counselors. These transactions were ratified by the Church at a conference held in the Log Tabernacle at Council Bluffs, Iowa, Dec. 27, 1847, and at the General Conference held in Great Salt Lake Valley October 8, 1848.

Willard Richards died of dropsy, in Great Salt Lake City, March 11, 1854, and Jedediah M. Grant was called to fill the vacancy thus created, at the general conference April 6, 1854.

President Jedediah M. Grant died at Great Salt Lake City, Dec. 1, 1856, and his place was filled, Jan. 4, 1857, by the appointment of Daniel H. Wells, who occupied the position of second counselor until President Young's death.

Heber C. Kimball died June 22, 1868, in Salt Lake City, and his place in the First Presidency was filled by the appointment of George A. Smith, who occupied this position until his death, which occured in Salt Lake City Sept. 1, 1875. John W. Young was set apart as first counselor in his stead Oct. 8, 1876.

After President Young's death, Aug. 29, 1877, the Twelve again assumed the responsibility as presiding quorum of the Church, and retained it for three years, or until the October conference, 1880, when the First Presidency was organized for the third time in the history of the Church by the appointment of John Taylor as President, with George Q. Cannon and Joseph F. Smith as his counselors.

By the foregoing it will be seen that three Apostles, namely, Joseph Smith, Brigham Young and John Taylor, have filled the exalted position of Presidents of the Church; five (Sidney Rigdon, Heber C. Kimball, George A. Smith, John W. Young and George Q. Cannon) have acted as first counselors, and seven (Frederick G. Williams, Hyrum Smith, William Law, Willard Richards, Jedediah M. Grant, Daniel H. Wells and Joseph F. Smith) as second counselors in the First Presidency, since the first organization of that quorum in 1833.

THE KIRTLAND TEMPLE.

On May 4, 1833, a conference of High Priests assembled in Kirtland, Ohio, to take into consideration the necessity of building a school-house, for the accommodation of the Elders, who should come together to receive instruction, preparatory for their missions and ministry; according to a revelation on that subject, given March 8, 1833. By unanimous voice of the conference, Hyrum Smith, Jared Carter and Reynolds Cahoon were appointed a committee to obtain subscriptions for the purpose of erecting such a building.

Shortly afterwards the committee wrote an epistle to all the Saints, calling upon them "to make every possible exertion to aid temporally as well as spiritually" to build this House of the Lord. To this call the faithful members of the Church cheerfully responded.

In a revelation given through the Prophet Joseph in June, 1833, the Lord says:

"Verily, I say unto you, it is my will that you should build an house. If you keep my commandments, you shall have power to build it; if you keep not my commandments, the love of the Father shall not continue with you, therefore you shall walk in darkness. Now here is wisdom and the mind of the Lord: let the house be built, not after the manner of the world, for I give not unto you, that ye shall live after the manner of the world; therefore let it be built after the manner which I shall show unto three of you, whom ye shall appoint and ordain unto this power. And the size thereof shall be fifty and five feet in width, and let it be sixty-five feet in length, in the inner court thereof; and let the lower part of the inner court be dedicated unto me for your sacrament offering, and for your preaching, and your fasting, and your praying, and the offering up of your most holy desires unto me, saith your Lord. And let the higher part of the inner court be dedicated unto me for the school of mine Apostles, saith Son Ahman; or, in other words, Alphus; or, in other words, Omegus; even Jesus Christ your Lord. Amen." (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 95.)

On June 6, 1833, a conference of High Priests assembled in Kirtland and instructed the building committee to proceed immediately to obtain stone, brick, lumber and other materials for the building, which they did, and on July 23, 1833 (the same day on which the Saints in Missouri made a treaty with the mob, and agreed to leave Jackson County) the corner stones of the Lord's House, or the Kirtland Temple, were laid after the order of the holy Priesthood.

"At that time," writes Sister Eliza R. Snow, "the Saints were few in number, and most of them very poor; and, had it not been for the assurance that God had spoken, and had commanded that a house should be built to his name, of which he not only revealed the form, but also designated the dimensions, an attempt towards building that Temple, under the then existing circumstances, would have been, by all concerned, pronounced preposterous.

"Although many sections of the world abounded with mosques, churches, synagogues and cathedrals, built professedly for worship, this was the first instance, for the lapse of many centuries, of God having given a pattern, from the heavens, and manifested by direct revelation how the edifice should be constructed, in order that he might accept and acknowledge it as his own. This knowledge inspired the Saints to almost superhuman efforts, while through faith and union they acquired strength. In comparison with eastern churches and cathedrals, this Temple is not large, but in view of the amount of available means possessed, a calculation of the cost, at the lowest possible figures, would have staggered the faith of any but Latter-day Saints; and it now stands as a monumental pillar.

"Its dimensions are eighty by sixty feet; the walls fifty feet high, and the tower one hundred and ten feet. The two main halls are fifty-five by sixty-five feet, in the inner court. The building has four vestries in front, and five rooms in the attic, which were devoted to literature, and for the meetings of the various quorums of the Priesthood.

"There was a peculiarity in the arrangement of the inner court which made it more than ordinarily impressive—so much so, that a sense of sacred awe seemed to rest upon all who entered; not only the Saints, but strangers also manifested a high degree of reverential feeling. Four pulpits stood, one above another, in the center of the building, from north to south, both on the east and west ends; those on the west for the presiding officers of the Melchizedek Priesthood, and those on the east for the Aaronic; and each of these pulpits was separated by curtains of white painted canvas, which were let down and drawn up at pleasure. In front of each of these two rows of pulpits, was a sacrament table, for the administration of that sacred ordinance. In each corner of the court was an elevated pew for the singers —the choir being distributed into four compartments. In addition to the pulpit curtains, were others, intersecting at right angles, which divided the main ground-floor hall into four equal sections—giving to each one-half of one set of pulpits.

"From the day the ground was broken for laying the foundation for the Temple, until its dedication on the 27th of March, 1836, the work was vigorously prosecuted.

"With very little capital except brain, bone and sinew, combined with unwavering trust in God, men, women, and even children, worked with their might; while the brethren labored in their departments, the sisters were actively engaged in boarding and clothing workmen not otherwise provided for—all living as abstemiously as possible, so that every cent might be appropriated to the grand object, while their energies were stimulated by the prospect of participating in the blessing of a house built by the direction of the Most High and accepted by him.

"The dedication was looked forward to with intense interest; and when the day arrived (Sunday, March 27th, 1836), a dense multitude assembled—the Temple was filled to its utmost, and when the ushers were compelled to close the doors, the outside congregation was nearly, if not quite as large as that within.

"Four hundred and sixteen Elders, including Prophets and Apostles, with the first great Prophets of the last dispensation at their head, were present—men who had been 'called of God as was Aaron,' and clothed with the holy Priesthood; many of them having just returned from missions, on which they had gone forth like the ancient disciples, 'without purse or scrip,' now to feast for a little season on the sweet spirit of love and union, in the midst of those who had 'tasted of the powers of the world to come.'

"At the hour appointed, the assembly was seated, the Melchizedek and Aaronic Priesthood being arranged as follows: West end of the house, Presidents Frederick G. Williams, Joseph Smith sen. and William W. Phelps, occupied the first pulpit for the Melchizedek Priesthood; Presidents Joseph Smith jun., Hyrum Smith and Sidney Rigdon, the second; Presidents David Whitmer, Oliver Cowdery and John Whitmer, the third; the fourth pulpit was occupied by the president of the High Priests' quorum and his counselors, and two choristers. The Twelve Apostles were on the right in the highest three seats; the president of the Elders, his two counselors and clerk in the seat directly below the Twelve. The High Council of Kirtland, consisting of twelve, were on the left, on the first three seats. The fourth seat, and next below the High Council, was occupied by Warren A. Cowdery and Warren Parrish, who officiated as scribes.

"In the east end of the house, the Bishop of Kirtland—Newel K. Whitney—and his counselors occupied the first pulpit for the Aaronic Priesthood; the Bishop of Zion—Edward Partridge—and his counselors, the second; the president of the Priests and his counselors, the third; the president of the Teachers and his counselors, and one chorister, the fourth; the High Council of Zion, consisting of twelve counselors, on the right; the president of the Deacons and his counselors, in the next seat below them, and the seven presidents of the Seventies, on the left.

"At nine o'clock, President Sidney Rigdon commenced the services of that great and memorable day, by reading the ninety-sixth and twenty-fourth Psalms: 'Ere long the vail will rend in twain,' etc., was sung by the choir, and after President Rigdon had addressed the throne of grace in fervent prayer, 'O happy souls who pray,' etc., was sung. President Rigdon then read the eighteenth, nineteenth, and twentieth verses of the eighteenth chapter of Matthew, and spoke more particularly from the last-named verse, continuing his eloquent, logical and sublime discourse for two and a half hours. At one point, as he reviewed the toils and privations of those who had labored in rearing the walls of that sacred edifice, he drew tears from many eyes, saying, there were those who had wet those walls with their tears, when, in the silent shades of the night, they were praying to the God of heaven to protect them, and stay the unhallowed hands of ruthless spoilers, who had uttered a prophecy, when the foundation was laid, that the walls should never be erected.

"In reference to his main subject, the speaker assumed that in the days of the Savior there were synagogues where the jews worshipped God; and in addition to those, the splendid Temple in Jerusalem; yet when, on a certain occasion, one proposed to follow him, withersoever he went, though heir of all things, he cried out in bitterness of soul, 'The foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests, but the Son of Man hath not where to lay his head.' From this the speaker drew the conclusion that the Most High did not put his name there, neither did he accept the worship of those who paid their vows and adorations there. This was evident from the fact that they did not receive the Savior, but thrust him from them, saying, 'Away with him! Crucify him! Crucify him!' It was therefore evident that his spirit did not dwell in them. They were the degenerate sons of noble sires, but they had long since slain the Prophets and Seers, through whom the Lord had revealed himself to the children of men. They were not led by revelation. This, said the speaker, was the grand difficulty—their unbelief in present revelation. He then clearly demonstrated the fact that diversity of, and contradictory, opinions, did and would prevail among people not led by present revelation; which forcibly applies to the various religious sects of our own day; and inasmuch as they manifest the same spirit, they must be under the same condemnation with those who were coeval with the Savior.

"He admitted there were many houses—many sufficiently large, built for the worship of God, but not one, except this, on the face of the whole earth, that was built by divine revelation; and were it not for this, the dear Redeemer might, in this day of science, intelligence and religion, say to those who would follow him, 'the foxes have holes, the birds of the air have nests, but the Son of Man hath not where to lay his head.'

"After the close of his discourse, President Rigdon presented for an expression of their faith and confidence Joseph Smith, jun., as Prophet, Seer and Revelator, to the various quorums, and the whole congregation of Saints, and a simultaneous arising up followed, in token of unanimous confidence and covenant to uphold him as such, by their faith and prayers.

"The morning services were concluded by the choir singing, 'Now let us rejoice in the day of salvation,' etc. During an intermission of twenty minutes, the congregation remained seated, and the afternoon services opened by singing, 'This earth was once a garden place,' etc. President Joseph Smith jun. addressed the assembly for a few moments, and then presented the First Presidency of the Church as Prophets, Seers and Revelators, and called upon all, who felt to acknowledge them as such, to manifest it by rising up. All arose. He then presented the Twelve Apostles who were present, as Prophets, Seers and Revelators, and special witnesses to all the earth, holding the keys of the kingdom of God to unlock it, or cause it to be done among them; to which all assented by rising to their feet. He then presented the other quorums in their order, and the vote was unanimous in every instance.

"He then prophesied to all, that inasmuch as they would uphold these men in their several stations (alluding to the different quorums in the Church), the Lord would bless them, 'yea, in the name of Christ, the blessings of heaven shall be yours; and when the Lord's anointed shall go forth to proclaim the word, bearing testimony to this generation, if they receive it they shall be blessed; but if not, the judgments of God will follow close upon them, until that city or that house which rejects them, shall be left desolate.'

"The hymn commencing with 'How pleased and blessed was I,' was sung, after which President Joseph Smith offered the dedicatory prayer. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 109.) The choir then sang, 'The spirit of God like a fire is burning,' etc., after which the Lord's supper was administered to the whole assembly. Then President Joseph Smith bore testimony of his mission and of the ministration of angels, and, after testimonials and exhortations by other Elders, he blessed the congregation in the name of the Lord.

"Thus ended the ceremonies of the dedication of the first Temple built by special command of the Most High, in this dispensation.

"One striking feature of the ceremonies, was the grand shout of hosanna, which was given by the whole assembly, in standing position, with uplifted hands. The form of the shout is as follows: 'Hosanna—hosanna—hosanna—to God and the Lamb—amen—amen, and amen.' The foregoing was deliberately and emphatically pronounced, and three times repeated, and with such power as seemed almost sufficient to raise the roof from the building.

"A singular incident in connection with this shout may be discredited by some, but it is verily true. A notice had been circulated that children in arms would not be admitted at the dedication of the Temple. A sister who had come a long distance with her babe, six weeks old, having on her arrival heard of the above requisition, went to the Patriarch Joseph Smith, sen., in great distress, saying that she knew no one with whom she could leave her infant; and to be deprived of the privilege of attending the dedication seemed more than she could endure. The ever generous and kind-hearted father volunteered to take the responsibility on himself, and told her to take her child, at the same time giving the mother a promise that her babe should make no disturbance; and the promise was verified. But when the congregation shouted hosanna, that babe joined in the shout. As marvelous as that incident may appear to many, it is not more so than other occurrences on that occasion.

"The ceremonies of that dedication may be rehearsed, but no mortal language can describe the heavenly manifestations of that memorable day. Angels appeared to some, while a sense of divine presence was realized by all present, and each heart was filled with 'joy inexpressible and full of glory.' * * *

"After the dedication of the Temple, the 'Kirtland High School' was taught in the attic story, by H. M. Hawes, professor of Greek and Latin. The school numbered from one hundred and thirty to one hundred and forty students, divided into three departments: The classics; where only languages were taught; the English department, where mathematics, common arithmetic, geography, English grammar, reading and writing were taught; and the juvenile department. The two last were under assistant instructors. The school was commenced in November, 1836, and the progress of the several classes, on examinations before trustees of the school, parents and guardians, was found to be of the highest order.

"Not only did the Almighty manifest his acceptance of that house, at its dedication, but an abiding holy, heavenly influence was realized; and many extraordinary manifestations of his power were experienced on subsequent occasions. Not only were angels often seen within, but a pillar of light was several times seen resting down upon the roof."

During the winter of 1836-37 the Temple was filled to overflowing on Sundays with attentive hearers, mostly members of the Church. On Sunday evenings the singers met in the house; on Monday evenings the High Priests; on Tuesday evenings the Seventies; on Wednesday evenings the Elders, and on Thursday evenings a prayer meeting was held. Besides those meetings, the Twelve, the High Council and other quorums generally held their meetings once a week to transact business.

Besides being devoted to general meetings for worship and the celebration of the Lord's Supper every first day of the week, the Temple was occupied by crowded assemblies on the first Thursday in each month, that day being observed strictly, by the Latter-day Saints, as a day of fasting and prayer. These, called fast-meetings, were hallowed and interesting beyond the power of language to describe. Many, many were the pentecostal seasons of the outpouring of the Spirit of God on those days, manifesting the gifts of the gospel and the power of healing, prophesying, speaking in tongues, the interpretation of tongues, etc.

"I have there," continues Sister Snow, "seen the lame man, on being administered to, throw aside his crutches and walk home perfectly healed; and not only were the lame made to walk, but the blind to see, the deaf to hear, the dumb to speak, and evil spirits to depart.

"On those fast days, the curtains, or vails, mentioned in a preceding chapter, which intersected at right angles, were dropped, dividing the house into four equal parts. Each of these sections had a presiding officer, and the meeting in each section was conducted as though no other were in the building, which afforded apportunity for four persons to occupy the same time. These meetings commenced early in the day and continued without intermission till four p. m. One hour previous to dismissal, the vails were drawn up and the four congregations brought together, and the people who, in the forepart of the day, were instructed to spend much of the time in prayer, and to speak, sing and pray, mostly in our own language, lest a spirit of enthusiasm should creep in, were permitted, after the curtains were drawn, to speak or sing in tongues, prophesy, pray, interpret tongues, exhort or preach, however they might feel moved upon to do. Then the united faith of the Saints brought them into close fellowship with the spirits of the just, and earth and heaven seemed in close proximity.

"On fast days, Father Smith's constant practice was to repair to the Temple very early, and offer up his prayers before sunrise, and there await the coming of the people; and so strictly did he discipline himself in the observance of fasting, as not even to wet his lips with water until after the dismissal of the meeting at four p. m. One morning, when he opened meeting, he prayed fervently that the spirit of the Most High might be poured out as it was at Jerusalem, on the day of pentecost—that it might come 'like a mighty rushing wind.' It was not long before it did come, to the astonishment of all, and filled the house. It appeared as though the old gentleman had forgotten what he had prayed for. When it came, he was greatly surprised, and exclaimed, 'What! is the house on fire?'

When the faithful Saints, who would not deny their holy religion, or denounce the Prophet Joseph Smith, were forced to flee for their lives in 1837 and 1838, the Temple was left in the hands of apostates, who soon defiled it, and since that time the gifts and blessings of heaven and the manifestations of the power of God in that building have been matters of the past. Since those memorable days, no voice of inspiration has sounded within its walls, except on a few occasions, when Elders of the Church from the far West have visited Kirtland and been permitted to expound the principles of the gospel in the hall, once sanctified by the presence of heavenly messengers. Then the spirit of the Almighty would sometimes measurably be poured out upon the assemblies—perhaps sufficient to remind the visitor of the "good old Kirtland days." The Temple is now claimed and held by the Josephites, who hold meetings and occasionally conferences therein.

THE COUNCIL OF THE SEVENTIES.

When the First Quorum of Seventy was organized in Kirtland, Ohio, early in the year 1835, the names of the seven presidents were as follows:

Hazen Aldrich,
Joseph Young,
Levi W. Hancock,
Leonard Rich,
Zebedee Coltrin,
Lyman Sherman and Sylvester Smith.

Some questions having arisen in regard to the corresponding grades of the Seventies and High Priests, and it being ascertained that five or six of the presidents of the Seventies, namely, Hazen Aldrich, Leonard Rich, Zebedee Coltrin, Lyman Sherman and Sylvester Smith, had previously been ordained High Priests, the Prophet Joseph Smith, in a meeting of the Seventies held in the Kirtland Temple, April 6, 1837, counseled these brethren to join the High Priests' Quorum, which they did, and the following named Elders were ordained to fill the vacancies thus created in the Council of Seventies: John Gould, of the second quorum of Seventy, in place of Hazen Aldrich; James Foster, of the second quorum of Seventy, in place of Leonard Rich; Daniel S. Miles, of the third quorum of Seventy, in place of Zebedee Coltrin; Josiah Butterfield, of the second quorum of Seventy, in place of Lyman Sherman; Salmon Gee, of the second quorum of Seventy, in place of Levi W. Hancock, and John Gaylord, of the third quorum of Seventy, in place of Sylvester Smith.

In the summer of 1837 it was ascertained that Levi W. Hancock, who was in Missouri at the time of the April meeting, was not a High Priest, and he was therefore received back into his former position as one of the first Seven Presidents, at the reorganization of the Church at Kirtland, Sept. 3, 1837. John Gould, one of the newly appointed presidents, was asked by the Prophet to join the High Priests, which he did, after which the council of the Seventies stood as follows: Joseph Young, Levi W. Hancock, James Foster, Daniel S. Miles, Josiah Butterfield, Salmon Gee and John Gaylord.

On Jan. 13, 1838, John Gaylord, together with many others, was excommunicated from the Church by the High Council in Kirtland, for rising up in rebellion against the Church authorities. Elder Henry Harriman was called and ordained to fill the vacancy in the council occasioned thereby, February 6, 1838.

In a meeting of the Seventies held at Kirtland, March 6, 1838, the quorum withdrew their fellowship from Salmon Gee for neglect of duty and other causes. Elder Zera Pulsipher was chosen and ordained to fill the vacancy the same day.

After these two changes the council stood intact until the Church had removed to Nauvoo. It appears that James Foster, instead of gathering with the Saints, settled in Jacksonville, Morgan County, Illinois, and had no direct communication with his brethren. Prior to the October Conference, 1844, he was dropped and cut off by the council of the Seventies, and the following spring (1845) Albert P. Rockwood was called to fill the vacancy, caused by his removal.

Elder Daniel S. Miles died as a faithful man in the early part of 1845, in Hancock County, Illinois, and the vacancy occasioned by his death was filled by Elder Benjamin L. Clapp in April, 1845.

Josiah Butterfield retained his standing as one of the Seven Presidents until a misunderstanding arose between him and the Prophet, and he was finally cut off from the Church, Oct. 7, 1844, at the general conference held in Nauvoo, for neglect of duty, etc. The vacancy was filled the same day by the appointment of Jedediah M. Grant as one of the council of the Seventies in Butterfield's stead, but he was not ordained until some time afterwards.

After the demise of Willard Richards in 1854, Elder Jedediah M. Grant was elected by President Brigham Young to fill the office of second counselor in the First Presidency, thus leaving another vacancy in the council of the Seventies. Elder Horace S. Eldredge was called in the October Conference, 1854, to fill that vacancy, and was ordained about the same time in Great Salt Lake City.

Elder Benjamin L. Clapp, after living some years in Great Salt Lake City, removed his family to Ephraim, Sanpete Co., where he had some difficulty with Bishop Warren S. Snow. After investigation before the council of Seventies, he was dropped from his position in the council and finally excommunicated from the Church at the general conference, at G. S. L. City, April 7, 1859. Elder Jacob Gates was called to fill the vacancy at the April conference, 1860, but being absent on a mission to Europe, he was not ordained until October, 1862, some time after his return home.

Elder Zera Pulsipher transcended the bounds of his Priesthood in the ordinance of sealing, for which he was cited to appear before the First Presidency of the Church, April 12, 1862. It was there voted, that he be rebaptized, reconfirmed and ordained to the office of a High Priest, or go into the ranks of the Seventies. Subsequently he was ordained a Patriarch. Elder John Van Cott was called to fill the vacancy in the council of the Seventies in the October Conference, 1862.

Albert P. Rockwood died in the Sugar House Ward, Salt Lake County, November 26, 1879, and in the April conference, 1880, Elder William W. Taylor was called to fill the vacancy and soon afterwards ordained one of the First Seven Presidents of the Seventies.

The vacancies caused by the death of President Joseph Young, July 16, 1881, and of Levi W. Hancock, June 10, 1882, were filled by the ordination of Abraham H. Cannon as one of the Seven Presidents, Oct. 9, 1882, and Seymour B. Young, Oct. 16, 1882.

Elder John Van Cott died Feb. 18, 1883, and Christian Daniel Fjeldsted was called to fill the vacancy. He was ordained April 28, 1884, after his return from Scandinavia.

The demise of Elder Wm. W. Taylor, Aug. 1, 1884, caused another vacancy, which was filled Oct. 7, 1884, by the ordination of John Morgan to be one of the Seven Presidents.

The council now stands as follows:

Henry Harriman,
Horace S. Eldredge,
Jacob Gates,
Abraham H. Cannon,
Seymour B. Young,
Christian D. Fjeldsted,
John Morgan.

AMANDA SMITH.

Amanda Smith, wife of Elder Warren Smith and a survivor of the Haun's Mill massacre, was born in Salem, Massachusetts, Feb. 22, 1809. While she was but a young girl she moved with her parents to Ohio, and married at the age of 18 years. She was a member of the Campbellite Church, together with Sidney Rigdon and others once prominent in that church, until she heard the fulness of the gospel preached. When 22 years of age she was baptized by Elder Orson Hyde into the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, April 1, 1831, the Church being then not quite one year old. Soon afterwards she moved to Kirtland, where she assisted in building the Temple, and in 1838, with her husband and family and many others, she was forced to leave that place, on account of mob violence. They wended their way to Missouri, leaving all their property, except what they could take in a wagon with two horses.

The following interesting narrative is from "The Women of Mormondom" by Edward W. Tullidge, as written by Amanda Smith:

"We sold our beautiful home in Kirtland for a song, and traveled all summer to Missouri—our teams poor, and with hardly enough to keep body and soul together.

"We arrived in Caldwell County, near Haun's Mill, nine wagons of us in company. Two days before we arrived we were taken prisoners by an armed mob that had demanded every bit of ammunition and every weapon we had. We surrendered all. They knew it, for they searched our wagons.

"A few miles more brought us to Haun's Mill, where that awful scene of murder was enacted. My husband pitched his tent by a blacksmith shop.

"Brother David Evans made a treaty with the mob that they would not molest us. He came just before the massacre and called the company together and they knelt in prayer.

"I sat in my tent. Looking up I suddenly saw the mob coming—the same that took away our weapons. They came like so many demons or wild Indians.

"Before I could get to the blacksmith's shop door to alarm the brethren, who were at prayers, the bullets were whistling amongst them.

"I seized my two little girls and escaped across the mill-pond on a slab-walk. Another sister fled with me. Yet though we were women, with tender children, in flight for our lives, the demons poured volley after volley to kill us.

"A number of bullets entered my clothes, but I was not wounded. The sister, however, who was with me, cried out that she was hit. We had just reached the trunk of a fallen tree, over which I urged her, bidding her to shelter there where the bullets could not reach her, while I continued my flight to some bottom land.

"When the firing had ceased I went back to the scene of the massacre, for there were my husband and three sons, of whose fate I as yet knew nothing.

"As I returned I found the sister in a pool of blood where she had fainted, but she was only shot through the hand. Farther on was lying dead Brother McBride, an aged white-haired revolutionary soldier. His murderer had literally cut him to pieces with an old corn-cutter. His hands had been split down when he raised them in supplication for mercy. Then the monster cleft open his head with the same weapon, and the veteran who had fought for his country, in the glorious days of the past, was numbered with the martyrs.

"Passing on I came to a scene more terrible still to the mother and wife. Emerging from the blacksmith shop was my eldest son, bearing on his shoulders his little brother Alma.

" 'Oh! my Alma is dead!' I cried, in anguish.

" 'No, mother; I think Alma is not dead. But father and brother Sardius are killed!"

"What an answer was this to appall me! My husband and son murdered; another little son seemingly mortally wounded; and perhaps before the dreadful night should pass the murderers would return and complete their work!

"But I could not weep then. The fountain of tears was dry; the heart overburdened with its calamity, and all the mother's sense absorbed in its anxiety for the precious boy which God alone could save by his miraculous aid.

"The entire hip joint of my wounded boy had been shot away. Flesh, hip bone, joint and all had been ploughed out from the muzzle of the gun, which the ruffian placed to the child's hip through the logs of the shop and deliberately fired.

"We laid little Alma on a bed in our tent and I examined the wound. It was a ghastly sight. I knew not what to do. It was night now.

"There were none left from that terrible scene, throughout that long, dark night, but about half a dozen bereaved and lamenting women, and the children. Eighteen or nineteen, all grown men excepting my murdered boy and another about the same age, were dead or dying; several more of the men were wounded, hiding away, whose groans through the night too well disclosed their hiding places, while the rest of the men had fled, at the moment of the massacre, to save their lives.

"The women were sobbing, in the greatest anguish of spirit; the children were crying loudly with fear and grief at the loss of fathers and brothers; the dogs howled over their dead masters and the cattle were terrified with the scent of the blood of the murdered.

"Yet was I there, all that long, dreadful night, with my dead and my wounded, and none but God as our physician and help.

" 'Oh, my Heavenly Father,' I cried, 'what shall I do? Thou seest my poor, wounded boy and knowest my inexperience. Oh, Heavenly Father, direct me what to do!'

"And then I was directed as by a voice speaking to me.

"The ashes of our fire was still smouldering. We had been burning the bark of the shag-bark hickory; I was directed to take those ashes and make a lye and put a cloth saturated with it right into the wound. It hurt, but little Alma was too near dead to heed it much. Again and again I saturated the cloth and put it into the hole from which the hip joint had been ploughed, and each time mashed flesh and splinters of bone came away with the cloth; and the wound became as white as chicken's flesh.

"Having done as directed, I again prayed to the Lord and was again instructed as distinctly as though a physician had been standing by speaking to me.

"Near by was a slippery-elm tree. From this I was told to make a slippery-elm poultice and fill the wound with it.

"My eldest boy was sent to get the slippery-elm from the roots, the poultice was made, and the wound, which took fully a quarter of a yard of linen to cover, so large was it, was properly dressed.

"It was then I found vent to my feelings in tears, and resigned myself to the anguish of the hour. And all that night we, a few poor, stricken women, were thus left there with our dead and wounded. All through the night we heard the groans of the dying. Once in the dark we crawled over the heap of dead in the blacksmith's shop to try to help or soothe the sufferers' wants; once we followed the cries of a wounded brother who hid in some bushes from the murderers, and relieved him all we could.

"It has passed from my memory whether he was dead in the morning or whether he recovered.

"Next morning brother Joseph Young came to the scene of the massacre.

"'What shall be done with the dead?' he inquired, in horror and deep trouble.

"There was no time to bury them, for the mob was coming on us. Neither were there left men to dig the graves. All the men, excepting the two or three who had so narrowly escaped, were dead or wounded. It had been no battle, but a massacre indeed.

"'Do anything, Brother Joseph,' I said. 'rather than leave their bodies to the fiends who have killed them.'

"There was a deep, dry well close by. Into this the bodies had to be hurried, eighteen or nineteen in number.

"No funeral service could be performed, nor could they be buried with customary decency. The lives of those who in terror performed the last duty to the dead were in jeopardy. Every moment we expected to be fired upon by the fiends who we supposed were lying in ambush waiting the first opportunity to dispatch the remaining few who had escaped the slaughter of the preceeding day. So in the hurry and terror of the moment some were thrown into the well head downwards and some feet downwards.

"But when it came to the burial of my murdered boy Sardius, Brother Joseph Young, who was assisting to carry him on a board to the well, laid down the corpse and declared that he could not throw that boy into this horrible grave.

"All the way on the journey, that summer, Joseph had played with the interesting lad who had been so cruelly murdered. It was too much for one whose nature was so tender as Uncle Joseph's and whose sympathies by this time were quite overwrought. He could not perform that last office. My murdered son was left unburied.

"'Oh, they have left my Sardius unburied in the sun!' I cried, and ran and got a sheet and covered his body.

"There he lay until the next day, and then I, his mother, assisted by his elder brother, had to throw him into the well. Straw and earth were thrown into this rude vault to cover the dead.

"Among the wounded who recovered were Isaac Laney, Nathaniel K. Knight, Mr. Yokum, two brothers by the name of Myers, Tarlton Lewis, Mr. Haun and several others besides Miss Mary Stedwell, who was shot through the hand while fleeing with me, and who, fainting, fell over the log into which the mob shot upwards of twenty balls.

"The crawling of my boys under the bellows in the blacksmith's shop where the tragedy occurred, is an incident familiar to all our people. Alma's hip was shot away while thus hiding. Sardius was discovered after the massacre by the monsters who came in to dispoil the bodies. The eldest, Willard, was not discovered. In cold blood, one Glaze, of Carroll County, presented a rifle near the head of Sardius and literally blew off the upper part of it, leaving the skull empty and dry while the brains and hair of the murdered boy were scattered around and on the walls.

"At this, one of the men, more merciful than the rest, observed:

" 'It was a d—d shame to kill those little boys.'

" 'D—n the difference!' retorted the other; 'nits make lice!'

"My son, who escaped, also says that the mobocrat William Mann took from my husband's feet, before he was dead, a pair of new boots. From his hiding place, the boy saw the ruffian drag his father across the shop in the act of pulling off his boot.

" 'Oh! you hurt me!' groaned my husband. But the murderer dragged him back again, pulling off the other boot; 'and there,' says the boy, 'my father fell over dead.'

"Afterwards this William Mann showed the boots on his own feet, in Far West, saying: 'Here is a pair of boots that I pulled off before the d—d Mormon was done kicking!'

"The murderer Glaze also boasted over the country, as a heroic deed, the blowing off the head of my young son.

"But to return to Alma, and how the Lord helped me to save his life.

"I removed the wounded boy to a house, some distance off, the next day, and dressed his hip; the Lord directing me as before. I was reminded that in my husband's trunk there was a bottle of balsam. This I poured into the wound, greatly soothing Alma's pain.

" 'Alma, my child,' I said, 'you believe that the Lord made your hip?'

" 'Yes, mother.'

" 'Well, the Lord can make something there in the place of your hip, don't you believe he can, Alma?'

" 'Do you think that the Lord can, mother?' inquired the child, in his simplicity.

" 'Yes, my son,' I replied, 'he has showed it all to me in a vision.'

"Then I laid him comfortably on his face, and said: 'Now you lay like that, and don't move, and the Lord will make you another hip.'

"So Alma laid on his face for five weeks, until he was entirely recovered—a flexible gristle having grown in place of the missing joint and socket, which remains to this day a marvel to physicians.

"On the day that he walked again I was out of the house fetching a bucket of water, when I heard screams from the children. Running back, in affright, I entered, and there was Alma on the floor, dancing around, and the children screaming in astonishment and joy.

"It is now nearly forty years ago, but Alma has never been the least crippled during his life, and he has traveled quite a long period of the time as a missionary of the gospel and a living miracle of the power of God.

"I cannot leave the tragic story without relating some incidents of those five weeks when I was a prisoner with my wounded boy in Missouri, near the scene of the massacre, unable to obey the order of extermination.

"All the Mormons in the neighborhood had fled out of the State, excepting a few families of the bereaved women and children who had gathered at the house of Brother David Evans, two miles from the scene of the massacre. To this house Alma had been carried after that fatal night.

"In our utter desolation, what could we women do but pray? Prayer was our only source of comfort; our Heavenly Father our only helper. None but he could save and deliver us.

"One day a mobber came from the mill with the captain's fiat:

"'The captain says if you women don't stop your d—d praying he will send down a posse and kill every d—d one of you!'

"And he might as well have done it, as to stop us poor women praying in that hour of our great calamity.

"Our prayers were hushed in terror. We dared not let our voices be heard in the house in supplication. I could pray in my bed or in silence, but I could not live thus long. This godless silence was more intolerable than had been that night of the massacre.

"I could bear it no longer. I pined to hear once more my own voice in petition to my Heavenly Father.

"I stole down into a corn-field, and crawled into a stout of corn. It was as the temple of the Lord to me at that moment. I prayed aloud and most fervently.

"When I emerged from the corn a voice spoke to me. It was a voice as plain as I ever heard one. It was no silent, strong impression of the spirit, but a voice, repeating a verse of the Saints' hymn:

"'That soul who on Jesus hath leaned for repose
I will not, I cannot, desert to his foes;
That soul, though all hell should endeavor to shake,
I'll never, no never, no never forsake!'

"From that moment I had no more fear. I felt that nothing could hurt me. Soon after this the mob sent us word that unless we were all out of the State by a certain day we should be killed.

"The day came, and at evening came fifty armed men to execute the sentence.

"I met them at the door. They demanded of me why I was not gone? I bade them enter and see their own work. They crowded into my room and I showed them my wounded boy. They came, party after party, until all had seen my excuse. Then they quarreled among themselves and came near fighting.

"At last they went away, all but two. These I thought were detailed to kill us. Then the two returned.

"'Madam,' said one, 'have you any meat in the house?'

"'No,' was my reply.

"'Could you dress a fat hog if one was laid at your door?'

"'I think we could!' was my answer.

"And then they went and caught a fat hog from a herd which had belonged to a now exiled brother, killed it and dragged it to my door, and departed.

"These men, who had come to murder us, left on the threshold of our door a meat offering to atone for their repented intention.

"Yet even when my son was well I could not leave the State, now accursed indeed to the Saints.

The mob had taken my horses, as they had the drove of horses, and the beeves, and the hogs, and wagons, and the tents, of the murdered and exiled.

"So I went down into Daviess County (ten miles) to Captain Comstock, and demanded of him my horses. There was one of them in his yard. He said I could have it if I paid five dollars for its keep. I told him I had no money.

"I did not fear the captain of the mob, for I had the Lord's promise that nothing should hurt me. But his wife swore that the mobbers were fools for not killing the women and children as well as the men—declaring that we would 'breed up a pack ten times worse than the first.'

"I left without the captain's permission to take my horse, or giving pay for its keep; but I went into his yard and took it, and returned to our refuge unmolested.

"Learning that my other horse was at the mill, I next yoked up a pair of steers to a sled and went and demanded it also.

"Comstock was there at the mill. He gave me the horse, and then asked if I had any flour.

"'No; we have had none for weeks.'

"He then gave me about fifty pounds of flour and some beef, and filled a can with honey.

"But the mill, and the slaughtered beeves which hung plentifully on its walls, and the stock of flour and honey, and abundant spoil besides, had all belonged to the murdered or exiled Saints.

"Yet was I thus providentially, by the very murderers and mobocrats themselves, helped out of the State of Missouri.

"The Lord had kept his word. The soul who on Jesus had leaned for succor had not been forsaken even in this terrible hour of massacre, and in that infamous extermination of the 'Mormons' from Missouri in the years 1838-39.

"One incident more, as a fitting close.

"Over that rude grave—that well—where the martyrs slept, where my murdered husband and boy were entombed, the mobbers of Missouri, with an exquisite fiendishness, which no savages could have conceived, had constructed a rude privy. This they constantly used, with a delight which demons might have envied, if demons are more wicked and horribly beastly than were they."

It was in the depth of winter that Amanda Smith thus was compelled to leave the State of Missouri in an open wagon, and she had to travel hundreds of miles through snow, frost, mud and storms, with no help but that of an eleven years old boy, with three other children, and one of them the wounded lad, suffering untold hardships. She next located in Illinois, where Nauvoo afterwards was built, and from that city she was again driven by mob violence a few years later. She came to Utah in 1850, and resided continuously in Salt Lake City, until a few months before her death, when she, having become too feeble to live alone, went to Richmond, Cache County, to live with her daughter, Alvira Hendricks, where she died June 30, 1886, being 77 years 4 months and 8 days old. The cause of death was paralysis, superinduced by old age. She passed quietly away, surrounded by children, many relatives and friends. She was the mother of eight children, six of whom were living at the time of her death, and had 67 grandchildren and 32 great-grandchildren.

Amanda Smith was beloved by all who knew her good works and sterling qualities. She was ever unflinching and firm in her faith in the gospel, and rejoiced to see her children emulate her good works.

PRESIDING PATRIARCHS.

Joseph Smith, sen., father of the Prophet Joseph Smith, was the first Presiding Patriarch of the Church. He was ordained to that high and holy calling, Dec. 18, 1833, at Kirtland, Ohio, under the hands of the Prophet Joseph, Oliver Cowdery, Sidney Rigdon and Frederick G. Williams. Father Smith continued as Patriarch until his death, which occurred at Nauvoo, Ill., September 14, 1840. On January 19, 1841, in an important revelation given through the Prophet Joseph, Hyrum Smith, Father Smith's eldest living son, who then acted as second counselor in the First Presidency, was called to succeed his father as Patriarch. He received the office Jan. 24, 1841, and kept it until his martyrdom in Carthage Jail, Ill., June 27, 1844. His brother William Smith, who was also a member of the quorum of Twelve Apostles, succeeded him by virtue of his birthright, or age, but he apostatised and was finally excommunicated from the Church, Oct. 12, 1845, at Nauvoo, Ill. John Smith, brother of the late Joseph Smith, sen., who had previously been ordained a Patriarch in Nauvoo, was ordained and sustained as the Presiding Patriarch of the Church, January 1, 1849, in Great Salt Lake City. Uncle John Smith, as he was familiarly called, died May 23, 1854, in Great Salt Lake City, and on June 28th, following, John Smith, son of the martyred Hyrum Smith, was chosen Patriarch of the Church in his place. He was ordained Feb. 18, 1855, and is the present incumbent of the office, which is the only hereditary office in the Church.

JOSEPH SMITH, SEN.,

The first Presiding Patriarch of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, and father of the Prophet Joseph Smith, was born July 12, 1771, in Topsfield, Essex County, Mass.; he was the second of the seven sons of Asahel and Mary Smith. Asahel was born in Topsfield, March 7, 1744; he was the youngest son of Samuel and Priscilla Smith. Samuel was born January 26, 1714, in Topsfield; he was the eldest son of Samuel and Rebecca Smith. Samuel was born in Topsfield, January 26, 1666, and was the son of Robert and Mary Smith, who emigrated from Old England.

Joseph Smith sen. removed with his father to Tunbridge, Orange County, Vermont, in 1791, and assisted in clearing a large farm of a heavy growth of timber. He married Lucy, daughter of Solomon and Lydia Mack, on Jan. 24, 1796, by whom he had 10 children, namely:

Alvin Smith,	born	Feb. 11,	1798.
Hyrum,	"	Feb. 9,	1800.
Sophronia,	"	May 16,	1803.
Joseph	"	Dec. 23,	1805.
Sam'l Harrison,	"	March 13,	1808.
Ephraim,	"	March 13,	1810.
William,	"	March 13,	1811.
Catherine,	"	July 28,	1812.
Don Carlos,	"	March 25,	1816.
Lucy,	"	July 18,	1824.

At his marriage he owned a handsome farm in Tunbridge. In 1802 he rented it and engaged in mercantile business, and soon after embarked in a venture of ginseng to send to China, and was swindled out of the entire proceeds by the shipmaster and agent; he was consequently obliged to sell his farm and all of his effects to pay his debts.

About the year 1816 he moved to Palmyra, Wayne County, New York, bought a farm and cleared 200 acres, which he lost in consequence of not being able to pay the last instalment of the purchase money at the time it was due. This was the case with a great number of farmers in New York who had cleared land under similar contracts. He afterwards moved to Manchester, Ontario County, New York, procured a comfortable home with 16 acres of land, where he lived until he removed to Kirtland, Ohio.

He was the first person who received his son Joseph's testimony after he had seen the angel, and exhorted him to be faithful and diligent to the message he had received. He was baptized April 6, 1830.

In August, 1830, in company with his son Don Carlos, he took a mission to St. Lawrence County, New York, touching on his route at several of the Canadian ports, where he distributed a few copies of the Book of Mormon, visited his father, brothers and sisters residing in St. Lawrence County, bore testimony to the truth, which resulted eventually in all the family coming into the Church, excepting his brother Jesse and sister Susan.

He removed with his family to Kirtland in 1831, was ordained Patriarch and president of the High Priesthood, under the hands of Joseph Smith, Oliver Cowdery, Sidney Rigdon and Frederick G. Williams, on December 18, 1833, and was a member of the first High Council, organized in Kirtland, Ohio, Feb. 17, 1834.

In 1836 he traveled in company with his brother John 2,400 miles in Ohio, New York, Pennsylvania, Vermont and New Hampshire, visiting the branches of the Church in those States, and bestowing Patriarchal blessings on several hundred persons, preaching the gospel to all who would hear, and baptizing many. They arrived at Kirtland October 2, 1836.

During the persecutions in Kirtland, in 1837, he was made a prisoner, but fortunately obtained his liberty, and after a very tedious journey in the spring and summer of 1838, he arrived at Far West, Missouri. After his sons Hyrum and Joseph were thrown into the Missouri jails by the mob, he fled from under the exterminating order of Governor Lilburn W. Boggs, and made his escape in midwinter to Quincy, Illinois, from whence he removed to Commerce in the spring of 1839, and thus became one of the founders of Nauvoo.

The exposures he suffered brought on consumption, of which he died September 14, 1840, aged 69 years, two months and two days. He was 6 feet 2 inches high, was very straight, and remarkably well proportioned. His ordinary weight was about 200 pounds, and he was very strong and active. In his younger days he was famed as a wrestler, and, Jacob like, he never wrestled with but one man whom he could not throw. He was one of the most benevolent of men, opening his house to all who were destitute. While at Quincy, Illinois, he fed hundreds of the poor Saints who were flying from the Missouri persecutions, although he had arrived there penniless himself.

HYRUM SMITH,

The second Presiding Patriarch of the Church. (See page 71.)

WILLIAM SMITH,

The third Presiding Patriarch of the Church. (See page 44.)

JOHN SMITH,

The fourth Presiding Patriarch of the Church, was born in Derryfield (now Manchester), Rockingham Co., New Hampshire, July 16, 1781. He was a son of Asahel and Mary Smith (formerly Mary Duty) and uncle to the Prophet Joseph. In 1815 he married Clarissa Lyman, by whom he had three children—George Albert, Caroline and John Lyman.

The subject of Joseph Smith's mission was introduced to John Smith by his brother Joseph, the Prophet's father, which resulted in his baptism January 9, 1832, at a time of sickness near to death, and when the ice had to be cut to reach the water; but from that time he gained health and strength, although he had been given up by the doctors to die of consumption. He was at the same time ordained an Elder.

In 1833, he moved to Kirtland, Ohio, and in 1838 to Far West, Caldwell County, Missouri, and thence to Adam-ondi-Ahman, in Daviess County, where he presided over that branch of the Church until expelled by the mob in 1839, and arrived in Illinois on the 28th of February of that year. He located at Green Plains, six miles from Warsaw, where he put in a crop of corn, split rails, and performed much hard labor unsuited to his health and years, but obliged to be done for the support of his family. In June he moved to Commerce (since Nauvoo), and on October 5th was appointed to preside over the Church in Iowa. On the 12th he moved to Lee County, to fulfil that mission.

In October, 1843, he moved to Macedonia, Hancock County, Illinois, having been appointed to preside over the Saints in that place. In January, 1844, he was ordained a Patriarch, and in November, of that year, was driven by mobbers from Macedonia to Nauvoo, where he continued to administer Patriarchal blessings, to the joy of thousands, until February 9, 1846, when he was compelled by the mob violence of the free and sovereign State of Illinois to again leave his home and cross the Mississippi River with his family, in search of a peaceful location far off amid savages and deserts, in the valleys of the mountains.

After passing a dreary winter on the right bank of the Missouri, at Winter Quarters, he again took up the weary ox train march on the 9th of June, 1847, and reached Great Salt Lake Valley September 23rd, where he presided over the Church in the mountains until January 1, 1849, when he was ordained Presiding Patriarch over the Church, under the hands of Presidents Brigham Young and Heber C. Kimball.

He moved out of the Fort on to his city lot in February, 1849, and this was the only spot on which he had been privileged to cultivate a garden two years in succession during the last twenty-three years of his life.

In addition to a vast amount of varied and efficient aid to thousands in the way of salvation, during his long and faithful ministry, he administered 5,560 Patriarchal blessings, which were recorded in seven large and closely written books; and when he died in Great Salt Lake City, Utah, May 23, 1854, "he," writes the editor of the Deseret News, "closed the arduous duties of a well occupied probation, and passed to a position of rest, where his works will nobly follow and honor him, and where he will continue his able counsels for the prosperity and welfare of Zion."

JOHN SMITH,

The fifth Presiding Patriarch of the Church, is the eldest son of Hyrum and Jerusha Smith (formerly Jerusha Barden), and was born at Kirtland, Ohio, September 22, 1832. With his father's family he went to Missouri in 1838, and with them removed to Illinois. After remaining a short time at Quincy, the family removed to Commerce (since Nauvoo), from which period he has shared in the various vicissitudes through which the Church has passed. He was baptized by John Taylor in 1841, and arrived in Great Salt Lake Valley in 1848. For several years he occupied himself in farming pursuits, and was at that time also very skilful in training wild horses and mules. After the death of his stepmother, Mary Fielding Smith, in 1852, the duties of providing for the family devolved mainly upon him.

In the spring of 1840 he was enrolled in a company of horsemen and, during the succeeding ten years, did much valuable military service in protecting the settlements against the attacks of marauding Indians. On the 25th of December, 1853, he married Miss Helen Maria Fisher, by whom he has had nine children— five sons and four daughters. After the death of the Presiding Patriarch, Father John Smith, he succeeded to the vacant office, and, February 18, 1855, was ordained and set apart to that calling, which he had inherited from his father Hyrum, but at his death was not old enough to officiate in. At the April Conference following his ordination he was unanimously sustained in this appointment.

In the spring of 1857 he accompanied President Brigham Young and party on a visit to Fort Limhi, a new settlement, located by the Saints near Salmon River, Oregon (now Idaho), and in the fall of 1859, he crossed the plains with a four mule train for the purpose of assisting his eldest sister and family to come to the Valley. After 32 days' travel he arrived at Florence, found his sister and took her, together with her two smallest children, through Iowa on a visit to Montrose. During the winter he also visited Nauvoo and other parts of Illinois, where he found quite a number of his relatives and boyhood acquaintances. In February, 1860, he returned to Florence, where he assisted in fitting out emigrant trains for the plains, and in the following June he was called by Elder George Q. Cannon, who then acted as emigration agent on the frontiers, to lead a company to the mountains. With a company, consisting of 39 wagons and 359 souls, he arrived in Great Salt Lake City September 1, 1860.

At the general conference, held in April, 1862, he was called to take a mission to Scandinavia, on which he started on horseback May 17th, traveling part of the way in John R. Murdock's company, which went to the Missouri River after the poor. On the Sweetwater he had a severe attack of mountain fever and suffered considerably from this disease before reaching the States. When he arrived at Liverpool, England, his money was nearly gone, and he was obliged to borrow means to take him to Denmark. At Hamburg he met his cousin Jesse N. Smith, who then presided over the Scandinavian Mission, and in company with him arrived at Copenhagen in September, 1862. His health being feeble, he worked most of the time at the mission office in Copenhagen, and acquired, while there, a good knowledge of the Danish language. On April 13, 1864, he started for home and was, after the arrival at Liverpool, appointed president of a large company of Saints which crossed the Atlantic in the ship Monarch of the Sea, and arrived at New York June 3rd. He also led a company of emigrants across the plains, arriving in Great Salt Lake City, October 1st. Since that time he has been engaged in labors pertaining to his calling as Patriarch, traveling through the various settlements of the Saints, and attending to such other duties as circumstances have required.

THE TWELVE APOSTLES.

WILFORD WOODRUFF,

President of the quorum of Twelve Apostles, was born in Farmington (now Avon), Hartford County, Connecticut, March 1, 1807. He assisted his father, Aphek Woodruff, in attending the Farmington Mills, until he was twenty years of age. In April, 1827, he took charge of a flouring mill belonging to his aunt, and continued in the mill business until he, in the spring of 1832, together with his oldest brother Azmon, went to Richland, Oswego County, N. Y., and purchased a farm and saw-mill and settled in business.

At an early age his mind was exercised upon religious subjects, although he never made a profession until 1830, and then he did not join any church, for the reason that he could not find any denomination whose doctrines, faith or practice agreed with the gospel of Jesus Christ. In 1832 he was inspired to go to Rhode Island, but as he had made preparations to remove to the West, he ignored this call and went to Richland, Oswego County, N. Y., where he, on Dec. 29, 1833, heard Elders Zera Pulsipher and Elijah Cheeny preach. Young Wilford Woodruff and his brother Azmon believed their testimony and offered themselves for baptism, after having listened to the first sermon. They also read the Book of Mormon, and Wilford Woodruff received a testimony that it was true. He was baptized by Elder Zera Pulsipher Dec. 31, 1833. Soon afterwards he learned what the Lord wanted of him in Rhode Island, for at the time he and his brother Asahel were warned to go there, two Latter-day Saint Elders were preaching in that country, and had they gone, they would, no doubt, have embraced the work at that time.

On January 2, 1834, a small branch of the Church was organized at Richland by Elder Pulsipher, and Woodruff was ordained a Teacher. In February following, in company with Elder Holton, he walked 60 miles to the town of Fabius to visit some Saints, and during the winter Richland was visited by several of the Elders, among whom was Parley P. Pratt, who told Wilford Woodruff that it was his duty to go to Kirtland and join the Camp of Zion, which was about to start for Missouri. Wilford Woodruff immediately settled up his business and started for Kirtland, Ohio, where he arrived April 25, 1834. The Prophet Joseph invited him to stay at his house, which he did for about one week, during which he became acquainted with many of the leading men of the Church and had a glorious time.

On May 1, 1834, he left Kirtland, with a portion of Zion's Camp, and traveled to New Portage, Ohio, where they remained until the Prophet arrived with the remainder of the company and organized the camp. Traveling a thousand miles under the immediate leadership of the Prophet gave these young Elders considerable experience. Some of them murmured, but the majority showed that integrity and worth which afterwards qualified them for responsible positions in the Church.

As the Prophet advised all the young men who had no families to remain in Missouri, Wilford Woodruff stopped with Lyman Wight, in Clay County, Missouri, and spent the summer cutting wheat, quarrying rock, making brick, and doing other kinds of hard labor. In the fall he was ordained a Priest and sent on a mission into Arkansas and Tennessee, in company with an Elder. They started without purse or scrip, traveling through Jackson County, Missouri, from which the Saints had just been driven, and as it was dangerous for a "Mormon" to be found in that part of the State, they dared not preach. Notwithstanding this caution, they were in great danger, and in some instances they were preserved, as if by miracle, from the mob. The first time Wilford Woodruff attempted to preach was on a Sunday in December, 1834. The meeting was held in a tavern.

While traveling through the thinly inhabited parts of southern Missouri and northern Arkansas, the young missionaries frequently lost their way in the woods and swamps, where they, on several occasions, had dangerous encounters with wild beasts. Sometimes, in order to avoid heavy traveling expenses, they descended rivers in small canoes and had to endure heavy and protracted marches. Persecutions also raged against them in certain localities. The Lord, however, comforted His servants, and manifested His approbation of their labors in various ways. Thus one of their enemies, an apostate, who railed against them, was, on a certain occasion, smitten by the Lord, so that he fell dead at the feet of the missionaries, in fulfilment of a dream which Brother Woodruff had had some time previous.

While traveling from Little Rock, Arkansas, to Memphis, Tennessee, Wilford Woodruff was left by his companion sitting in an alligator swamp and being lame with a sharp pain in the back. He knelt down in the mud and prayed fervently. The Lord healed him and he went on his way rejoicing. In April, 1835, he was joined by Elder Warren Parrish, in whose company he traveled some seven hundred and sixty miles in three months and nineteen days, preaching the gospel daily. They baptized about twenty persons. Warren Parrish also ordained Wilford Woodruff an Elder and left him in charge of the branches that had been raised up in that neighborhood.

As soon as he was left alone, Wilford Woodruff extended his circuit and labors and baptized a number, among whom were several Campbellites. During the year 1835 he traveled altogether 3,248 miles, held 170 meetings, baptized 43 persons and organized three branches of the Church.

In the early part of 1836 Wilford Woodruff had A. O. Smoot, of Kentucky, for a missionary companion, and on April 21 he met Apostle David W. Patten, who brought good news from the headquarters of the Church, at Kirtland, Ohio. On May 31, Wilford Woodruff was ordained a member of the second quorum of Seventy, under the hands of David W. Patten and Warren Parrish. After continuing his missionary labors, in company with Elders Patten, Smoot and others, he finally returned to Ohio in the fall of 1836, and spent the winter in Kirtland, during which he received his endowments and went to school. On the 13th of April, 1837, he was married to Miss Phoebe Whitmore Carter, and received his patriarchal blessings under the hands of Father Joseph Smith two days later. In the following month he left Kirtland on a mission to the Fox Islands, situated southeast of the Maine shore. On his journey thither he preached to his relatives in Connecticut and baptized some of them. On Aug. 20th he landed on North Fox Island, in company with Jonathan H. Hale, and immediately commenced to preach the gospel with success. On Sept. 3rd they baptized Justin Eames, a sea captain, and his wife, as the first fruits of preaching the fulness of the gospel on the islands of the sea in this dispensation. Mr. Newton, a Baptist minister, who at first allowed the Elders to preach in his meetinghouse, but afterwards opposed them, had to pass through the experience of seeing the best of his Church leave him to accept "Mormonism," and a Methodist minister by the name of Douglas had a similar experience on the South Island. Finally two branches were organized, one on each island, and in October the two successful missionaries returned to Scarboro, Maine, where Wilford Woodruff had left his wife with her father's family.

In the beginning of November Elder Woodruff, having parted with Jonathan H. Hale, returned to Fox Islands, this time accompanied by his wife. He continued to preach and baptize until persecutions of a severe nature arose, when he thought it wise to return to the main land. Next, in company with James Townsend, whom he had ordained an Elder, he introduced the gospel in the city of Bangor and several towns in Maine, after which he returned to the Fox Islands, and, agreeable to instructions received from the headquarters of the Church, he began to counsel the Saints to sell their property and accompany him to the land of Zion. In the spring of 1838, he visited Boston, Providence and New York. From the latter city he went to Farmington, Connecticut, where he baptized his father, stepmother, sister and other relatives and organized them into a branch of the Church. Taking an affectionate leave of his relatives, he returned to Scarboro, where his first child, a daughter, was born, July 14th. After this event he again visited Fox Islands.

While holding meetings with the Saints in North Vinal Haven, Aug. 9th, he received a letter from Thomas B. Marsh, then president of the Twelve Apostles, informing him that he had been chosen by revelation to fill a vacancy in that quorum, and he was requested to come to Far West, Missouri, as soon as possible, in order to prepare for a mission to England in the spring. He immediately set to work arranging for the emigration of the Fox Island Saints westward. He had baptized nearly one hundred persons on the Islands, and about fifty of these now made ready to accompany him to Missouri. Assisted by Nathaniel Thomas, who had sold his property and had money, Elder Woodruff went to the main land and purchased ten new wagons, ten sets of harness and twenty horses, which outfit cost about two thousand dollars. When everything was prepared, he went on ahead of the company to Scarboro to prepare his own family for the journey. The company, instead of starting no later than Sept. 1st, as they were counseled to do, did not get under way until the beginning of October, which caused the journey to be a very hard one.

"On the afternoon of October 9th," writes Elder Woodruff, "we took leave of Father Carter and family (in Scarboro) and started upon our journey of two thousand miles at this late season of the year, taking my wife with a suckling babe at her breast with me, to lead a company of fifty-three souls from Maine to Illinois, and to spend nearly three months in traveling in wagons, through rain, mud, snow and frost."

While crossing the Green Mountains, Oct. 13, 1838, Wilford Woodruff was attacked with sickness, and a few weeks later his wife was reduced to the point of death, from which, however, she was rescued by the power of God, through prayer and administrations. (See under Phoebe Woodruff.) Finally he arrived, with most of his company, in Rochester, Ill., Dec. 19, 1838, and, getting information of the Missouri persecutions and the unsettled affairs of the Church, the Saints concluded to stop at that place during the remainder of the winter.

In the following spring Elder Woodruff took his family to Quincy, Illinois, and shortly afterwards accompanied the Twelve to Far West, Mo., where a secret conference was held early in the morning of April 26, 1839, on which occasion Wilford Woodruff and Geo. A. Smith were ordained members of the quorum of Twelve Apostles. After his return from Missouri, Wilford Woodruff removed his family to Montrose, Iowa, where he was severely attacked with chills and fever. When he, on August 8th, started on his mission to England, this disease still rested upon him, and his wife was also sick. After an adventurous journey, Elders Wilford Woodruff, John Taylor and Theodore Turley arrived in Liverpool, England, Jan. 11, 1840, and two days later they found themselves among the Saints in Preston. Elder Woodruff was sent to the Staffordshire Potteries, and he labored successfully in that neighborhood until the beginning of March, when the Spirit prompted him to go south. Arriving in Worcester he learned from Mr. John Benbow, a wealthy farmer, that there were about six hundred people in that region who had broken off from the Wesleyan Methodists and taken the name of United Brethren. They had forty-five preachers among them, owned chapels and other houses of worship, and were searching for more light and truth. To these people Wilford Woodruff commenced to preach the gospel in earnest, and after eight months' labor eighteen hundred persons had been baptized in Herefordshire, Gloucestershire and Worcestershire, including all the United Brethren except one, and two large conferences had been organized.

On the 17th of August, 1840, Elder Woodruff took leave of the Saints in Herefordshire and started on a mission to London, in company with Heber C. Kimball and George A. Smith. Here they found it exceedingly hard to open a missionary field, but they finally succeeded and on Aug. 31st commenced to baptize, the first candidate for baptism being Henry Connor, a watchmaker. After twenty-three days' labor in London, Wilford Woodruff returned to Herefordshire, where he met with the Saints in conference and then paid a visit to Staffordshire. On Oct. 6, 1840, he attended a general conference of the Church in Manchester, and spent most of the following winter in London. He also made several visits to other parts of England.

After a prosperous mission, most of the Twelve, including Wilford Woodruff, sailed from Liverpool April 21, 1841, and arrived in New York May 20th. On June 2nd Elder Woodruff arrived at Scarboro, Maine, where he met his wife, after two years' separation. About a month later he continued the journey westward, arriving in Nauvoo October 5th.

On the 30th of October he was appointed a member of the city council of Nauvoo, and spent the winter of 1841-42 attending meetings and laboring with his hands. On Feb. 3, 1842, he took charge of the business department of the Times and Seasons. In the following July he again left Nauvoo on a mission to the Eastern States, to collect funds for the Temple and Nauvoo House; from this trip he returned Nov. 4th. He spent the winter of 1843-44 in Nauvoo, received his endowments with the Twelve, and built a two story brick house on a lot, which the Prophet had given him.

In the spring of 1844 he was appointed on another mission to the Eastern States with the quorum of the Twelve. He was in Portland, Maine, ready to step on board of a steamer, bound for Fox Islands, when he saw an account of the martyrdom of Joseph and Hyrum Smith in Carthage Jail. He immediately returned to Boston, met in council with the Twelve and returned with them to Nauvoo, where they arrived Aug. 6th. He there attended the special conference, when the Twelve by the assembled Saints were acknowledged as the presiding quorum of the Church.

At a council of the Twelve held in Nauvoo, Aug. 12, 1844, Wilford Woodruff was called to go to England to preside over the British mission. In company with Elders Dan Jones and Hiram Clark, and their families, he left Nauvoo, Aug. 28th, and arrived in Liverpool January 3, 1845. After presiding over the mission about a year, he returned to America early in 1846, and arrived in Nauvoo at the time the Saints were leaving for the west. The following year (1847) he joined the Pioneers and arrived in Great Salt Lake Valley on the 24th of July. In 1848 he was sent on a mission to the Eastern States, from which he returned to the Valley in 1850, and in December of that year he was elected a member of the senate of the Provisional State of Deseret. In the spring of 1852, he accompanied President Brigham Young on an exploring trip to Southern Utah, and at the October Conference, 1853, he and Ezra T. Benson were called to gather fifty families to strengthen the settlements in Tooele County. When the Horticultural Society was organized in Great Salt Lake City, Sept. 13, 1855, he was chosen its president. Since the early settlement of Utah, Apostle Woodruff has been one of the very foremost in all affairs at home, and is emphatically one of the founders of the Territory of Utah. He also well deserves the name of "Wilford, the Faithful," by which he sometimes is distinguished among his friends. Ever since he was a mere boy he has kept a very complete journal, and a great deal of Church history has been compiled from his writings. In the days of Joseph Smith he reported quite a number of the Prophet's sermons, which today are very valuable. Since the death of George A. Smith he has been sustained as the principal historian of the Church, and since the re-organization of the First Presidency, in October, 1880, as president of the quorum of Twelve Apostles. He continued to be bright and active, but like many of his brethren is now forced into exile, because of the unhallowed persecution raging against the Saints and the Priesthood of God, at the present time.

GEORGE ALBERT SMITH,

A son of Patriarch John Smith and Clarissa Lyman, and cousin of Joseph Smith, the Prophet, was born on June 26, 1817, in Potsdam, St. Lawrence County, N. Y. He was trained strictly in the religion of the Congregational Church, of which his father and mother were members, until he was fifteen years of age.

While living on a farm on Rackett River and attending school in the village of Potsdam, George A. grew very rapidly, attaining his full growth several years before he became of age. This gave him an awkward address, as of an overgrown boy; and as children growing fast are usually weak, it was so with him. In addition to these misfortunes for a school boy, he was near-sighted, and being contented with his studies, the society of older people and the companionship of his own thoughts, he paid little attention to cultivating the good will and currying favor with the boys at school. The consequence was that they made fun of him, bullied him more or less, and at one time, shortly after a period of illness, carried their fun to such an extreme that George A. resolved on retaliation; but knowing his weakness at the time, he refrained attempting his revenge then and harbored his strength until a favorable opportunity should be presented. The time came, and it developed a phase of his character which was new to his schoolmates, but distinguished him then and ever after. His sensitive nature had been repeatedly outraged; he felt that he had been abused by his schoolmates, that they had taken advantage of him unfairly and that the insult to his honor and manhood demanded reparation. If any of the boys were not guilty of this general arraignment, he did not stop to discriminate in their favor. He felt that all were down on him, and he determined to whip the school. And he succeeded. He started in and kept at it until he had whipped every boy of his size and age. They never made fun of him after that.

In the winter of 1828, Father John Smith received a letter from his nephew Joseph, the Prophet, who then lived in western New York, in which a very striking prediction occurred, foretelling awful judgments upon the present generation because of wickedness and unbelief. The letter made a deep impression upon the mind of George A., who, but a boy of eleven years, was capable of appreciating the statements it contained, which he treasured in his memory. His father observed, on reading them; "That Joseph writes like a Prophet!"

In August, 1830, the father of the Prophet and his brother Don Carlos visited their relatives in Potsdam and vicinity. They brought with them a copy of the Book of Mormon, which they left with George A.'s father, while they went on to visit Father Asahel Smith and family. During their absence George A. and his mother read a great deal in the strange new book, or "Golden Bible," as it was popularly called. The neighbors, who often came in and heard portions of it read, ridiculed it and offered many objections to its contents. These young George A. soon found himself trying to answer, and although he professed no belief in the book himself, having in fact noted many serious objections to it, he was so successful in refuting the charges the neighbors brought against it that they generally turned from the argument discomfited, with the observation to his mother that her boy was a little too smart for them.

When his uncle and Don Carlos Smith returned, George A. laid before them his objections, which he believed to be unanswerable. His uncle took them up carefully, quoted the Scriptures upon the subject, showed the reasonableness of the record, and was so successful as to entirely remove every objection, and to convince him that it was just what it purported to be. George A. from that time ever after advocated the divine authenticity of the Book of Mormon. He was also convinced of the necessity of religion, and not being sufficiently instructed by his relatives how to obtain it, after they had left, he attended a protracted series of Congregational revival meetings. These lasted seventeen days, and effected the conversion of every sinner in Potsdam who attended them except George A., who went to the meeting regularly, sat in the gallery listening attentively, but waited in vain for the sensation of religion which should bring him down to the anxious bench. Finally, prayers and exhortations having failed, the minister, Rev. Frederick E. Cannon, pronounced him reprobate and sealed him up unto eternal damnation, saying, "Thy blood be upon thine own head!" Nine times he thus delivered this inoffensive but unsatisfied seeker for religion to the buffetings of Satan and the burning of an endless hell.

For two years George A. had performed the greater part of the labor on his father's farm, but in the winter of 1832-33, he attended school, and gave considerable attention to studying the gospel and its requirements. On September 10, 1832, he was baptized by Joseph H. Wakefield.

On the first day of May, 1833, he started with his parents to Kirtland, Ohio; they arrived there on the 25th of that month, and were warmly welcomed by the Prophet Joseph Smith and by the Saints who had gathered there to the number of about five hundred souls.

Immediately on reaching Kirtland, George A. became interested in the affairs of the Church, and was delighted with his cousin, the Prophet Joseph Smith, whom he had never seen before. He was on hand for any duty required, and spent many nights guarding the houses of the brethren who were in much danger from mobs. During the summer and fall he was engaged in quarrying and hauling rock for the Kirtland Temple, attending masons and performing other labor about its walls. The first two loads of rock taken to the Temple ground, were hauled from Stanard's quarry by Geo. A. Smith and Harvey Stanley.

In May, 1834, George A. started from Kirtland with Zion's Camp for the State of Missouri, and returned again to Kirtland, Ohio, in the summer, walking on foot nearly two thousand miles.

On March 1, 1835, he was ordained a Seventy, under the hands of Joseph Smith, sen., Joseph Smith, jun., and Sidney Rigdon, the latter being spokesman. He was the junior member of the First Quorum of Seventy. On the 30th of the following May, (1835) he was appointed to a mission to preach the gospel in the East. Elder Lyman Smith, a second cousin, and member of the same quorum, was his traveling companion. They started from Kirtland June 5, 1835, traveled on foot about two thousand miles, without purse and scrip, held about eighty meetings in the States of Ohio, Pennsylvania and New York, baptized eight, and returned to Kirtland, where George A. arrived October 5, 1835.

In the spring of 1836, he received his endowments in the Kirtland Temple, after which he performed a mission in Ohio, traveling on foot about twelve hundred miles.

In the spring of 1837, he commenced a mission in Ohio and Virginia, which continued about one year, traveling about two thousand and five hundred miles; nearly half of his journeyings were on foot.

In 1838, he emigrated with his father's family to Daviess County, Missouri. On June 28, 1838, he was ordained and set apart as a High Councilor. In the autumn, he was sent on a mission to Kentucky and Tennessee, traveling some 800 miles on foot and about 700 miles by water, including the return journey. After his return, he moved his father's family to Illinois.

In 1839, he returned to Far West, Caldwell County, Mo. On the morning of the 26th of April, he was ordained one of the Twelve Apostles, on the southeast corner stone of the intended Far West Temple. He returned to Illinois, and on Sept. 21st, started for England on a mission, arriving in Liverpool on April 6, 1840. He labored for over one year with much success, and then returned to America. He arrived in Nauvoo, Ill., July 5, 1841. On the 25th of the same month he married Bathsheba W. Bigler.

In the fall of 1842, he preached in the principal places in Illinois, and returned to Nauvoo November 4th.

In the summer and fall of 1843, he traveled about six thousand miles, preaching the gospel in the middle and eastern States.

In the spring of 1844, he attended conferences and preached in the States of Illinois, Indiana and Michigan, and was in the last named State when he heard of the death of the Prophet and Patriarch of the Church. He immediately returned to Nauvoo and took an active part in the councils and deliberations consequent upon that sad event.

September 17, 1844, he was elected quartermaster of the Nauvoo Legion, was also elected a trustee of the Nauvoo House Association and labored actively in forwarding the erection of that building. He continued these labors until the mob commenced its outrages upon the Saints in the fall of 1845, from which period he was active in counseling, fervent in his labors on the Temple and in making preparations for the exodus of the Saints from Nauvoo.

"Before leaving the Temple of Nauvoo," writes George A., "my wife, under the law of Abraham and Sarah, gave me five wives, viz., Lucy Smith, born February 9, 1817, at Newry, Maine; Nancy Clement, born Oct. 31, 1815, at Dryden, Tompkins County, N. Y.; Zilpha Stark, born July 3, 1818, at Hartland, Niagara County, N. Y.; Sarah Ann Libby, born May 7, 1818, at Ossipee, Stratford County, N. H., and Hannah Maria Libby, born June 29, 1828, at Ossipee, Stratford County, N. H." He also married Susan E. West after he reached Great Salt Lake Valley. Five of Brother George A.'s wives survived him. They bore unto him twenty children, eleven of whom, among them Apostle John Henry Smith, are yet living.

Early in Feb., 1846, he crossed the Mississippi River with his family, on his way to find an asylum in the west far from the rage of mobs and the persecutions of bigoted professors of religion. The ensuing winter he tarried with the main camp at Winter Quarters. While there the people suffered severely from scurvy, a disease induced through lack of vegetable diet. George A.'s third wife and four children died of this disease. He visited all the camps, and urged the cultivation of the potato as a cure for the scurvy. But little seed could be obtained; what was, however, produced in a marvelous manner. As they had no vegetables for one year, their bread was mostly made of corn, bought two hundred miles away, in Missouri. The season after Geo. A. had left Pottawattamie County, Iowa, the potato crop was a failure, and the saying went forth that it was because George A., "the potato Saint," had gone to the mountains.

In 1847, George A. accompanied President Young and the company of pioneers in searching out and making the road to and finding the location for the Church in the Great Basin. During this journey he walked seventeen hundred miles, and rode, mostly on horseback, eight hundred miles, much of the distance with raw hide soles on his shoes. He was six weeks without bread, though he was better off than most of the pioneer company, for he had about twenty-five pounds of flour locked up in his trunk, unknown to any one. He lived, as the rest of the pioneers did, on buffalo bulls and other wild meat, which was not always plentiful. He issued his reserve flour by cupsful to the sick, some of whom attribute to this circumstance the preservation of their lives. He planted the first potato that was put in the ground in Salt Lake Valley, and built a house for his father in the fort, before starting on his return to Winter Quarters, where he arrived Oct. 31st of the same year.

In 1848 Geo. A. removed to the neighborhood of Kanesville (now Council Bluffs, Iowa), and opened a farm. In 1849 he took charge of the emigration in Council Bluffs, organizing and starting the companies for the mountains. With the last of these he started westward with his family, July 4, 1849. Their teams were heavily laden, and they encountered hail and rain storms. Their cattle also stampeded, and at the South Pass they were overtaken by a heavy storm, in which seventy animals were frozen. They made the journey to Great Salt Lake City, 1034 miles, in 155 days, arriving Oct. 27th.

George A. was elected a member of the senate of the Provisional State of Deseret, and reported a bill for the organization of the judiciary, which was the first bill printed for the consideration of members. He also reported a bill in relation to the construction of a national railway across the Continent.

In December, 1850, George A. raised a company of one hundred and eighteen volunteers, accompanied by about thirty families, and started south for the purpose of planting a colony near the Little Salt Lake. The day after they started the thermometer was at zero. His company was organized at Peteetneet Creek (Payson), Utah County, and consisted of twenty-five cavalry, thirty-two infantry—picked men—and thirteen men in charge of a piece of artillery; the residue was organized as a permanent camp guard. They crossed five ranges of mountains, and arrived at Center Creek, 265 miles from Salt Lake City, on Jan. 13, 1851. This place had been designated by Elder Parley P. Pratt, and a company of explorers, as the place in the Little Salt Lake Valley suitable for a settlement. As soon as the site of the town was determined upon, the settlers commenced working a road into a canyon about six miles, which cost them five hundred days' work, where they cut down a pole ninety-nine feet long, which they erected and on which they raised the "Stars and Stripes." They dedicated the ground by prayer, and saluted the emblem of civil and religious liberty by the firing of cannon.

The organization of Iron County had been provided for by the General Assembly of Deseret, which had elected George A. Smith its chief justice, with power to proceed with its further organization. An election was held, when two associate justices, a county recorder, a treasurer, sheriff, assessor and collector, justice of the peace, constable and a member of the House of Representatives of the General Assembly of Deseret, were elected.

In the winter of 1850-51, though it was very cold, the settlers built a fort, in which were located dwelling houses and a meeting house, which served for meetings, schools and watch tower. It was in the shape of a Greek cross, and was of hewn logs. It served the town, which was named Parowan, for fifteen years, when it was replaced by a stately stone edifice. George A. taught school during the first winter, having thirty-five pupils whom he lectured on English grammar around the evening camp fires.

At the first Territorial election, in August, 1851, George A. was elected a member of the council of the first legislative assembly of Utah. He was commisioned by Postmaster-General Hall, on October 29, 1851, postmaster of Center Creek, Iron County, and on the 29th of November, by Governor Young, colonel of cavalry in the Iron Military District. Afterwards he was placed in command of the militia of the southern part of the Territory, and was instructed to take measures for the defense and safety of the inhabitants against the Utah Indians, who had commenced, under their chief Walker, to rob and kill the inhabitants. In 1852 he left Iron County, and was appointed to preside over the affairs of the Church in Utah County. He traveled and preached a great deal in all the settlements, over which he had the watchcare.

At the general conference of the Church held in April, 1854, he was elected Historian and General Church Recorder, and immediately went to work compiling the documentary history of Joseph Smith. On Feb. 2, 1855, he was admitted as a member of the bar of the Supreme Court of the Territory of Utah, and received his certificate as an attorney, counselor-at-law and solicitor in chancery. He was elected a member of the convention and one of the committee which drafted a constitution, and on March 27, 1856, was elected by said convention, in connection with Elder John Taylor, a delegate to Congress, to present the constitution and accompanying memorial, asking for admission into the Union on an equal footing with the original States. This mission was a respite from his close application in the Historian's Office, where he had, with the assistance of four clerks, compiled and recorded, in large records, the history of Joseph Smith from February 20, 1843, until his martyrdom in June, 1844. He also supplied, from memory and otherwise, blanks in the history and records compiled by President Willard Richards, his predecessor in the Historian's Office, who had, with prophetic pencil, written on the margin, opposite the blanks, "to be supplied by George A. Smith."

In 1856-57, during a sojourn of about eleven months in the States, in addition to his duties as delegate, George A. preached in the States of Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Virginia, Ohio, Illinois, Iowa and Missouri. April 11, 1866, he received from Governor Durkee the commission of brigadier-general and was appointed aide-de-camp to the lieutenant-general of the Nauvoo Legion. At the October conference, in 1868, he was appointed to succeed the late President Heber C. Kimball as first counselor to President Brigham Young.

The political career of President George A. Smith covered almost the whole period of his residence in Utah. He was an earnest worker in establishing the provisional government of the State of Deseret, and afterwards in organizing and enacting laws for the government of the Territory of Utah. He was elected a member of the first legislature and re-elected to every succeeding session but one, when absent in the States, until 1870. The last six years he was president of the council, and was distinguished for his punctuality and impartiality in the discharge of his official duties. More than half of his life was occupied in traveling and preaching the gospel. He had, before 1870, delivered three thousand eight hundred discourses in various parts of the world, as a labor of love, and never failed to use every opportunity to advocate the principles of the gospel, which his long and laborious missionary experience afforded him.

In the internal affairs of the Territory, President Smith was an active laborer. He was recognized as the father of the southern settlements, the chief of which, St. George, was named in his honor. He was president of several irrigation canal companies, and was foremost in public enterprises leading to the occupation and development of the county, the establishment of home industries and of commercial relations among the people that would tend to make them free and independent of other communities, and at the same time utilize the natural resources with which the Territory abounds.

On October 15, 1872, he started on a mission and visit to the various European nations and to Jerusalem, from whence he returned June 18, 1873. During his absence on this tour, he was appointed and sustained as Trustee-in-Trust for the Church, which office he held until his death. After his return he gave considerable attention to the building of the Temple at St. George, where he spent a great deal of time. He was a zealous advocate and laborer in the establishment of the United Order among the people. The discourses he delivered in many of the towns of Utah, upon that subject, were preeminently characteristic of him as a political and domestic economist.

In the spring of 1875, about the time of his return from St. George, he was attacked by a severe cold, which, locating on his lungs, inflamed and irritated them in such a manner as to prevent their use in public speaking. This affliction was supplemented with a very peculiar affection preventing sleep, except in an upright posture, and then but at short intervals. He suffered intensely from this combination of diseases for several months, resisting the power of the destroyer with all the fortitude of a strong will and a desire to live, aided by the most sublime faith. He had the support of the prayers of all the people, among whom he was ever a great favorite; but they did not prevail over the decree of Him who doeth all things well. "Brother George A.'s time had come," was the expression of all his friends, and on Wednesday morning, September 1, 1875, they bowed to the eternal fiat.

President Brigham Young remarked on the morning of his death: "I have known Brother George A. Smith for forty-two years, have traveled and labored in the ministry with him for many years, and have believed him to be as faithful a boy and man as ever lived; and, in my opinion, he had as good a record on this and the other side of the vail as any man. I never knew of his neglecting or overdoing a duty; he was a man of sterling integrity; a cabinet of history, and always true to his friends."

WILLARD RICHARDS,

A son of Joseph and Rhoda Richards, was born at Hopkinton, Middlesex County, Massachusetts, June 24, 1804; and from the religious teaching of his parents, he was the subject of religious impressions from his earliest moments, although careless and indifferent in his external deportment. At the age of ten years he removed with his father's family to Richmond, in the same State, where he witnessed several sectarian "revivals," and offered himself to the Congregational Church in that place, at the age of seventeen, having previously passed the painful ordeal of conviction and conversion, according to that order, even to the belief that he had committed the unpardonable sin. But the total disregard of that church to his request for admission, led him to a more thorough investigation of the principles of religion, when he became convinced that the sects were all wrong, and that God had no church on earth, but that he would soon have a church whose creed would be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. From that time he kept himself aloof from sectarian influence, boldly declaring his belief to all who wished to learn his views, until the summer of 1835. While in the practice of medicine, near Boston, the Book of Mormon, which President Brigham Young had left with his cousin Lucius Parker, at Southborough, accidentally or providentially fell in his way. This was the first he had seen or heard of the Latter-day Saints, except the scurrillous records of the public prints, which amounted to nothing more than that "a boy named Joe Smith, somewhere out west, had found a Gold Bible." He opened the book, without regard to place, and totally ignorant of its design or contents, and before reading half a page, declared that, "God or the devil has had a hand in that book, for man never wrote it." He read it twice through in about ten days; and so firm was his conviction of the truth, that he immediately commenced settling his accounts, selling his medicine, and freeing himself from every incumbrance, that he might go to Kirtland, Ohio, seven hundred miles west, the nearest point he could hear of a Saint, and give the work a thorough investigation, firmly believing, that if the doctrine was true, God had some greater work for him to do than peddle pills. But no sooner did he commence a settlement, than he was smitten with the palsy, from which he suffered exceedingly, and was prevented executing his design until October, 1836, when he arrived at Kirtland, in company with his brother (Doctor Levi Richards, who attended him as physician), where he was most cordially and hospitably received and entertained by his cousin, President Brigham Young, with whom he tarried, and gave the work an unceasing and untiring investigation.

On Dec. 31, 1836, he was baptized by Brigham Young, at Kirtland, Ohio, and on March 6, 1837, ordained an Elder by Alva Beeman. A few days later he left Kirtland on a mission to the Eastern States, from which he returned June 11th. On the day following he was blessed and set apart by the Prophet Joseph Smith to accompany Heber C. Kimball, Orson Hyde and others on a mission to England. They started on the 13th.

Having arrived safely in England, and the gospel door having been successfully opened in Preston, Willard Richards was sent to Bedford, and surrounding country, where he labored with much success, notwithstanding bitter opposition. He returned to Preston in February, 1838, and on April 1st attended a general conference, where he was ordained a High Priest and appointed first counselor to Joseph Fielding, who was appointed to preside over the mission after Elder Heber C. Kimball and Orson Hyde returned to America.

On September 24th Richards married Jennetta Richards, daughter of the Rev. John Richards. During the following year he continued his missionary labors in Manchester, Bolton, Salford, Burslem, Preston and other places.

On April 14, 1840, after the arrival of the Apostles from America, Willard Richards was ordained one of the Twelve Apostles, to which high and holy position he had been called by direct revelation, and after the publication of the Millennial Star was commenced, he assisted Parley P. Pratt in its editorial department, and also performed the general duties of presiding over the mission.

In February, 1841, he removed his family from Preston to Manchester, and in the following April left England with others of the Twelve to return to Nauvoo, where he arrived Aug. 16th.

Agreeable to the council of the Twelve he located at Warsaw, Hancock County, Ill., for a short time. On October 30th he was elected a member of the city council of Nauvoo and removed to that city in December following. Two days later (December 13th) he was appointed recorder for the Temple, private secretary to Joseph Smith and general Church clerk. He commenced his labors in Joseph's new office, in the brick store.

From the time he entered Joseph's office, with the exception of a short mission to the East after his family, he was with the Prophet Joseph until the Prophet's death, continually at work with his pen, while was able to sit up.

He was recorder of the city council and clerk of the municipal court. He kept Joseph Smith's private journals, making an entry only a few minutes previous to the awful tragedy at Carthage. And in the face of a hundred muskets, in the hands of infuriated mobbers, he thrust his head out of the window to catch a glimpse of his dying President, and there remained gazing intently upon the mangled body until he was satisfied that the innocent spirit had fled.

His "Two Minutes in Jail" is one of the most thrilling documents ever written, and his parrying muskets with a walking stick is one of the most unequal contests on record. God preserved him without the loss of a drop of blood, and without a "hole in his robe."

During the catastrophe of Joseph and Hyrum's death, and the emergency into which the Church was suddenly thrown, Doctor Richards felt the burden of giving directions to the affairs of the Church in Hancock County, in consequence of the absence of the Twelve Apostles. Though standing in the midst of the murderous mob at Carthage, with the mangled bodies of his martyred friends, and that of Elder John Taylor, under his charge, his letters and counsels at that time indicated great self-command and judgment. His ability was happily commensurate with such an occasion.

At the time of the expulsion from Nauvoo, he acted as Church Historian, having been appointed to that position as early as December, 1842.

In the spring of 1847 he was enrolled in the memorable band of Pioneers, under President Brigham Young, that first marked out a highway for the immigrating Saints to Great Salt Lake Valley. After his return to Winter Quarters he was elected second counselor to President Young, in which capacity he continued to act until his death. In the fall of 1848, he arrived in Great Salt Lake Valley a second time, as captain of a large company of Saints.

As a civil officer, he served as secretary to the government of the State of Deseret, and did the greatest share of the business of the secretary of the Territory of Utah, after its organization as a Territory, and presided over the council of the legislative assembly for about the same period.

He was also postmaster of Great Salt Lake City up to the time of his death, and enjoyed the full confidence of the Postmaster-General, who respected his judgment touching postal arrangements throughout the mountain Territories. He was an efficient member of the Emigrating Fund Company, whose duties affected the interest and gathering of tens of thousands.

In the quorum of the First Presidency, he magnified his high calling to the day of his death, ever shedding light and consolation, in his sphere, upon the minds of thousands and tens of thousands to whom he ministered.

He was the editor and proprietor of the Deseret News; also General Historian of the whole Church, and Church Recorder, for which offices he was eminently gifted. He chronicled events, dates, circumstances, and incidents, with rare accuracy of judgment and great tenacity of memory. The number of offices which he held at the time of his death indicate the confidence which the Church reposed in his great integrity and varied abilities.

That ardent love of truth, and intuitive perception of the same, which impelled him to investigate the claims of the everlasting gospel in the beginning, grew with his passing years, and became more and more manifest, by his unwavering and unflinching adherence to it, in the most perilous and troublesome times of the Church's history in after life.

He possessed a calm and even mind, and yet was rather reserved, and naturally diffident to his own superior ability. This diffidence may have caused the early part of his ministry to be undervalued. From being familiar with the minutia of the medical profession and a careful observer of clerical deportment, and thoroughly proficient in science generally, the change that swept over his past attainments and brought him down to the altar of revelation by the Holy Ghost, showed forth the reality of a new birth personified in all his subsequent life. On great and rare occasions, his masterly energies came forth like a well disciplined and invincible troop, that knew their place and prerogative to act in defense of the truth.

Beloved and respected by all who knew him, Dr. Willard Richards died in Great Salt Lake City, March 11, 1854, from palsy, which disease had preyed upon his system ever since he began to investigate the Book of Mormon.

LYMAN WIGHT,

A son of Levi Wight and Sarah Corbon, was born in the township of Fairfield, Herkimer County, New York, May 9, 1796. He served the Republic in the war of 1812-15 with Great Britain.

He united with Isaac Morley and others in forming a society in Kirtland, Ohio, conducted on the common stock principle, being one phase in the rise and progress of the Campbellite Church.

He was baptized into the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints by Oliver Cowdery in 1830, and was soon afterwards ordained to the office of an Elder. He was ordained to the office of a High Priest by Joseph Smith, at the June conference in Kirtland, 1831. While at that conference he testified he had a vision and saw the Savior. He went to Missouri in 1831, by revelation, and soon after went to Cincinnati, Ohio, on a mission to preach the gospel. On arriving in that city he called at a hotel and engaged his board for several weeks. The landlord asked him if he was a merchant. He said, "No." He asked him what his business was. He replied he was a preacher of the gospel. He asked him what order he belonged to. He answered, he was after the order of Melchizedek. He created so much curiosity that they wished to hear him preach. He told them that was his business, and if they would open the court house he would do so willingly. They obtained the house, and he delivered a series of lectures and built up a branch of the Church, and baptized upwards of one hundred. The families of Higbee were among the first baptized; they were fishermen, and Wight would fish with them through the day and preach at night. One evening he went from the fish net to the court house, and stood on the top of a stove barefooted with his trousers rolled up to his knees, and his shirt sleeves up to his elbows, and preached two hours. Some of the people remarked, "He preaches the truth, though he does not look much like a preacher."

Many that he baptized went to Jackson County, Missouri, and were with him through the persecutions of 1833. During that persecution he was a dread to his enemies and a terror to evil doers, and his life was often sought after.

He commanded the brethren in Jackson County in their defense against the mob. In one instance he was chased by seven men about six miles; they were fully armed and came upon him so suddenly that he had to mount his horse with a blind bridle, without any saddle or arms, except a pocket knife. His horse being fleet, he escaped by out-running the mobbers and leaping a deep, wide ditch, where none of his pursuers dared to follow.

On the 23rd of July, 1833, he signed an agreement with others that the Saints would leave Jackson County before the first day of January, 1834; but before that time they were all driven out. After the Saints were driven out of Jackson County into Clay County, volunteers were called for to go and visit the Prophet Joseph in Kirtland. Several of the Elders were asked by Bishop Edward Partridge if they could go; but they made excuses. Lyman Wight then stepped forward, and said he could go as well as not. The Bishop asked him what situation his family was in. He replied, his wife lay by the side of a log in the woods, with a child three days old, and he had three days' provision on hand; so he thought he could go very well. Parley P. Pratt next volunteered, and they went together to Kirtland in February, 1834. On their arrival at Kirtland, the Prophet obtained the word of the Lord and they were commanded to gather up the strength of the Lord's house to go up to Zion, and it was the will of the Lord that there should be five hundred men, but not to go up short of one hundred. In fulfilment of this commandment, Lyman Wight went through Pennsylvania, and on the 15th day of March, he attended a conference at Avon, New York; he also went through Michigan, northern Indiana and Illinois, and assisted Hyrum Smith in gathering up a company of eighteen, who joined Zion's Camp at Salt River, Missouri, June the 8th, where the camp was re-organized, and Lyman Wight was appointed the second officer. He walked the whole journey from Michigan to Clay County without stockings on his feet. By the appointment of Joseph Smith he gave a written discharge to each member of the camp when they were dismissed.

On July 3, 1834, he was set apart as one of the High Council of Missouri.

He was one of the signers of an appeal to the world, making a proclamation of peace in Missouri, July, 1834, and spent the summer of 1834 in Clay County, Missouri. He took a job of making 100,000 bricks, and building a large brick-house for Colonel Michael Arthur in Clay County; Wilford Woodruff, Milton Holmes, Heman T. Hyde and Stephen and Benjamin Winchester labored for him through the season.

Being counseled to go to Kirtland and get his endowment, Elder Wight started in the fall of 1835, and preached his way through to Kirtland, baptizing such as would receive his testimony. While on the journey he called at the city of Richmond, Indiana, and gave out an appointment to preach in the court house. He walked through the city, and, being a stranger, was unknown; but wherever he went the people were blackguarding the "Mormons," and many declared they would tar and feather the preacher when he came to meeting that night. At the time of appointment Elder Wight was at his post. There being no light provided, he went and bought candles and lighted the room. The house was soon filled with men who brought tar and feathers for the "Mormon" Elder. He preached about two hours, reproving them most severely for their meanness, wickedness and mobocratic spirit. At the close of the meeting he said, "If there is a gentleman in this congregation, I wish he would invite me to stay with him over night," whereupon a gentleman stepped forward and tendered him an invitation, which he willingly accepted. His host said, "Mr. Wight, it is astonishing how you have become so well acquainted with the people here, for you have described them very correctly." He was kindly entertained and furnished with money in the morning to aid him on his journey.

He spent the winter of 1835-36 in Kirtland, and received his endowment. He returned to the State of Missouri in 1836.

David W. Patten having preferred a charge against Elder Wight for teaching false doctrine, he was tried before the High Council at Far West, April 24, 1837. It was decided that he did teach false doctrine. He made the required acknowledgments.

He opposed the selling of land in Jackson County, Mo., and considered William W. Phelps and John Whitmer in transgression for selling theirs.

On June 28, 1838, he was chosen and ordained second counselor to John Smith, president of the Stake at Adam-ondi-Ahman, by Joseph Smith.

Sheriff Morgan, of Daviess County, had agitated the people of the surrounding counties, by asserting that he had writs against Joseph Smith and Lyman Wight, which he could not serve without endangering his life. He invited the people to assemble together in Daviess County, with their arms, so that he could summon them as a posse comitatus to make the arrest. The real design was to murder Joseph Smith and Lyman Wight, as they had not offered any resistance, neither had the sheriff made any attempt to arrest them. They went before Justice Austin A. King, at Ragland's farm, to allay this excitement, and gave bonds in the sum of two hundred and fifty dollars for their appearance in court.

Elder Wight subsequently went before three mobocratic magistrates, under the protection of General David R. Atchison's militia, and gave bonds for his appearance in court, in the sum of one thousand dollars, on a charge of misdemeanor. This examination was had in General Atchison's camp, at Netherton Spring, Daviess County, surrounded by several hundreds of the mob, and about one hundred militia. His life was repeatedly threatened, and it required the energy of Generals Atchison and Doniphan to prevent his murder. At the close of this examination, he asked for thirty writs against members of the mob, but was refused.

He was commissioned a colonel in the militia of Caldwell County, previous to his removal to Daviess County, and in that county he commanded his brethren while defending themselves against the mob.

In October, 1838, after learning that Far West was surrounded by a mob, he raised fifty-three volunteers in Adam-ondi-Ahman (25 miles distant), and repaired immediately to Far West to aid in its defense, where, with Joseph and Hyrum Smith and others, he was betrayed into the hands of his enemies, by Col. George M. Hinkle, on the 31st; and was sentenced by a court-martial to be shot next morning (November 1st) at 8 o'clock. During the evening, General Moses Wilson took him out by himself, and tried to induce him to betray Joseph Smith, and swear falsely against him; at which time the following conversation took place: General Wilson said, "Col. Wight, we have nothing against you, only that you are associated with Joe Smith. He is our enemy and a damned rascal, and would make any plan he could to kill us. You are a damned fine fellow; and if you will come out and swear against him, we will spare your life, and give you any office you want; and if you don't do it, you will be shot tomorrow at 8 o'clock." Colonel Wight replied, "General Wilson, you are entirely mistaken in your man, both in regard to myself and Joseph Smith. Joseph Smith is not an enemy to mankind; he is not your enemy, and is as good a friend as you have got. Had it not been for him, you would have been in hell long ago, for I should have sent you there, by cutting your throat, and no other man but Joseph Smith could have prevented me, and you may thank him for your life. And now, if you will give me the boys I brought from Diahman yesterday, I will whip your whole army." Wilson said, "Wight, you are a strange man; but if you will not accept my proposal, you will be shot tomorrow morning at eight." Colonel Wight replied, "Shoot and be damned."

This was the true character of Lyman Wight; he was true as the sun to Joseph Smith, and would die for his friends. He was taken to Jackson County, with Joseph, Hyrum and other prisoners. They were chained together and fed on human flesh in prison by their Christian guards, and he continued to suffer with his brethren until April 15, 1839, when he started with Joseph and Hyrum Smith, Alexander McRae and Caleb Baldwin and guard, to go to jail in Columbia, Boone County, but on the night of the 16th, the sheriff fell asleep, the guard got drunk, and the prisoners left them, and went to their families and friends in Illinois.

On October 20, 1839, Lyman Wight and Reynolds Cahoon were appointed counselors to John Smith, president of the Saints in Iowa Territory; on January 19, 1841, he was appointed one of the Nauvoo House Association.

At the April Conference following he was called and appointed to be one of the Twelve Apostles, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of David W. Patten. He was ordained April 8, 1842.

He was commissioned a brevet major-general of the Illinois militia, by Governor Carlin.

He went to Kirtland in 1842, and rebaptized about two hundred of the cold, dead members of the Church, and brought many of them to Nauvoo.

On July 1, 1843, he was examined as a witness before the municipal court of Nauvoo, and gave a plain, unvarnished account of the persecution against the Saints in Missouri, and of the sufferings of Joseph Smith and his fellow-prisoners.

During the winter of 1843-44, he was employed in the Pine Country, at Black River, Wisconsin Territory, superintending the procuring of lumber for the Temple and Nauvoo House.

In a letter directed to the Presidency and Twelve, dated Black River Falls, February 15, 1844, he wrote his views about preaching to the Indians and going to Texas.

In the spring of 1844, he started on a mission through the Eastern States, and was appointed one of the delegates of the Baltimore Convention. He delivered a speech on Bunker Hill, on General Joseph Smith's claims to the Presidency of the United States; and on hearing of the death of Joseph, he returned to Nauvoo with the Twelve.

After his return to Nauvoo, he said, "I would not turn my hand over to be one of the Twelve; the day was when there was somebody to control me, but that day is past."

When the Church removed to the Rocky Mountains, Lyman Wight and George Miller, who both rebelled against the authority of President Brigham Young, went to Texas with a small company of Saints, and settled a little south of the present site of Austin. Wight and Miller subsequently dissolved partnership, and Miller returned 130 miles north with a part of the company. At a meeting held in the Great Salt Lake City fort, December 3, 1848, fellowship was withdrawn from both Wight and Miller. Wight remained in Texas until his death, which occurred on March 31, 1858, in Mountain Valley. He died very suddenly of epileptic fits, having been sick only five hours. The company of Saints who went with him and George Miller to Texas had been scattered to the four winds. Some of them, however, were subsequently received into the Church by baptism.

HIRAM.

Hiram, a township in Portage County, Ohio, is about thirty miles from Kirtland. The population in 1880 was 1,058. This was the home of the Johnson family and a number of other early members of the Church in 1831 and 1832. On invitation of Father Johnson, Joseph Smith, the Prophet, removed with his family to Hiram September 12, 1831, and there continued the translation of the Bible, Elder Sidney Rigdon assisting him as scribe. A few days after his arrival, a conference of the Elders was held at Hiram, at which Wm. W. Phelps was instructed to purchase a press and type in Cincinnati, Ohio, for the purpose of establishing a monthly paper (Evening and Morning Star) at Independence, Jackson County, Mo. At a meeting held at Father Johnson's house, October 11, 1831, the Elders were instructed about the ancient manner of holding meetings. While living there Joseph Smith also received thirteen of the revelations contained in the book of Doctrine and Covenants, among which is the "Vision." They are sections 65, 67, 68, 69, 71, 73, 74, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80 and 81. The Prophet also held meetings on the Sabbath and evenings, and baptized a number. Persecutions soon began to rage against him and his friends, terminating in an attempt to murder him and Elder Sidney Rigdon. We give the details in Joseph Smith's own language:

"Before going to Hiram to live with Father Johnson, my wife had taken two children (twins) of John Murdock, to bring up. She received them when only nine days old; they were now nearly eleven months. I would remark that nothing important had occurred since I came to reside in Father Johnson's house in Hiram. Father Johson's son, Olmsted Johnson, came home on a visit, during which I told him if he did not obey the gospel, the spirit he was of would lead him to destruction; and when he went away he would never return or see his father again. He went to the Southern States and Mexico; on his return he took sick and died in Virginia. In addition to the apostate Booth, Simonds Rider, Eli Johnson, Edward Johnson and John Johnson jun. had apostatized.

"On the 25th of March (1832), the twins before mentioned, which had been sick of the measles for some time, caused us to be broken of our rest in taking care of them, especially my wife. In the evening I told her she had better retire to rest with one of the children, and I would watch with the sickest child. In the night she told me I had better lay down on the trundle bed, and I did so, and soon afterwards awoke by her screaming: Murder! Next I found myself going out of the door, in the hands of about a dozen men; some of whose hands were in my hair, and some had hold of my shirt, drawers and limbs. The foot of the trundle bed was towards the door, leaving only room enough for the door to swing. My wife heard a gentle tapping on the windows, which she then took no particular notice of (but which was unquestionably designed for ascertaining whether we were asleep), and soon after the mob burst open the door and surrounded the bed in an instant, and, as I said, the first I knew I was going out of the door in the hands of an infuriated mob. I made a desperate struggle, as I was forced out, to extricate myself, but only cleared one leg, with which I made a pass at one man, and he fell on the door steps. I was immediately confined again; and they swore by God, they would kill me if I did not be still, which quieted me. As they passed around the house with me, the fellow that I kicked came to me and thrust his hand into my face, all covered with blood (for I hit him on the nose), and with an exulting horse laugh, muttered: 'Gee, gee, God damn ye, I'll fix ye.'

"They then seized me by the throat, and held on till I lost my breath. After I came to, as they passed along with me, about thirty rods from the house, I saw Elder Rigdon stretched out on the ground, whither they had dragged him by the heels. I supposed he was dead.

"I began to plead with them saying, "You will have mercy and spare my life, I hope.' To which they replied, 'G—d d—n ye, call on yer God for help, we'll show ye no mercy; and the people began to show themselves in every direction. One coming from the orchard had a plank, and I expected they would kill me, and carry me off on the plank. They then turned to the right, and went on about thirty rods further—about sixty rods from the house, and thirty from where I saw Elder Rigdon—into the meadow, where they stopped; and one said, 'Simonds, Simonds' (meaning, I supposed, Simonds Rider), 'pull up his drawers, pull up his drawers; he will take cold.' Another replied: 'A'nt ye going to kill'im, a'nt ye going to kill'im?' when a group of mobbers collected a little way off, and said: 'Simonds, Simonds, come here!' and Simonds charged those who had hold of me to keep me from touching the ground, (as they had done all the time), lest I should get a spring upon them. They went and held a council, and as I could occasionally overhear a word, I supposed it was to know whether it was best to kill me. They returned after a while, when I learned that they had concluded not to kill me, but pound and scratch me well, tear off my shirt and drawers, and leave me naked. One cried, 'Simonds, Simonds, where's the tar bucket?' 'I don't know,' answered one, 'where 'tis, Eli's left it.' They ran back and fetched the bucket of tar, when one exclaimed, 'G—d d—n it, let us tar up his mouth; and they tried to force the tar-paddle into my mouth; I twisted my head around, so that they could not, and they cried out, 'G—d d—n ye, hold up yer head and let us give ye some tar.' They then tried to force a vial into my mouth, and broke it in my teeth. All my clothes were torn off me except my shirt collar; and one man fell on me and scratched my body with his nails like a mad cat, and then muttered out: 'G—d d—n ye, that is the way the Holy Ghost falls on folks.'

"They then left me, and I attempted to rise, but fell again; I pulled the tar away from my lips, so that I could breathe more freely, and after a while I began to recover, and raised myself up, when I saw two lights. I made my way towards one of them, and found it was Father Johnson's. When I had come to the door, I was naked, and the tar made me look as though I had been covered with blood, and when my wife saw me she thought I was all mashed to pieces, and fainted. During the affray abroad, the sisters of the neighborhood had collected at my room. I called for a blanket; they threw me one and shut the door; I wrapped it around me and went in.

"In the meantime, Brother John Poorman heard an outcry across the corn field, and running that way met Father Johnson, who had been fastened in his house at the commencement of the assault, by having his door barred by the mob, but on calling to his wife to bring his gun, saying he would blow a hole through the door, the mob fled, and Father Johnson seizing a club ran after the party that had Elder Rigdon, and knocked one man down, and raised his club to level another, exclaiming, 'What are you doing here?' They then left Elder Rigdon and turned upon Father Johnson, who, turning to run towards his own house, met Brother Poorman coming out of the corn field, each supposing the other to be a mobber; an encounter ensued, and Poorman gave Johnson a severe blow on the left shoulder with a stick or stone, which brought him to the ground. Poorman ran immediately towards Father Johnson's, and, arriving while I was waiting for the blanket, exclaimed, 'I'm afraid I've killed him.' 'Killed who?' asked one, when Poorman hastily related the circumstances of the encounter near the corn field, and went into the shed and hid himself. Father Johnson soon recovered so as to come to the house, when the whole mystery was quickly solved concerning the difficulty between him and Poorman, who, on learning the facts, joyfully came from his hiding place.

"My friends spent the night in scraping and removing the tar, and washing and cleansing my body; so that by morning I was ready to be clothed again. This being Sabbath morning, the people assembled for meeting at the usual hour of worship, and among those came also the mobbers; viz., Simonds Rider, a Campbellite preacher and leader of the mob; one McClentic, son of a Campbellite minister, and Pelatiah Allen, Esq., who gave the mob a barrel of whiskey to raise their spirits, and many others. With my flesh all scarified and defaced, I preached to the congregation as usual, and in the afternoon of the same day baptized three individuals.

"The next morning I went to see Elder Rigdon, and found him crazy, and his head highly inflamed, for they had dragged him by his heels, and this, too, so high from the earth that he could not raise his head from the rough, frozen surface, which lacerated it exceedingly. When he saw me he called to his wife to bring him his razor. She asked him what he wanted of it? and he replied to kill me. Sister Rigdon left the room, and he asked me to bring the razor; I asked him what he wanted of it, and he replied he wanted to kill his wife, and he continued delirious some days. The feathers, which were used with the tar on this occasion, the mob took out of Elder Rigdon's house. After they had seized him and dragged him out, one of the banditti returned to get some pillows, when the women shut him in and kept him some time.

"During the mobbing, one of the twins received a severe cold, and continued till Friday, and died. The mobbers were composed of various religious parties, but mostly Campellites, Methodists and Baptists, who continued to molest and menace Father Johnson's house for a long time. Elder Rigdon removed to Kirtland with his family, then sick with the measles, the following Wednesday, and, on account of the mob, he went to Chardon on Saturday, April 1st Sunday, April 2nd, I started for Missouri, in company with Newel K. Whitney, Peter Whitmer, and Jesse Gauze, to fulfill the revelation."

MISCELLANEOUS.

BARRUS, (RUEL,) a member of the Mormon Battalion, was born Aug. 11, 1822, in the State of New York. As a believer in the doctrines taught by the "Mormon" Elders, he went to Nauvoo, Ill., where he was baptized in September, 1845. The following year he took his departure for the west, with one of the first companies of Saints, and enlisted in the Battalion at Council Bluffs in July, 1846. He served as second lieutenant in Company B, reenlisted at San Diego, Cal., and served until the spring of 1848. After this he remained in California for 12 years, and finally came to Utah with the San Bernardino settlers in 1858. Shortly afterwards he located at Grantsville, Tooele Co., where he has resided ever since.

BROWN, (FRANCIS A.,) one of the late sufferers for conscience sake, was born in Milford, Otsego County, N. Y., Nov. 14, 1822, joined the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints Feb. 11, 1844, being baptized by John Lane. In October following he emigrated to Nauvoo, where he taught school and afterwards labored on the Temple until the exodus in 1846. When the body of the Church moved west, he made a visit to the State of New York, where he married and soon afterwards removed to Kanesville, Iowa. There he again taught school and was employed in a store until the spring of 1851, when he was called on a mission to Nova Scotia. While on this mission, he visited the island of Cape Breton, where he baptized nine persons and organized a branch of the Church. Together with David Candland, his companion, he also baptized a number in Halifax and organized them into a branch. Having returned to Council Bluffs in the spring of 1853, he once more engaged in teaching school. In the meantime his wife died, and, having married again, he emigrated to Utah in 1856, locating in Ogden, where he has resided ever since. In 1860 he made a visit to California, where he had a sister residing, and in 1865-68 he performed a good mission to Europe, spending two years in Holland, where he acquired a pretty thorough knowledge of the Dutch language, and afterwards presided one year over the Nottingham Conference, England. While in Holland some sixty persons were baptized, and the Voice of Warning was translated into the Dutch language. Joseph Weiler was his missionary companion. At home he has filled many positions of trust and responsibility. Thus for two years he served as probate judge of Weber County, for ten years as alderman of the city council of Ogden, and also as justice of the peace for several years. Previous to his departure on his mission to Europe, he taught school nine years, and after his return was engaged a number of years in the Ogden Branch of Zion's Co-operative Mercantile Institution. As president of the Central Canal Company, he took an active part in getting the water from the Weber River upon the dry bench between Ogden and Kaysville. Since 1880 he has been engaged principally in farming pursuits. When the prosecutions for polygamy and unlawful cohabitation commenced, he was one of the first victims selected from Weber County. Having been arrested May 15, 1885, on a charge of unlawful cohabitation, he was arraigned before the First District Court in Ogden on June 30th, when he furnished all the evidence himself for his conviction and read an able plea in court, in which he asserted that he would rather have his head severed from his body than prove recreant to his wives and children and betray his trust. On July 11th he was sentenced by Judge Powers to six months' imprisonment and to pay a fine of $300. Having served his time, and 30 days extra for his fine, he was released from prison Jan. 13, 1886, getting, however, the full benefit of the copper act for good behavior. After his liberation he was re-indicted on the same charge, the indictment containing four counts. Recently, however, he has been acquitted, as there was no cause for action.

BROWN, (JOHN,) son of John and Martha Chapman Brown, was born Oct. 23, 1820, in Sumner County, Tenn., was baptized into the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints by Elder George P. Dykes, in July, 1841, in Perry County, Ill., and gathered to Nauvoo the following October. On Feb. 9, 1842, he was ordained an Elder by Hyrum Smith and soon afterwards called to go on a mission to the Southern States. He left Nauvoo May 29, 1843, labored in Tennessee, Alabama and Mississippi, baptized a large number of persons and organized several branches of the Church. On May 21, 1844, he married Miss Elizabeth Crosby, in Monroe County, Miss., and on the 12th of November, 1844, was ordained a member of the eighth quorum of Seventy. He returned to Nauvoo March 25, 1845, and labored on the Temple, in which he received his endowments. Leaving Nauvoo late in January, 1846, he returned to Mississippi and assisted in fitting out a company of fourteen families, with whom he started for the Rocky Mountains, on the 8th of April following, with teams. They traveled through Missouri to Independence, Jackson County, where three other families from southern Illinois joined the company, which, taking the Oregon trail to the Platte River and up that stream, arrived at Fort Laramie in July, where they expected to have met the Saints from Nauvoo, but finding nothing but a few mountaineers and straggling natives, the company turned south and located at Pueblo, on the Arkansas River, at the foot of the Rocky Mountains, to winter. John Brown, with a company of seven men, returned by the Santa Fe route to Independence, Mo., passing through the battlefield of the Commanches and Pawnees, and continued back to Mississippi, where he arrived in October. On Jan. 10, 1847, he started for Council Bluffs with teams, one thousand miles distant, and arrived there just in time to join the Pioneers. He was chosen captain of the 13th ten and was one of the chief hunters of the company on the journey. Being with Orson Pratt in the advance company, he was one of the first to look into Great Salt Lake Valley from Big Mountain. Having returned with the Pioneers to Winter Quarters in the fall, he again paid a visit to Mississippi, but came to Utah the next year (1848) with his family and settled on Cottonwood. In the fall of 1849 he went on an exploring expedition to the south with about fifty other men, under the presidency of Apostle Parley P. Pratt. This famous company explored the Sevier River and the country as far south as the Rio Virgen and Santa Clara rivers. From this adventurous trip Elder Brown returned in February, 1850. When the Utah militia was organized, he was chosen captain of the first company of mounted life guards, and was in the skirmish with the Indians on Battle Creek, Utah County, in 1849. In organizing the Nauvoo Legion he was placed on the lieutenant-general's staff with the rank of colonel. When the organization of the company for the emigration of the poor took place, he was chosen one of its directors and served in that capacity for several years. In 1851 he went as traveling agent for the company to Pottawattamie, Iowa, and conducted a large company of emigrants across the plains, arriving in Great Salt Lake City September 28, 1851. He was one of the representatives of Great Salt Lake County in the lower house of the first legislature of Utah Territory, and subsequently represented Utah

County in the same capacity three terms. In 1852 he was sent to New Orleans to superintend the emigration at that point the following spring, and remained in that city during the winter, preaching the gospel. During March, April and May, 1853, eight vessels arrived from Liverpool with about two thousand five hundred emigrants, bound for Utah. They passed up the Mississippi River in steamboats to Keokuk, Iowa. Elder Brown conducted the rear company across the plains, arriving in Great Salt Lake City, Oct. 17th. In 1860 he was sent on a two years' mission to Great Britain, where he labored most of the time in the London, Kent and Essex conferences, and returned home in 1862. On Feb. 2, 1863, he was ordained a Bishop by President Brigham Young and sent to Pleasant Grove, Utah County, to preside, which position he still occupies. Previous to this he had resided a number of years in Lehi. In 1867 he was sent on a two years' mission to the United States, during which he presided over the missionary work in the Southern, Middle and Western States. He also assisted in the emigration at Omaha in 1868 and returned to Utah in May, 1869. Among the numerous civil offices of trust, to which he has been elected at various times, may be mentioned, that for twenty years he acted as mayor of Pleasant Grove City, being re-elected biennially, until disqualified by the Edmunds law. The Bishop is still very active and zealous for the cause, in whose interest he has nearly spent his entire life.

DOREMUS, (HENRY I.,) son of John H. Doremus and Adaline Zahriskie, was born in Bergen County, New Jersey, June 4, 1801. When two years old his father died, which left him in the care of his grandparents, and he was allowed a great deal of liberty, but his choice of exercise and amusements being in perfect harmony with the laws of nature, he grew up healthy and strong, both mentally and physically. When five years old he was sent to school, and five years later he commenced work on a farm. At the age of 18 he was an apprentice to a master carpenter. Two years later (1821) he commenced to teach school, which occupation he subsequently followed a great portion of his life. In 1825 he took charge of an academy at Paterson Landing, Passaic Co., N. J., and in 1827 was a private student of the Rev. H. M. Perrine, at Bloomfield, N. J. In 1828 he entered as student of the Bloomfield Academy, Essex Co., N. J., and in October, 1830, went to Nassau Hall, a new Jersey College. At the end of two years (1832) he graduated and received his diploma. After this he taught at Edinton, North Carolina, in 1832-33, and in the academy at Hackensack, N. J., in 1833-35; read with Dr. Aycrigg in 1836, and attended medical lectures in Jefferson College at Philadelphia, in the winter of 1836-37. Next he spent two years on a farm, and made a visit to the west in 1840. In 1842 he lived in New York City, and on Oct. 23, 1843, was baptized into the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. The following year (1844) he married and removed to Nauvoo, Ill. Sharing in the persecutions which raged against the Saints, he removed to Winter Quarters in 1846 and came to Great Salt Lake Valley in 1847, arriving November 1st. In 1856 he was called on a mission to Great Britain, from which he returned June 24, 1858. The following winter he opened a school in the 12th Ward, Great Salt Lake City, and in 1862 commenced teaching in the Union Academy, 17th Ward, where he continued for nearly ten years. Elder Doremus, who still resides in the 17th Ward, Salt Lake City, is, notwithstanding his advanced age, yet bright and active in body and mind, and can look back upon a long, useful life, during which he never was sick a single day. He believes a man can resist disease, obtain power through faith to heal himself, and also impart the same to others.

GEE, (SALMON,) one of the early presidents of Seventies, was born in Syme, New London County, Conn., Oct. 16, 1792, removed, when about seventeen years of age, to Ohio, and located in Ashtabula County. In 1828, he removed to Geauga County, where he joined the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, being baptized in July, 1832, by Zebedee Coltrin. Shortly afterwards (Feb. 4, 1833) he was ordained an Elder by Sidney Rigdon and removed to Kirtland in April, 1834. When the second quorum of Seventy was organized in 1836, he was ordained a member thereof, and at the time of the reorganization of the Seventies in April, 1837, he was called to fill the vacancy in the council caused by the transfer of Elder Zebedee Coltrin to the High Priests' quorum. At a meeting of the Seventies held at Kirtland, March 6, 1838, the quorum withdrew their fellowship from Salmon Gee for neglect of duty and other causes, but he was never excommunicated from the Church. When Almon W. Babbitt reorganized the Stake in Kirtland, in 1841, Bro. Gee was chosen as a member of the High Council at that place, where he remained until 1844, when he removed to Ambrosia, Lee County, Iowa. There he died, Sept. 13, 1845, as a faithful member of the Church. His remains were interred at Nauvoo. One of the last acts of his life was to call the members of his family around him and exhort them to faithfulness, advising them also to follow the Church wherever it went.

HARRIS, (DENNISON LOT,) a son of Emer Harris and nephew of Martin Harris (one of the Three Witnesses to the Book of Mormon), was born at Windom, Luzerne County, Penn., Jan. 17, 1825. He gathered with his father to Kirtland, Ohio, in 1831, joined the Church in his early youth and suffered in the mobbings and persecutions in Missouri. Although young he was an intimate friend of the Prophet Joseph, and took an active part as scout and express rider during the mobbings and drivings of the Saints in Illinois. He left Nauvoo three days before the final battle in September, 1846, and journeyed several hundred miles westward, preparing the way for the final exodus of the Saints, and returned to Nauvoo to assist his father to move, and thence went to Missouri, where he remained till 1852, when he emigrated to Utah and located in Springville. In 1854 he performed a perilous mission to the Navajo Indians, served in the Echo Canyon campaign in 1857-58, and also went back with provisions to meet the handcart companies at three different times. After residing in various settlements he was called to Dixie in 1862, where he remained over five years. Broken down in health he then removed to Paragoonah, Iron Co., and in 1871 to Monroe, Sevier Co., where he acted as Bishop from July 17, 1877, until his death June 6, 1885. A full account of his sufferings during the conspiracy at Nauvoo is published in the Contributor, Vol. 5, No. 4.

HUDSON, (WILFORD,) a member of the Mormon Battalion, was born in Harrison County, Indiana, Sept. 19, 1818, and joined the Church in December, 1842, being baptized by David Evans in Adams County, Ill. In 1844 he located in Hancock County, and suffered with the Saints at the time of the exodus from Illinois in 1846. He assisted in locating Mount Pisgah in Iowa and enlisted in the Mormon Battalion in July, 1846, at Council Bluffs, where he left a sick family and marched as a private in Company A all the way to California. After the Battalion was discharged in July, 1847, Hudson marched, in company with others, via the Sacramento Valley and Sutter's Fort to the Truckee River, where they met an express from President Brigham Young, advising all those who could not bring one year's provisions with them to Great Salt Lake Valley to remain in California and work for provisions and stock till the following spring; then to come on to the Valley. Most of the company turned back and hired out to Capt. John A. Sutter, Hudson and Sidney S. Willis taking a contract for the company to dig a mill-race some distance up the American Fork, a tributary to the Sacramento River. It was while the work of digging this mill-race was going on that gold was first discovered in California. Peter Wimmer, who was engaged as cook for Mr. Marshall (foreman of the works and Capt. Sutter's partner in business), picked up the first piece of gold and showed it to Marshall, who soon afterwards found more himself and came down to his men in great excitement over the discovery. Hudson and others started immediately up the canyon and found considerable gold. One piece worth about five dollars was dug out by Hudson with a pen knife. Subsequently he worked three weeks in the mine and got out $1,700 worth of gold. In the following June he and others left California for G. S. L. Valley, where they arrived Sept. 23, 1848. After a few days' rest, Hudson started back to Council Bluffs, Iowa, where he found his family still suffering from sickness, but which he the following spring (1849) brought safely to the Valley. He located in Great Salt Lake City, but moved to Grantsville, Tooele Co., in 1852, and thus became one of the early settlers of that place, where he yet resides.

PETTIGREW, (DAVID,) a member of the Mormon Battalion, Bishop, etc., was born July 29, 1791, in Weathersfield, Windsor County, Vermont, and received his diploma from Harmony Lodge No. 2, Cincinnati, Ohio, as a master mason, Oct. 4, 1820. He was baptized by Elder Isaac Higbee in 1832, and in the following November went with his family to Jackson County, Mo., where he bought 160 acres of land and settled on the Big Blue River, six miles west of Independence. On the 8th of November, 1833, he was driven from his home, which was burned by an armed mob, led by Gen. Moses Wilson and Hugh Brazeille, a lawyer. Together with six other men, who were not sick, and 84 women, children and sick men, he went south to Van Buren County, and took shelter from a severe snow storm in a cave, from which retreat they were driven on the 18th of that month. He lived in Clay County three years and then removed to Caldwell County, where he bought more government land and again built a house. In the fall of 1838, he, with about sixty others, was incarcerated in Richmond jail for several weeks, and in January, 1839, was expelled from the State of Missouri, under the exterminating order of Gov. Lilburn W. Boggs. He removed to Commerce (afterwards Nauvoo) in 1839, where he acted as a member of the High Council. He left Nauvoo May 20, 1846, and arrived at Council Bluffs on July 1st. A few days later he enlisted in the Mormon Battalion, and marched to Santa Fe, N. M., where he was appointed commissary-sergeant, and continued in that office until the command arrived in California. In July, 1847, he received an honorable discharge and came to G. S. L. Valley in the following September. He was a senator in the Provisional State of Deseret, commencing Dec. 8, 1849, chaplain in the lower house of the Utah Legislature during the sessions of 1857-58 and 1860-61, presiding over the High Priests' quorum from October 8, 1853, to April 7, 1856, and acted as Bishop of the 10th Ward, G. S. L. City, from April, 1849, to his death, which occurred Dec. 31, 1863. He lived and died a good man, firm in the faith, and beloved by all who knew him.

SMITH, (ALMA LAMONI,) a prominent missionary and a survivor from the Haun's Mill massacre, is a son of Warren and Amanda Smith, and was born Dec. 16, 1831, in Amherst, Loraine County, Ohio. Shortly before his birth, his parents had embraced "Mormonism," and to such an extent did the mother exercise faith in the blessings of the gospel that she bore her son and his twin sister (Alvira Lavoni) without the least pain. In 1838 the family removed from Ohio to Missouri, and while they, together with other immigrants, were temporarily encamped at Mr. Haun's Mill, on Shoal Creek, a mob, consisting of about two hundred and forty men, attacked the little settlement, murdering 17 of the brethren in cold blood and wounding a number of others. Among the killed were Smith's father and eldest brother (Sardius), while he himself, then about seven years old, was shot through the hip. Seeing his father and brother both killed and fearing that the mobbers would also shoot him, he pretended to be dead, and lay perfectly still among the corpses until he heard his mother call him after dark. Although his hip joint was entirely shattered, or shot away, he was miraculously healed in a few months, (See under Amanda Smith) and in his subsequent life he has not suffered the least inconvenience from the effects of the terrible wound. After the removal of the surviving members of the family to Hancock County, Ill., young Smith was baptized in the Mississippi River, at Nauvoo, in July 1841, and after the exodus of the Church from Illinois, he drove one of the family teams to Great Salt Lake Valley, arriving there in 1850, and locating in G. S. L. City. Shortly after this arrival, his stepfather (his mother having married again) went to California, and the duties of providing for the family thus devolved upon Smith for several years, his elder brother Willard, who had been a member of the Mormon Battalion, also being away from home. On March 6, 1855, he married Zelitha C. Free, and at the April Conference, 1856, he was called to go on a mission to the Sandwich Islands, where he labored with success for two years and a half. He acquired the Hawaiian language almost to perfection and presided part of the time over the Lanai Conference. In 1858 he was released and returned to Utah, arriving at G. S. L. City in December of that year. For a number of years afterwards, he was employed by the Church as a teamster, and in the spring of 1864, having been called on another mission to the Sandwich Islands, he again left his mountain home, in company with Elders Ezra T. Benson, Lorenzo Snow, Joseph F. Smith and Wm. W. Cluff. These brethren sailed from San Francisco March 13th and landed in Honolulu on the 27th. Two days later they embarked on a schooner and sailed for the island of Maui, and arrived at Lahaina in the morning of the 31st. While going to shore, the breakers being high and the sea rough, their boat was capsized, and Elders Benson, Snow, Cluff and Smith were cast into the foaming surf. They all came near drowning, and Brother Snow was picked up for dead, but revived after a few hours. On April 2nd the brethren sailed in an open boat for the island of Lanai and reached the Polawai settlement on the morning of the 3rd. There they found Walter M. Gibson located with the native Saints. They held a conference and excommunicated Gibson from the Church. This man, who presided over the mission, had mismanaged the affairs of the Church and imposed upon the natives, by taking advantage of their superstition and ignorance. When Apostles Benson and Snow, and subsequently Jos. F. Smith and Wm. W. Cluff returned home, they left Elder Smith in charge of the mission, until the arrival of Francis A. Hammond and Geo. Nebeker in the fall of 1864. Then he also was released to return home; but almost immediately after was recalled, as his services were much needed as interpreter and for other purposes. In the meantime the purchase of a tract of land had been completed for the purpose of preparing a gathering place for the natives. Elders Hammond and Nebeker returned to Utah and left Smith, assisted by Elder Benjamin Cluff, to superintend the affairs at the new plantation, which was called Laie, and when Elders Hammond and Nebeker again arrived from Utah in July, 1868, with other missionaries and their families, they found quite a colony of native Saints at Laie, in a prosperous condition. Elders Smith and Benjamin Cluff having been called by President Brigham Young to remain on the island still longer, their families also came with the same company and Smith now spent upwards of three years preaching the gospel on the various islands, and also assisting in the general superintendency at the plantation. Part of the time he was the only Elder on the Islands who understood the Hawaiian language. After more than four years' absence Elder Smith returned with his family to Salt Lake City, arriving there June 15, 1868. A few days later he started for the Union Pacific Railway and spent some ten months (having charge of John W. Young's grading work) in Echo Canyon and along the Weber River. In March, 1869, he moved to Coalville, where he soon afterwards was chosen as first counselor to Wm. W. Cluff, who at that time acted as presiding Bishop of Summit and Morgan counties. Smith held this position until the organization of the Summit Stake of Zion in 1877. For a number of years he had charge of the Wasatch Coal Company's mining business at Coalville, under the direction of F. A. Mitchell. In August, 1874, he was called to take a third mission to the Sandwich Islands, this time to preside over the mission and superintend the affairs at the sugar plantation, as successor to F. A. Mitchell. He presided until 1875, returning home in July of that year. Some months later he was called to go on a mission to England, on which he started the following spring (1877), in company with Joseph F. Smith and his own half brother Warren B. Smith and a number of other Elders. They arrived in Liverpool May 27, 1877, and Smith was appointed traveling Elder in the Sheffield Conference. He soon afterwards succeeded Wm. C. A. Smoot, junior, in the presidency of the same, and was released to return home in August, 1878. At the August election, prior to his return, he was elected assessor and collector of Summit County, which position he has held every since. He also acts as Bishop's Agent for the Summit Stake of Zion, to which position he was chosen at the organization of the Stake. He is one of the live and active men of Summit County.

WILLES, (MALISSA LOTT,) daughter of Cornelius P. Lott and Permelia Darow, was born Jan. 9, 1824, in Bridgewater, Luzerne County, Penn. Her parents having embraced the fulness of the gospel, the family removed to Kirtland, Ohio, where Sister Malissa was baptized in November, 1837. After the expulsion of the Saints from Kirtland and Missouri, Brother Lott located with his family in Pike County, Illinois, where they remained until 1842, and then moved onto Joseph Smith's farm, located some four miles east of Nauvoo, on the Carthage road. Shortly afterwards Sister Malissa became intimately acquainted with the Prophet's family, and on Sept. 20, 1843, she was married to Joseph Smith for time and all eternity. She spent most of the following winter in his family, going to school in the so-called brick store. The Prophet's children, Joseph, Frederick and Alexander, went to the same school, under the immediate watchcare of Sister Malissa. In the spring of 1844 she went back to live with her parents on the farm, where she remained until after the martyrdom of her husband in Carthage jail. Subsequently she lived with Emma Smith, occasionally, until the exodus in 1846, when she left Nauvoo with the rest of the Saints. After spending two winters at Winter Quarters, she accompanied her father's family to G. S. L. Valley in 1848, coming through in Heber C. Kimball's company. On May 13, 1849, she married Ira Jones Willes, formerly a member of the Mormon Battalion, with whom she lived in Salt Lake City and Lehi, Utah County, until his death, Dec. 5, 1863. He was accidentally killed while crossing a creek near Lehi, being thrown from a load of wood into the water together with his son Cornelius John, about nine years old. Both were drowned. By Elder Willes Sister Malissa had seven children, of whom four are yet living. Although now somewhat advanced in years, she is still bright and active, and occupies a prominent position in the Lehi Female Relief Society. She is ever unflinching in her testimony of what she knows to be true, and states in the most positive terms, and without any hesitation, that she was sealed to Joseph Smith the Prophet on the above named date, and became, in the full meaning of the term, his wife, according to the sacred order of celestial marriage. She further states that when she was married to Ira Jones Willes, he fully understood that he was marrying a widow of Joseph Smith, the martyred Prophet; that their association together would end with this life, and that in the morning of the resurrection she would pass from him to the society of her deceased husband.

THE HISTORICAL RECORD.

THE HISTORICAL RECORD is a monthly magazine, devoted exclusively to historical, biographical, chronological, and statistical matters, and is published by Andrew Jenson, Salt Lake City, Utah. The subscription price is $1.25 per annum, in advance.

Elder Andrew Jenson, having previously published the history of Joseph Smith in the Danish language in book form (a volume of 436 pages), returned from a mission to Europe in the fall of 1881. While abroad he had been diligent in searching out data and important facts from records found in the various branches and conferences of the Scandinavian Mission. These, together with much other matter, which he subsequently gleaned from private journals, etc., were published in a monthly magazine called Morgenstjernen, the first number of which was issued March 16, 1882. During 1882 and 1883 this periodical was published as a monthly, in 1884 as a semi-monthly, and in 1885 again as a monthly magazine, the four volumes together containing 60 numbers, or 960 pages, of interesting reading matter, mostly historical. As a supplement to Volumes One and Two, there were published 252 pages of condensed Church History, covering a period of about six years,—from the Prophet Joseph Smith's death to the early settlement of Great Salt Lake Valley—and finishing with a brief chronology of important events from 1805 down to 1883.

At the close of Volume Four, Elder Jenson decided to change his magazine to an English periodical, to be called the HISTORICAL RECORD, of which the first number was issued January 20, 1885, and the present one closes the volume, consisting of 120 pages of historical and 112 pages of chronological matter, which, together with 28 pages of index, etc., make 260 pages.

In January, 1887, the first number of a new volume will be issued. This volume will contain 12 numbers, averaging 28 pages to each, thus making a book of 336 pages, or 76 pages more than the preceding volume. Among its attractive features will be the conclusion of the article "The Twelve Apostles," to consist of biographical sketches of Elders Amasa M. Lyman, Ezra T. Benson, Charles C. Rich, Lorenzo Snow, Erastus Snow, Franklin D. Richards, George Q. Cannon, Joseph F. Smith, Brigham Young, Jun., Albert Carrington, Moses Thatcher, Francis M. Lyman, John Henry Smith, George Teasdale, Heber J. Grant and John W. Taylor. Also a complete geographical encyclopaedia of Utah, alphabetically arranged, containing descriptive and historical articles of every city, town, village, points of interest, etc., etc., within the limits of the Territory. The life and testimony of the Three Witnesses of the Book of Mormon, biographical sketches of distinguished men and women, with a number of portraits, the introduction of the gospel into Scotland, etc., will be additional features of the volume.

THE TWELVE APOSTLES.

AMASA M. LYMAN,

Third son of Boswell Lyman and Martha Mason, was born in Lyman Township, Grafton Co., New Hampshire, March 30, 1813. When about two years old, his father left home for the western country, from which he never returned, as he is supposed to have died some six years afterwards in New Orleans. Amasa Lyman, his younger brother Elias and his sister Ruth, remained with their mother until her second marriage, after which Lyman lived with his grandfather until he was eleven years old, and with Parley Mason, a relative, seven years longer.

During the year 1831 he became somewhat thoughtful on the subject of religion, but did not unite himself with any of the religious denominations until the spring of 1832, when the neighborhood in which Lyman resided was visited by Elders Lyman E. Johnson and Orson Pratt. Lyman believed the Gospel when he first heard it preached by those Elders, and was baptized by Lyman E. Johnson on April 27, 1832. The following day he was confirmed by Orson Pratt.

On account of ill feelings that arose in his uncle's family because of his baptism, Lyman resolved to go west, and accordingly on May 7, 1832, started on a journey of some seven hundred miles. His earthly wealth at that time consisted of some sixteen pounds of half-worn clothing and $11.35 in money. The weariness consequent upon his first day's walking admonished him to travel by stage and canal to Lyons, Wayne Co., N.Y. Arriving there, his funds were all gone, and he hired out to Mr. Thomas Lacky, the man who bought Martin Harris' farm when he sold it to raise money for printing the Book of Mormon. Lyman worked for this man two weeks and earned money to take him to Buffalo, from where he took steamer to Cleveland, Ohio, and from there walked 45 miles to the residence of John Johnson, in Hiram, Portage Co., Ohio. This was the place where Joseph Smith had been tarred and feathered a short time previous. Father Johnson and family received young Lyman kindly, and he remained with them until the following July, when the Prophet returned from Missouri.

"This," writes Elder Lyman, "afforded me an opportunity to see the man of God. Of the impressions produced I will here say, although there was nothing strange or different from other men in his personal appearance, yet, when he grasped my hand in that cordial way (known to those who have met him in the honest simplicity of truth), I felt as one of old in the presence of the Lord; my strength seemed to be gone, so that it required an effort on my part to stand on my feet; but in all this there was no fear, but the serenity and peace of heaven pervaded my soul, and the still small voice of the spirit whispered its living testimony in the depths of my soul, where it has ever remained, that he was the Man of God."

Lyman continued laboring for Father Johnson until some time in the month of August, when one Sabbath evening, after a social prayer meeting with the few members in Hiram, the Prophet, in his own familiar way, said to Lyman: "Brother Amasa, the Lord requires your labors in the vineyard." Without thought Lyman replied, "I will go," and on August 23, 1832, he and Zerubbabel Snow were ordained to the office of Elders in the Church, under the hands of Joseph Smith and Frederick G. Williams. On the following day they started on their first mission to proclaim the Gospel of salvation.

About the time of their starting an application came to President Smith to visit an old gentleman by the name of Harrington, who was afflicted with a severe pain in his head. From a press of business, Joseph could not go, but instructed Lyman and Snow to call upon the old man, which they did, and as they came near the house, before they entered, they heard his groans extorted from him by pain, which seemed intolerable. The missionaries entered and introduced themselves, being strangers. They then prayed for and laid hands upon him, in the name of Jesus, and rebuked his pain, which was instantly removed, and the sufferer rejoiced and praised God, who had so signally blessed him.

From this place the missionaries continued their journey, and the following Sabbath evening they met in prayer meeting with a few Saints in Chippeway Township. A few non-members also attended, among whom was a Miss Smith who reclined on a bed in the corner of the room. The brethren sang a hymn and prayed, and Elder Snow proceeded to make some remarks, when, in an instant, a cry of alarm from the bed attracted the attention of all. On stepping to the bedside the Elders discovered that Miss Smith's face and her entire form were distorted in the most shocking manner, her eyes were glaring wildly, but apparently sightless, her respiration was very difficult and her limbs were rigid as iron. The common restoratives were used without effect. The Elders laid their hands upon her and rebuked the devil, when she was instantly relieved, but in another moment she was bound as before; they now kneeled down by her bed and prayed, when she was again released, and asked for baptism, stating that she had been acting against her convictions of right in some conversations the missionaries had held with her during the day. They repaired to the water and there under the mantle of night introduced the first soul into the Church as the fruits of their labors.

During the following winter Elders Lyman and Snow labored in Southern Ohio and Cabell County, Virginia. Some forty souls were added to the Church by their administrations. Early in the spring they returned to Kirtland.

On March 21, 1833, with Wm. F. Cahoon as companion, Lyman started on his second mission. He continued his labors for eight months, during which time he traveled as far east as Chautauqua and Cattaraugus Counties, N Y. He held 150 meetings and saw about one hundred souls added to the Church. In December following he attended a conference in Erie County, Penn., where he was ordained to the High Priesthood under the hands of Lyman E. Johnson and Orson Pratt. In the winter he continued his missionary labors in the States of New York and New Hampshire. While in the latter State the call to go to Missouri reached him through Elder Lyman E. Johnson. Responding to this call, he changed his plan of operations and went direct to Kirtland, Ohio, taking in charge as a contribution some money and teams, and two sons of John Tanner (John J. and Nathan).

Elder Lyman writes: "We arrived in Kirtland about May 1, 1834, but did not join the camp until the day previous to their leaving New Portage, which was on the 8th of May. At this point we identified ourselves with the camp by enrolment and paying over our money to the credit of Father Tanner.

"From this place I traveled with the camp, participating in all the vicissitudes it encountered and shared in its toils and labors as well as its varied and rich instruction that we received from the Prophet.

"Thus we pursued our anomalous and strange journey, the vicissitudes of which afforded us ample opportunity to evince our faith by the offering of our lives for the truth, proving by the patient endurance of our toils and our untiring perseverance in the accomplishment of our purposes, that the interests of the Kingdom, when they should be committed to our keeping, would be faithfully cared for, and thus laying the foundation for the effectual redemption of Zion, in the development of a faithful and energetic ministry.

"On June 17th, on Grand River, I met for the first time with Bishop Edward Partridge. I traveled and conversed with him the most of the day. On the 19th we arrived in the vicinity of Fishing River, and encamped near a Baptist meeting house. During the night we were visited by a severe storm of rain and high wind, accompanied by thunder and lightning, which prostrated most of our tents. Some of the fugitives from the fury of the storm, found shelter in the church. The morning found me minus my tent; and a depression in the ground, in which my bed had been inadvertently made, was full of water, in which myself and bed were submerged.

"On moving from our camp in the morning of the 20th, four miles, to Brother John Cooper's house, we found the country around us was visited during the night previous with a terrific storm of hail, which in its destructive course demolished fields of grain and made liberal pruning of the forest over which it passed. And what more directly effected our safety, it held in check, so they could not move, a large mob force that were assembled to question our presence in, or dispute our passage through the country.

"We remained near Brother Cooper's until the 24th. During our stay here we were visited by some gentlemen from Clay and Ray Counties, among whom were General Atchison, Col. Sconce, and a Mr. Cameron. With them the Prophet had an interchange of feeling and sentiment of a conciliatory character, which the Lord blest to our good, thus adding another to the evidences already given, that it was no part of his purpose to expose his servants to the chances of destruction at the hands of their enemies. It was here the Lord signified to the Prophet, to our joy and comfort, that our offering was accepted.

"On the 24th we moved the camp twenty miles, and camped at Brother Burkett's, two and a half miles from Liberty, the county seat of Clay. Here, on the morning of the 25th, several of the brethren were attacked with the cholera. Among the first was Elder John Carter, who had a protracted struggle with the fell destroyer. The following night there were some half a dozen of the brethren stricken down, and all lying on the floor in a small apartment. This was a scene that can be more easily imagined than described—to see men stricken down in a moment, and in a short hour the ruddy glow of health displaced by the palor of death; to see the human form divine which at the dawn of morning was stately and erect, in all the perfections of manly beauty, melt away in the death struggle of a few short hours, and to think that the sufferers are the forms of the loved, the faithful and brave. With them we had abored and rejoiced together in the truth; they were endeared to us by the tenderest ties that bind heart to heart and soul to soul. These were they sufferers for whom there seemed to be no rest but in the grave.

"I passed the night with the sufferers, and in the morning the company with which I was connected was disbanded. Before I left, I gave a parting look, breathed a hasty prayer, and tore myself away from the scene of death.

"On the 26th I went to the residence of Brother King Follett. From this until the organization of the High Council, I passed my time with the brethren who had been expelled from Jackson County, by whom I was kindly entertained.

"I then engaged to work for Bro. Jabez Durfee, who was building a mill for Esquire Arthur. While thus engaged I was called upon to assist in numbering the people of the Church in Clay County. This led me to form an acquaintance with the Saints generally who had been driven from Jackson County. In this labor I was engaged until the 11th of August, when I was attacked by the ague and fever, with which I was confined to the house and bed until Nov. 2nd. I was, during my sickness, at the house of Brother Elias Higbee, whose wife was most kind and unremitting in her attention to my comfort, as were the Saints generally.

"After a partial recovery from my sickness, I received a discharge from the camp under the hand of Lyman Wight. I then procured, through the aid of the brethren, a half worn coat that belonged to the late A. S. Gilbert, and on Dec. 23rd, 1834, I started from Clay County in company with Brother Heman Tilton Hyde. We traveled and preached by the way, sharing the fate common to those who call upon the wicked to turn from their sins.

"We continued eastward as far as Ohio, and arrived in Kirtland May 26, 1835. On our way we held sixty-seven meetings and three conferences, and in company with Brother Elisha H. Groves we built up a branch of the Church in Madison County, Illinois, and baptized others in St. Clair County.

"During my stay in Kirtland of about three weeks I was ordained a member of the First Quorum of Seventies under the hands of Joseph, Oliver and Sidney. The record of my ordination and blessings made by Sylvester Smith are lost.

"During this short respite from preaching I married Miss Louisa Maria Tanner, the daughter of Elder John Tanner. Our marriage was solemnized by Elder Seymour Brunson on Wednesday of the week; and the following Monday I was again in the field.

"My present course was eastward, mostly in the State of New York, where my labors were rewarded by liberal additions to the Church. This mission occupied six months of time and extended over two thousand miles of travel, and the preaching of nearly two hundred sermons.

"From the time of my return to Kirtland in December, 1835, I resided with my father-in-law and attended school through the winter. In the spring of 1836 I participated in the endowments then given, and in consequence of my ordination to the High Priesthood, previous to my ordination as a Seventy, I was at this time connected with the Quorum of High Priests.

"The spring of 1836 found me again on my way to the East, in company with Elder Nathan Tanner. We passed through the field of my previous year's labors in Alleghany County, N. Y., where we were blest in adding several to the Church. While here we witnessed the signal manifestation of the power of God in the healing of the sick.

"From this place we continued our travels eastward until we arrived in the town of Bolton, the former residence of Brother Tanner. Here we preached through the country, in which we secured the attention of the people, but not their obedience to the truth.

"In Bolton we met with Father John Tanner, who had been on a mission to the State of Vermont. While here I married Elder Nathan Tanner and Miss Rachel Smith Brother Nathan remained with his father-in-law, while Father Tanner and I returned to Kirtland, Ohio, where I remained a short time engaged in work to support my family and preaching in the country around, once going east as far as Erie County, Penn.

"In this way my time was mostly occupied until the autumn of 1837, when Nathan Tanner and I engaged Mr. Jared Randall to move us to Missouri, where we joined the Saints in the new county of Caldwell. In consequence of my limited means I went to Fort Leavenworth, where I labored during the winter. In the spring I returned and engaged in a job of work on the Court House, Clinton County.

"On my return home I engaged in labor for George Walter, from which I was relieved by sickness, which was induced by too severe labor in hot weather. From this indisposition I had mostly recovered, when the difficulties, that eventuated in our expulsion from the State, commenced with an affray at the election in Daviess County, in the month of August. On the first alarm I took the field, which I did not leave until I left the State the following spring.

"The trouble thickened around us until, on my return from a week's excursion to the north of Far West (in company with Brother Justus Morse, with whom my family resided), I learned, that the brethren at De Witt were surrounded by mobs in such a way as to preclude any approach to them by the usual ways, in consequence of which we were left in ignorance of their prospects of danger or safety.

"On this account the brethren in Far West committed to me the task of finding a way to the brethren that were in the midst of the enemy. To accompany me I selected Brother James Dunn. I then dressed myself in some old soldier pants, an old and somewhat tattered coat made of a Buffalo robe, and a red worsted cap, closely fitting my head. One pocket of my coat was furnished with a pint flask for the spirits we might use, or the effect its possession might have on those with whom we would be likely to come in contact.

"Thus attired in our grotesque and uncouth garb, we started across the country to the Missouri River, at a point somewhere above the ferry crossing the Lexington. We reached the river, and when the mantle of night was over us we commenced our search for a canoe, in which to pass down the river. In this, however, we did not succeed, and when the signs of the coming day were discoverable in the east, we found shelter under the edge of a stack of hay by the way, caught about an hour's sleep, and then were up and away. Traveling down the river we found a Brother Benjamin Jones, who gave us some breakfast, after which we passed over the ferry, replenished our bottle and walked through the town, passing several parties who were engaged in discussing the common topic of the day—the 'Mormons' and their enemies.

"From this place we passed down the river some twelve miles, where, near the close of the day, we secured a canoe, in which we passed further down the river, until the darkness of night rendered our navigation rather unsafe. We landed and kept ourselves warm with a fire, which we supplied during the night. In the morning we resumed our way and landed at De Witt about noon; but the Saints had all gone, save a few who had been prevented by the loss of stock. Among these were Zenos H. Gurley and Brother Simons.

"We took dinner with some of the mob residents of the place, and were told by them that being strangers we might be suspected of being Mormons, and consequently be unsafe in the place. Acting upon the suggestion we left town, on the road leading to Carrollton, and found lodging with Mr. Thomas. In the morning we were early on the way, got breakfast with a citizen who lived near the point where the trail made by the brethren when they left De Witt diverged from the old road to the right. This trail we were traveling as fast as we could walk, when on turning abruptly around the point of a low ridge, we found ourselves in close proximity to two men on horseback, with arms. They were questioning a Brother Clark (as we subsequently learned) who was a stranger in the country, and was on the hunt for stock. A short distance ahead were some twenty men who were armed and mounted. The two dismissed Brother Clark and rode to the company, returning to us with an addition to their number of some half a dozen, and made prisoners of us, asking who we were. We found in the company some men we had seen before in Daviess.

"They had in a wagon a six pounder, which they were transporting to the north, at a cost of ten dollars per day. On this cannon, in the wagon, they allowed us to ride. At night we helped to take the cannon from the wagon and secrete it in the hazel thicket, to prevent a surprise from the "Mormons," and then they placed a guard of four men with us. In this way they kept us for four days.

"On the morning of the fifth day they told us we could go, but not to our friends, who were within seven miles of where we were. They forced us back on the road we came. We traveled some forty miles, in a light snow, and waded through Grand River. About nine o'clock at night we reached Brother York's house on Shoal Creek. They fed and refreshed us, and in the morning we started for Far West, where we arrived the next day.

"I went directly to Daviess County, where I found the cannon, on which Brother Dunn and I had ridden during our captivity, the brethren having captured it soon after our release. While here, we heard that the mob were gathering on the southern borders of our country. On receiving this news I repaired to Far West, where I borrowed a horse of some brother whose name I have forgotten.

"A company of spies, composed of ten men, were raised, and I was appointed to take charge of them. We repaired to Crooked River, and quartered with Brother Pinkham.

"From this point I went, taking with me Brother John Scott, to reconnoitre the country, leaving the residue of the company to keep a watch in the vicinity of their quarters. We extended our search as far as the mouth of Crooked River, where we found Father Cutler and family. We gave to him and the brethren in that region the best instructions we could in the then existing emergency. Thus we spent a few days. The night preceding the battle on Crooked River, I slept at Father Cutler's. About the dawning of day I awoke Brother Scott and told him that the brethren had had a battle, for I had seen it. We arose, saddled our horses, rode ten miles and stopped with Brother Ewing to get some breakfast. While here the news of the battle was brought by two of the mob residents, who came to advise Brother Ewing to give up his arms, but the presence of Brother Scott and myself rendered the difference in our number rather against them. Our breakfast over, we secured the services of a guide, and we traveled directly across the country to Far West. When the light of day was gone, we were furnished with light from the burning prairie.

"We arrived in Far West early on the morning of the 26th of October. I called at Brother Rigdon's, where I saw Brother O'Banion, who was dying of his wound, received at Crooked River. Some hours later, in the morning of the same day, the corpse of Brother David W. Patten was brought into town.

"On the morning of the 30th of October a company of men, under command of Col. George M. Hinkle, of which I was one, started out into the country, hearing that there was a large force in the vicinity of Crooked River. When some five or six miles on the way, we learned that there was an army making their way to Far West. On the receipt of this intelligence we commenced our retreat, in a circuitous route, to Far West. Passing the rear of the enemy, while they passed in, on the south of the city, within one mile of which they encamped, we entered it from the east near night, and joined our brethren, already formed in the line of defence on the south of the city. While the mob were making their way toward the city, they made a prisoner of Father John Tanner, whom they brutally treated, by striking him on the head with a rifle. From the bleeding of his wounds he was besmeared from head to foot. He was kept one night, and then turned out to carry to his friends the corpse of the murdered Carter.

"On the night of the 30th of October we were engaged in preparing for defence, in and about the city, by throwing up a barricade made of cabin logs, fence rails and wagons, which were around the city.

"On the 31st an invitation was sent for Brothers Joseph Smith, Sidney Rigdon, Lyman Wight, Parley P. Pratt and George W. Robinson, to hold a conference with the officers of the army, which, however, eventuated in their betrayal into the hands of their enemies, who celebrated their success by a succession of demoniac yells that might have led one to conclude that hell with all its legions had joined in the triumph. Thus passed the night.

"When we supposed that we might have been attacked by our enemies, we were ordered out by Col. Hinkle to lay down our arms by way of surrender to our foes. This ungrateful requirement complied with, we were marched into the city and kept under guard for a time. Then our guard was extended to the limits of the city, and we were released from our closer confinement. After our partial release, I made a call on Bishop Partridge, and passing from his residence, in the north, to the southern part of the town, I was, in passing the store of Col. Hinkle, pointed out to a party of the mob, who followed me a short distance and arrested me, stating they had orders from General Lucas to bring me to camp.

"On my arrival in the camp I found myself associated with the prisoners, so treacherously taken the day previous, and also Brother Hyrum Smith and Alexander McRae. The night was rather an unpleasant one, on account of the inclemency of the weather, from which we had no protection. During the night the far-famed court martial was held, by which we were all sentenced to be shot in the morning. From the execution of this merciless sentence we were saved by the opposition of General Doniphan; and long may he live to enjoy the reward of the soul ennobling qualities that exalted him incomparably above the priest-ridden, bloody rabble around him.

"On the morning of November the 2nd we were ordered to take our seats in a wagon, driven by Brother Stephen Markham, who had been pressed into their service. As we seated ourselves, William Beauman rushed up to the wagon, with his rifle cocked, swearing that Lyman Wight, who sat by my side, should not leave the ground alive. He was instantly disarmed by the captain of the guard, whose name was Jackson, and a guard placed, some twenty-five feet from us, with orders to shoot the first who should show a disposition to crowd on us.

"From the camp we moved, under a strong guard, into the city of Far West, where most of the prisoners were allowed to go and say their adieus to their heart-stricken and sorrowing families. While we halted here, the father and mother of Brothers Joseph and Hyrum Smith came to the wagon in which we were seated to see their sons, as they thought for the last time, but the wagon was closely covered, and they were brutally refused the privilege of looking upon their children.

"At lenght we left the scene of our sorrowing friends and started on our way to Independence. When about two miles from Far West, we passed the place where my family resided. I was allowed some five minutes to see my wife and get a change of clothing. I left my weeping wife and prattling babe, to encounter my fate, in the land of my enemies. We camped one night before crossing the Missouri River, and arrived in Independence in the midst of a heavy rain. We were taken through all the principal streets of the town and exhibited as the trophies of the victories of mob violence over innocence and truth. From the time of our arrival here the rigors of our confinement were considerably relaxed.

"We were at length taken to Richmond, by the order of General Clark, where we were closely confined, being all bound together in one chain, and under a strong guard. In this way I remained, undergoing with my fellow prisoners an exparte examination, until the 24th of November, when I was discharged; and about 9 o'clock on Saturday I started for Far West. About 10 o'clock at night I met my wife in Brother Morse's house.

"On Sunday, in company with my wife, I went to town, and several times in the course of the day, I met with several parties of the mob, whom I learned, were searching for me to take me back to prison about sun-down. On the receipt of this information I took measures to keep out of their way.

"On the Sabbath, after my release, I met with Col. Hinkle, who disclosed to me his heartless treachery by proposing that we should join and go to the south, and there build up a church for ourselves, as the Prophet was in trouble from which he would not escape.

"About this time I was elected Justice of the Peace; and about the time of the committal of the brethren to prison, I was taken sick with a swelling on my left arm. My sickness soon reduced me to a state of utter helplessness, when I was carried to the house of Brother Solomon Daniels, where, by the kindness of my friends and the blessing of the Lord, I slowly recovered. During my illness I was closely watched by Capt. Bogart and his emissaries.

"Before I had recovered, Brother Daniels and family removed to Illinois, and took with them my family, leaving me to aid the brethren in the matter of disposing of their land, which the most of them were forced to do by the oppression of the mob.

"I boarded with Brother Theodore Turley's family. Sister Turley was most kind and unremitting in her attention to my comfort. Under her treatment I regained my health and remained until March, 1839, when I went to Quincy, Illinois. There I found my family still with Brother Daniels' family, with whom they continued a few months.

"During this spring I went (in company with Brothers Charles C. Rich, Seymour Branson and John Killyon) to Missouri to visit P. P. Pratt, who was being carried on a charge of venue from Richmond, Ray County, to Columbia, Boone County. We were frustrated in our intentions to assist Brother Pratt and others, by the misrepresentation of matters between us and them, by Watson Barlow, who came from Quincy to see the prisoners, and was known as a "Mormon", while we were traveling incog.

"On the strength of Barlow's representation I went to Quincy and returned again to Columbia, but was again defeated, as before, and returned, leaving our friends to their fate. Brother Pratt told me afterwards, that they were ready to have acted upon our first proposition for their rescue. Our plan was the same as that on which they came out on the fourth of July, subsequently.

"The above with a dangerous trip to the western part of Missouri, to attend to some unsettled business, occupied the most of the summer. In the fall I went, with my family, to spend the winter with my old friend Justus Morse, in McDonough County. I remained here until spring.

"Early in the spring of 1840, I went to Iowa, on the half-breed tract, in Lee County, where I built a cabin, to which I moved my family. A portion of this summer I spent on the Mississippi River, boating wood to St. Louis. From this work I returned in the fall, sick.

"In the spring of 1841 I moved my family to Nauvoo, and occupied a part of a house belonging to Brother Osmyn M. Duel, and worked with Brother Theodore Turley in his shop at repairing guns, and other work. I had been thus engaged a short time, when Brother Charles Shumway, from Northern Illinois, called on Brother Joseph for Elders to go home with him to preach in that country. The Prophet sent him to me, with directions that I should go.

"The steamer on which we were to go up the river was in sight when I received the word in the shop. I went to my home, one mile distant, took leave of my family, and was at the landing as the boat rounded to. We went on board of the boat, which I left at Galena. I preached in this region, and in Wisconsin, until October, when I returned to Nauvoo, where I arrived on the last day of the conference, in the afternoon.

"During the conference I was appointed a mission to the city of New York. This was countermanded by the Prophet; and during the winter I went, in company with Peter Haws, on a mission to secure means to build the Temple and Nauvoo House. We went as far east as Indiana.

"In the spring of 1842, I went on a mission to the State of Tennessee, accompanied by H. K. Whitney and Adam Lightner and also Williams Camp, from whom we had the promise of some help on the public buildings. In this we were disappointed. I was joined in the mission by Elder Lyman Wight, one of the Twelve Apostles.

"After our failure to accomplish what we expected to with Brother Camp, we returned to Nauvoo. While on this mission I held one public discussion with Thomas Smith, a Methodist presiding Elder, and baptized some of his church.

"Subsequent to my return to Nauvoo, I was ordained to the Apostleship August 20, 1842, and on September 10th I started on a mission to Southern Illinois, in company with George A. Smith. Some portion of our time, on this mission, we were in the company of Prests. Brigham Young and Heber C. Kimball. From this mission we returned Oct. 4th.

"The following winter I was engaged by the Prophet to move my family to Shockoquon, in Henderson County, where he had bought some property. I repaired to the place where I superintended the surveying of the town site and commenced building. I remained here until the following summer (1843). When the Prophet was kidnapped, I participated in the efforts that resulted in his rescue.

"On my return from this expedition I was taken ill and became helpless, in which condition I was taken to Nauvoo, from where, (when I had partially recovered from my sickness,) I was sent on a mission to the State of Indiana, taking with me my family. I went to the small inland town of Alquina, Fayette Co., where my family resided, while I traveled through the surrounding counties, preaching as opportunity offered. In this manner I passed the time until the spring of 1844, when I repaired to Nauvoo to attend the April Conference, at which it was determined that I should go to the city of Boston.

"A few days after the conference, I had an interview with the Prophet, in which he taught me some principles * * * * on celestial marriage. On the day of my parting with him, he said, as he warmly grasped my hand for the last time, 'Brother Amasa, go and practice on the principles I have taught you, and God bless you.'

"I returned to Alquina, and prosecuted my labor of preaching in the country, until the 1st of June, when I repaired to Cincinnati, where I remained until July, when I received the news of the murder of the Prophet and Patriarch, Joseph and Hyrum Smith. A few days later Brother Adams arrived, and confirmed what we had heard of the murder. He was also the bearer of a call to myself, to return immediately to Nauvoo, and in response to this call I repaired to Nauvoo, where I arrived on the 31st of July."

Having attended the special meeting at Nauvoo, Aug. 8, 1844, in which the Twelve Apostles were acknowledged as the presiding quorum of the Church, Apostle Lyman, as a member of that quorum, continued to take an active part in all the affairs of the Church. He rendered efficient aid during the exodus of the Saints from Illinois in 1846 and was one of the Pioneers of 1847, returning to Winter Quarters in the fall of the same year. The following year he led a large company of emigrants to G. S. L. Valley. After this he was appointed on a mission to California, from which he returned Sept. 30, 1850. In 1851 he and Apostle C. C. Rich were called to lead a company of settlers to California, which started from Payson, Utah Co., March 24, 1851, and arrived at San Bernardino, Cal., in the following June. A few months later (Sept.) the ranche of San Bernardino was purchased, and a settlement located, which was continued until 1858, when, on account of the hostilities between Utah and the United States, it was broken up; the inhabitants removed to Utah. In 1860 Elder Lyman was sent on a mission to Great Britain, arriving in Liverpool, England, July 27th. In connection with Apostle C. C. Rich he presided over the European Mission until May 14, 1862, when he embarked to return home. While on this mission he delivered a remarkable sermon at Dundee, Scotland, on March 16, 1862, in which he denied the atonement of the Savior. Some years later he was summoned to meet before the First Presidency of the Church to answer to the charge of having preached false doctrines. He acknowledged his error and signed a document, dated Jan. 23, 1867, in which he also asked the forgiveness of the Saints. But soon afterwards he again preached in the same strain, and was finally excommunicated from the Church, May 12, 1870. He died in Fillmore, Millard Co., Utah, Feb. 4, 1877.

EZRA TAFT BENSON.

The first son of John and Chloe Benson, was born Feb. 22, 1811, in Mendon, Worcester Co., Mass. His father was a farmer and a very industrious man—a quality which his son inherited—and Ezra T. lived with him, helping him on the farm until he was sixteen years old. He then went to live with his sister and her husband, who were keeping a hotel in the centre of the town of Uxbridge. With them he remained three years. His grandfather Benson was also a farmer and while engaged at work in the field he fell and suddenly died.

At the death of his grandfather, by the request of his grandmother, young Ezra T. took charge of the farm, and when twenty years old he married Pamelia, the daughter of Jonathan H. and Lucina Andrus, of Northbridge, Worcester Co., Mass. In 1832 he moved from the farm and bought out his brother-in-law, the hotel-keeper, and kept the house about two years. In this business he made considerable money, which he invested in hiring a cotton-mill and commencing, with his wife's brother, the manufacture of cotton in the town of Holland, Mass. Through a combination of causes, over which he had no control, he lost money in this business, and retiring from it took a hotel in the same town. He was also appointed postmaster. Though he made money in this business he could not be content; he had a desire to visit the West. In the spring of 1837 he had his family started. While in Philadelphia he made the acquaintance of a gentleman who spoke discouragingly about the West, and persuaded him to go to the town of Salem, and he would assist him to go into business. He remained in this place one year, and though his neighbours offered to render him any assistance he might need to establish himself in business, he still yearned for the West, and he started in that direction. He touched at St. Louis, obtained a small stock of goods, and then went up the Illinois River, not knowing where he should land. But while on the river he made the acquaintance of a man, who proved to be his father's cousin. He was living at Griggsville, Illinois, and at that town he concluded to stop. But he did not remain long there. He moved to Lexington, in the same State, and afterwards to the mouth of the Little Blue, where he and a man by the name of Isaac Hill laid out a town and called it Pike. Here he built himself a dwelling-house and a warehouse. But the place was sickly, and he was restless. In relation to these days, he afterwards said that he felt the Lord was preparing him for the future which awaited him, and later he could understand why he could not feel contented in the various places where he visited, and where, so far as worldly prospects were concerned, he had every opportunity of doing well.

Early in 1839 he heard of Quincy, Illinois, and he was led to go there in search of a home. There he met with the Latter-day Saints, who had just been driven out of Missouri by mob violence. He heard they were a very peculiar people; yet, in listening to the preaching of their Elders, and in conversation with themselves, he found them very agreeable. He boarded, during the winter, with a family of Latter-day Saints, and formed a high opinion of them. In the spring of 1840 he secured two acres of land in the town, fenced it in, and built a house upon it. During this time he still associated with the Latter-day Saints, and his sympathies were much moved towards them, and he held conversations with them about their principles. A debate was held in Quincy between the Latter-day Saints and Dr. Nelson, who was opposed to them, at which the Prophet Joseph was present. From this debate he became convinced that the Latter-day Saints were believers in and observers of the truths of the Bible. Though pleased that the Saints had come off victorious, he had no idea at that time that he would ever become one himself, yet their principles were the chief topic of conversation with himself and family and neighbors, and he and his wife attended their meetings. His wife was the first to avow her belief in the doctrines, and when the word went out that they were believers in what was called "Mormonism" a strong effort was made to get him to join a sectarian church. Elders Orson Hyde and John E. Page visited Quincy about this time, having started on their mission to Jerusalem, to which they had been appointed. Their preaching seemed to have the effect to remove whatever doubts there were remaining, and he and his wife were baptized by the President of the Quincy Branch, July 19, 1840.

In the fall he went to the conference at Nauvoo, and was ordained an Elder. After his return to Quincy, he was visited by President Hyrum Smith, who ordained him a High Priest, and appointed him to be second Counselor to the President of the Stake, which he had organized there. About the first of April, 1841, he moved to Nauvoo. He bought a lot, fenced and improved it, and built a log house upon it. June 1, 1842, he started on a mission to the Eastern States, where he remained until the fall of 1843. He returned and remained until May, 1844, when he again started east in company with Elder John Pack. When the news of the death of Joseph, the Prophet, reached them, they returned. That fall he was called to be a member of the High Council in Nauvoo, and in December of that year was again sent east on a mission. He presided over the Boston Conference until the beginning of May, 1845, when he was counseled to gather up all the Saints who could go and move them out to Nauvoo. The remainder of that summer and fall he worked on the Temple, and at night frequently stood guard to keep off the mob. He moved out of Nauvoo with his family in the first company in 1846. At Mount Pisgah he was appointed a Counselor to Father William Huntington. While at this place he received a letter from President Young informing him of his appointment to the Quorum of the Twelve, instead of John E. Page. He moved up to the main camp at Council Bluffs, where he was ordained to the Apostleship, July 16, 1846. He shortly afterwards was sent east on a mission, from which he returned Nov. 27, 1846. The next spring he accompanied President Young as one of the Pioneers to G. S. L. Valley, and after their arrival there he was sent back to meet the companies which were coming on, to inform them that a place of settlement had been found. After he met the companies he returned to the valley, and then started back to Winter Quarters with the Pioneers. Another mission east had to be performed, and he left the camp about the last day of 1847, and was absent several months. Upon his return he was appointed to preside in Pottawattamie County, Iowa, being associated with President Orson Hyde and George A. Smith. In 1849, in company with President Smith, he moved to the valley. He was dangerously sick on the road, and was not expected to live; but the camp fasted and prayed for him, and he recovered. In 1851 he left the valley on a mission to Pottawattamie County, to gather up the Saints, and returned in August, 1852. In 1856 he was appointed a mission to Europe, and, with Elder Orson Pratt, presided over the British Mission until the fall of 1857, when he returned home. In 1860 he was appointed to preside in Cache Valley, at which point he continued to reside until his death. With Apostle Lorenzo Snow, and accompanied by Elders Joseph F. Smith, W. W. Cluff and A. L. Smith, he went on a mission to the Sandwich Islands in 1864, and the boat in which they were landing on one of the islands capsized. Brothers Benson and Snow were almost miraculously saved from drowning. Having successfully performed their mission, they returned to Utah, this being the last time E. T. Benson left the Territory.

Besides performing these missions, Elder Benson filled many important missions at home. He was also a member of the Provisional State of Deseret, previous to the organization of the Territory; was a member of the Territorial House of Representatives for several sessions, and during the last ten years of his life he was elected to the Territorial Council every term. In 1869 he associated himself with Brothers Lorin Farr and Chauncey W. West in taking a large grading contract on the Central Pacific Railway. The fact that he was not able to obtain a settlement with the railway company caused him considerable anxiety. On Oct. 3, 1869, just as he had arrived at Ogden from his home in Logan, he died suddenly while doctoring a sick horse. His body was conveyed to Logan, where the funeral took place the following Sunday (Sept. 5th).

MISCELLANEOUS.

RUSSELL, (ISAAC,) one of the first Latter-day Saint missionaries to Great Britain, was born April 15, 1807, in Windy Hall, Cumberland Co., England. His father's name was Wm. Russell, and the family genealogy can be traced through Normandy back to Oluf, the so-called "sharp eyed" king of Nerike, a province of Sweden. Isaac Russell, who was the youngest of thirteen children, emigrated to America, together with his parents, being then but a boy ten years of age. They settled in Upper Canada. Shortly after their arrival there Russell apprenticed himself to a cabinet-maker, with whom he served seven years. At Scarborough he became acquainted with Miss Mary Walton, whom he subsequently married in Toronto, June 25, 1829. In his younger days he exhibited much intelligence, and an unusual degree of fondness for literature, frequently being discovered by his parents in the perusal of books, when perpaps his labors were looked for elsewhere. Subsequently he allied himself to the Methodist Church, becoming a class-leader, and his integrity won for him the respect and confidence of all his associates. In 1836 he first heard the fullness of the Gospel preached, and was baptized in the spring of that year in Charlton settlement, eight miles north of Toronto, by Apostle Parley P. Pratt, who had just introduced "Mormonism" into the province. After listening to Elder Pratt's first sermon, Isaac Russell suddenly arose to his feet, exclaming: "This is the Gospel that I wish to live and die by." Soon after his ordination to the office of an Elder, he was sent out to preach the Gospel in the adjacent country, baptizing quite a number of friends and acquaintances. He also contributed liberally of his means towards the spreading of the Gospel. On one occasion he donated $100 to Parley P. Pratt, when the latter returned to Kirtland. Soon afterwards he sold his farm, and removed with his family to Kirtland, Ohio, in the spring of 1837. There he purchased another farm of 160 acres. In connection with Heber C. Kimball, Orson Hyde and others he was called to open the door of the Gospel in England. Leaving his family in the care of his brother-in-law, Brother John Dawson, he left Kirtland on June 13, 1837, crossing the Atlantic in the ship Garrick, and landing in Liverpool July 20th. Not long after their arrival the well-known but remarkable effort of the adversary to retard the progress of their mission was exhibited: but through faith, pra ers and administrations the Elders gained the victory. While on this mission, Elder Russell's time was constantly occupied in preaching, baptizing and building up branches. In the county of Cumberland alone he was instrumental in bringing some sixty souls into the Church. Once he was offered a large salary if he would accept a position as preacher in the Episcopal Church, which he promptly refused, preferring to teach the truth without purse or scrip. After a successful mission Elders Kimball, Hyde and Russell sailed from Liverpool April 20, 1838, and, after 22½ days' sailing, during which time considerable rough weather was experienced, they landed in New York May 12th. From there they continued to Kirtland, where they arrived on the 22nd of May, having been absent about eleven months. Preparations were shortly afterwards made to remove to Missouri, where Russell, together with Jacob Scott and families, arrived in the latter part of September, having traveled on land and water a distance of eighteen hundred miles. At the time the moh-militia, ordered out by Gov. Boggs, marched on Far West, he was at De Witt, Carroll Co., whither he had been sent by the Prophet Joseph to assist a company of Canadian Saints, who were attacked by a mob. This fact probably accounts for his not being taken prisoner with the Prophet and others. On the night of April 26, 1839, when the secret conference was held by members of the Twelve at Far West, upwards of thirty persons were excommunicated from the Church without a hearing, Isaac Russell being one of the number. Theodore Turley, who had also been present on that occasion, called on Brother Russell afterwards and informed him what had occurred and bade him good bye. Turley subsequently, in Utah, related to Russell's sons, Samuel and George, that he was present at the conference near Quincy, Ill, where Joseph was informed of the proceedings at Far West, and that the Prophet there arose with tears in his eyes, and, referring to Isaac Russell, said that he felt to bless him and that he should be blessed. It is a fact worth recording that Brother Russell never took sides with the enemy either in word or deed. On the occasion of an election in Far West, after the Saints had been driven away, he took his stand in the public square, addressed a large assembly of Missourians on the principles of the Gospel and spoke fearlessly of judgments that would eventually overtake them, in consequence of their persecution of the Saints. He was, some time after this, taken by the mob in connection with Wm. Dawson, a present resident of Lehi, Utah, and given the choice between vacating the place and being shot. Refusing to leave, they then threatened to whip him, and was about to execute the threat, when Mr. Mann, one of the mobbers interfered, swearing that he would kill the first man who laid a hand upon him. He then ordered Russell and his companion to return home, whence he accompanied them and guarded them through the night. The mob frequently ordered Russell to call out all his children, and place them in a row, to be shot, but the six children still live in full faith and fellowship in the mountain vales. He was once taken by the mob, and marched at the point of firearms to a place in Far West, where a mock trial was being held. There he was sold for six months, on the ridiculous charge of being a vagrant, to one John Ragland, of Daviess County. Together with his family, excepting his eldest son, he served out this term to within a few weeks, being finally let off because of his good behavior. The mobbers adopted this plan merely for the purpose of getting him away from his possessions that they might have full sway. After his liberation from this unjust servitude, he removed with his family to Richmond, Ray Co., where he worked at his trade as a carpenter for about one year. Then he rented a farm in connection with his brother-in-law, John Dawson, some three miles east of Richmond, where he finally died Sept. 25, 1844, leaving a wife, who has since died, and six children, who still reside in Utah and Arizona. Just before he breathed his last, he remarked to his wife that he had the promise from the Lord that his children should never lack for bread, a prediction that has been fulfilled in all instances. A county road, which was afterwards surveyed, ran directly over his grave, leaving it in the center. His daughter Sarah, of Salt Lake City, Utah, visited the spot about ten years ago, and found the grave unmolested; the teams all having driven on either side of it. She also renewed the paling around the grave. Some years previous to his death a somewhat remarkable case of healing occurred under the hands of Isaac Russell to Mathew Walton, who was restored to health almost immediately. On one occasion he was thrown into Richmond Jail for alleged contempt of court, by the notorious Judge Austin A. King, but was bailed out the following day. His upright, straight-forward life obtained for him the love of all associates who truly knew him. A short time before his death, he remarked to his nephew that great good would yet result from "Mormonism"; and before leaving England he said in a sermon that what he then taught was the Gospel of truth, no matter what might afterwards become of him. Heber C. Kimball, in presence of the writer of this sketch, said that Isaac Russell was the finest speaker he had ever heard.

GEO. W. RUSSELL.

SMITH, (CHLOE,) a young woman, who was miraculously healed under the administration of the Prophet Joseph Smith. She, being an early member of the Church, was lying very low with a lingering fever, in the summer of 1831, with a family who occupied one of the houses on the farm of Isaac Morley, in Kirtland, Ohio. Many members of the Church had visited and prayed with her, but all to no effect; she seemed at the point of death, but would not consent to have a physician. This greatly enraged her relatives, who had cast her out because she belonged to the Church, and who, together with many of the people of the neighborhood, were greatly stirred up to anger, saying, "These wicked deceivers will let her lie and die without a physician, because of their superstitions; and if they do, we will prosecute them for so doing." These were daily watching for her last breath, with many threats. Under these circumstances, Joseph Smith and Parley P. Pratt, with several other Elders, called to see her. She was so low that no one had been allowed for some days previous to speak above a whisper in her presence, and even the door of the log dwelling was muffled with cloths to prevent a noise. The Elders kneeled down and prayed vocally all around, each in turn; after which President Smith arose, went to the bedside, took her by the hand, and said unto her with a loud voice, "In the name of Jesus Christ arise and walk!" She immediately arose, was dressed by a woman in attendance, when she walked to a chair before the fire, and was seated and joined in singing a hymn. The house was thronged with people in a few moments, and the young lady arose and shook hands with them as they came in; and from that minute she was perfectly restored to health.

THE TWELVE APOSTLES.

CHARLES COULSON RICH,

A son of Joseph Rich and Nancy O. Neal, was born in Campbell County, Kentucky, Aug. 21, 1809; was baptized into the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints by Ira M. Hinkley in Tazewell County, Illinois, April 1, 1832, and ordained an Elder in Fountain County, Indiana, by Zebedee Coltrin, while en route to Kirtland to see the Prophet Joseph. He received his endowments in the Kirtland Temple, and was ordained a High Priest under the hands of Patriarch Hyrum Smith, at Kirtland. He moved, with his father, to Far West, Missouri, in 1836, and was married to Sarah D. Pea, February 11, 1837, near Caldwell County, Missouri, by George M. Hinkle.

Brother Rich took a prominent part with the Saints in all the persecutions in Missouri. While carrying a flag of truce between the camp of the Saints and mobocrats, at Far West, he was shot at, about ten yards distant, by Samuel Bogart, a Methodist preacher and a mob officer. At the battle of Crooked River, when D. W. Patten fell mortally wounded, and while bullets were flying thick and fast, he laid down his sword in the heat of the battle and administered the ordinance of laying on hands to the dying hero; after which he resumed the sword, assumed command, and the battle of Crooked River was won by the Saints. Because of the prominent part he took in the Missouri troubles, he was forced to flee for his life through the wilderness into Illinois. He was ordained a member of the High Council in Nauvoo, and was also a member of the City Council. He left Nauvoo on the 13th of February, 1846, and presided over Mount Pisgah branch the following winter. Left Pisgah March 20, 1847, for Winter Quarters, starting for Salt Lake Valley June 14, 1847, in charge of a company of moving Saints. He arrived in Salt Lake Valley October 3, 1847. During the absence of the Twelve, on their return to Winter Quarters, he acted in the valley as Counselor to Father John Smith, who was left to preside over the colony.

Elder Rich was ordained a member of the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles February 12, 1849, and started on a mission to California on the 9th of the following October, returning home November 4, 1850. He again started for California, March 6,1851, with a portion of his family and a company of Saints by the southern route, to purchase a place for the location of the Saints that might be gathered from the islands of the Pacific. With Elder Amasa M. Lyman, in September, 1851, he purchased the rancho of San Bernardino, containing about one hundred thousand acres of land, for the sum of $77,500, to which place the company removed and began the foundation and settlement of what is now one of the richest and finest countries in southern California. When the Buchanan war broke out, the rancho of San Bernardino was sold, and the Saints returned to Utah. Brother Rich leaving there April 16, 1857, arrived in Salt Lake City in June of the same year. He accompanied Gen. Daniel H. Wells to Echo Canyon and Fort Bridger during the Buchanan war, rendering valuable counsel and aid. In 1860 he was called on a mission to England, and for a time was associated with Elder Amasa M. Lyman in the Presidency of the European Mission. He returned home in 1862. In the autumn of 1863 he explored Bear Lake Valley and moved his family there the following spring. He was a natural pioneer and was the leader of the original settlers to that valley, where he resided until his death, continuing to be the main director in the establishment of towns and settlements in that region. Rich County, the extreme northern county of Utah, was named in honor of him. During the early years of the Bear Lake settlements, the only means by which the residents could get their mails from, or have any communication with the valleys farther south, when the snow was deep in the mountains,was by crossing on snow-shoes. When others would shrink from the dangerous undertaking of traversing the mountains at such seasons, when terrific storms prevailed, Brother Rich would set out. His wonderful strength and great powers of endurance, of which he never seemed to know the limit, and his almost intuitive knowledge of the country, always enabled him to go through, though in doing so he sometimes bore fatigue enough to kill an ordinary man. He made many of these hazardous journeys over the mountains; indeed for a number of years that was his usual mode of traveling when going to Salt Lake City to attend the session of the Legislature, or returning from the same.

In the early days of the Church Elder Rich figured conspicuously as a military man and was distinguished for his coolness and bravery. He held the office of major-general in the Nauvoo Legion,and was by many familiarly called General Rich up to the day of his death. When an attempt was made to kidnap the Prophet Joseph Smith and take him to Missouri, Brother Rich, at the head of twenty-five men, started out from Nauvoo to render him assistance, and returned after having traveled about five hundred miles on horseback in seven days. In the political affairs of Utah he served several terms as a member of the Council and House in the Territorial Legislature. Throughout his lifetime he was less noted for his brilliant talents than for his real goodness. He was a man of generous impulses, and seemed to live for the happiness of others rather than his own. Cheerful, honest, industrious, benevolent, extending substantial sympathy to those in need, and giving fatherly counsel to and setting a worthy example before all around him, he moved on through life, honored and beloved by all who knew him. On Oct. 24, 1880, he was stricken with paralysis and died at his home in Paris, Bear Lake Co., Idaho, Nov. 17, 1883. During all these three years of affliction he was never heard to complain or in any manner evince anything but a spirit of the utmost contentment and resignation.

LORENZO SNOW,

A son of Oliver Snow and Rosetta L. Pettibone, was born April 3, 1814, in Mantua, Portage Co., Ohio. The following brief sketch of his life was written by his illustrious sister, Eliza R. Snow:

"Our father was a native of Massachusetts—our mother, of Connecticut, and were descendants of the genuine Puritan stock—those who fled from religious persecution in the 'old world' and landed on 'Plymouth Rock,' of historic celebrity.

"Early in the settlement of that portion of country now known as 'Middle States,' our parents with their family, consisting of two daughters, Lenora Abigail and Eliza Roxcy, the writer of this history, left the home of their youth, and moved to what was at that period considered the extreme west, or, as it was sometimes styled 'the jumping off place,' and settled in Mantua, Portage Co., Ohio, making the eleventh family in the township. There two daughters and three sons were added to the family, to-wit: Amanda Percy, Malissa, Lorenzo, Lucius Augustus and Samuel Pearce.

"Many times and with intense interest have their children listened to recitals of the hardships our parents encountered and the privations they endured in that new and heavily timbered country, so very forbidding when compared with the beautiful prairie landscapes of the west. But as true and worthy representatives of our noble ancestors, they were proof against discouragement—surmounted every difficulty, and through the blessings of God on their efforts, created for them and their children an enviable home. * * *

"In their religious faith our parents were by profession, Baptists, but not of the rigid, iron bedstead order: their house was a resort for the good and intelligent of all denominations, and their hospitality proverbial. Thus, as their children grew up, we had ample opportunities for forming acquaintances with the erudite of all religious persuasions.

"Without the least shadow of vanity we can truly say of our parents, their integrity was unimpeachable, and they were trustworthy in all the social relations and business transactions of life; and carefully trained their children to habits of industry, economy and strict morality, and extended to them the best facilities for scholastic education the country at that time afforded.

"Although a farmer by occupation, father was much abroad on public business, and Lorenzo, being the eldest of the three brothers, was left in charge, and early in life became accustomed to responsibilities which he discharged with scrupulous punctuality and that inflexibility of purpose which insures success; and from early childhood exhibited the energy and decision of character which have marked his progress in subsequent life. An unseen hand evidently was guiding him, for in his boyhood, he was energetically yet unconsciously preparing for the position in life he was destined to fill. Ever a student at home as well as in school (most of his schooling after his twelfth year was during the winter terms), his book was his constant companion when disengaged from filial duties; and when sought by associates, 'hid up with his book' became proverbial. With the exception of a special term of tuition under a Hebrew professor, he completed his scholastic training in Oberlin College, which at that time was exclusively a Presbyterian institution. It was through the solicitation of an intimate friend who was connected with the college, that he was induced to enter, and through whose influence he was admitted as a special favor.

"Although religiously trained from infancy, up to this time my brother had devoted little or no attention to the subject of religion, at least, not sufficiently to decide in preference of any particular sect.

"In the progress of his development, his ambition strongly led in the direction of military distinction, so much so, that, watching with a sisterly jealous eye the steps one by one, by which he gained promotion in the military road to honor, I feared lest in the course of human events his path might lead to the battle field and his earthly career prematurely close on a gory bed. I frequently plead, entreated, and at times exhausted my whole capital stock of persausion to no purpose. He must have a first class military suit, and no one could make it so precisely to his liking as his sister: his sister had made his 'freedom suit' (at the time referred he had passed his twenty-first year) which every one admired—it fitted him exactly, and now this most important of all mortal habiliments should be entrusted to no other skill. I made the suit—it was beautifully magnificent, and my brother donned it with as much, if not of military pride, of self-satisfaction as ever Napoleon won a battle; but of short duration, for he soon felt that his ambition could not be satisfied without a complete collegiate course of education. Determined on this, he disposed of his lovely paternal inheritance and started for Oberlin. His classical purpose was very satisfactory to my views—forming a permanent quietus to my imaginary military forebodings.

"On his way to Oberlin my brother accidentally fell in company with Elder David W. Patten, an incident to which he frequently refers as one of those seemingly trivial occurrences in human life which leave an indelible trace. This gentleman was an early champion of the fullness of the Gospel, as taught by Jesus and his Apostles in the meridian of time, and revealed in our own day through the Prophet Joseph Smith; to which cause Elder Patten fell a martyr October 24, 1838, in Missouri, during the terrible scenes of persecution, through which the Latter-day Saints passed in that State. He possessed a mind of deep thought and rich intelligence. In conversation with him my brother was much impressed with the depth and beauty of the philosophical reasoning with which this inspired Elder seemed perfectly familiar, as he reasoned on the condition of the human family in connection with the sayings of the ancient prophets, as recorded in the Scriptures—the dealings with, and the purposes of God in relation to his children on the earth. From that time a new field, with a new train of reflections, was opened to my brother, the impress of which has never been erased.

"We will now leave the subject of this sketch in Oberlin, clubbed with three or four of his classmates, alternately cooking their own food, and pursuing their studies with combined energies, while we digress in order to form a connecting link in our narrative.

"Having myself been thoroughly convinced of the authenticity of the Gospel in its purity, as revealed through Joseph Smith, in the autumn of 1835, I left our father's house and united my interest with the Latter-day Saints, purchased a house and lot in Kirtland, Ohio, rented a part of the house, while a widowed sister of ours, with two children, occupied the other after the first six months: my time being spent in teaching the family school of the Prophet. Now, to our narrative:

"So intimately was my brother associated while at college that he became thoroughly acquainted with the profession and practice of the denomination by which that popular institution was controlled; and although he cherished very friendly regards for the people, he was unfavorably impressed with their system of religion. A short time before leaving he wrote, asking many questions concerning revealed religion, at the same time saying, 'If there is nothing better than is to be found here in Oberlin College, good-bye to all religions.'

"I answered his questions, and knowing he intended crowning his studies with a thorough knowledge of Hebrew, invited him to come to Kirtland at the close of his term in Oberlin, as a school was soon to commence under the tuition of an able Hebrew professor, for the sole study of that language. Accordingly he came, but not with the most distant idea of embracing the faith of the Latter-day Saints, of which were most of the Hebrew students, with whom, including Apostles and the Prophet Joseph, he became familiarly associated; and, while he studied the dead language of the ancient Hebrews, his mind also drank in and his heart became imbued with the living faith of the everlasting Gospel—'the faith once delivered to the ancient Saints,' and not many weeks passed after his arrival before he was baptized into the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. (He was baptized by Elder John F. Boynton in June, 1836.)

"What a marvelous change crossed the path of the young aspirant! This one act of stepping into the waters of baptism, with its accompanying ordinance of laying on of hands for the reception of the Holy Ghost, by authorized administrators, opened up a new world before him. He now sees with a changed and vastly enlarged vision—having been invested with an additional, a sixth sense, a sense which comprehends the things of God, which penetrates into futurity, and estimates eternal values.

"How wonderfully changed all his youthful aims! How suddenly they sink into insignificance! How extended the sphere of his youthful anticipations. How glorious—how exalted the motive power, the incentive that now prompts his youthful ambition! Instead of earthly military renown, he now enters the arena for championship with the armies of heaven—the achievements of the Gods, crowned with the laurels of eternity, everlasting glory, honor and eternal lives. Not to be armed with carnal weapons, and to be decked with glittering badges and costly equipage, to march forth in the pomp and pride of battle array for the shedding of human blood: but to go 'forth without purse or scrip,' clothed in the power of the Gospel of the Son of God, wielding the sword of the spirit of the Almighty, he now takes the field to battle with the powers of darkness, priestcraft, superstition and wickedness until the kingdoms of this world shall have become the kingdom of our Lord and Savior, Jesus Christ.

"Like a veteran soldier, constantly at his post, from that time to this, Lorenzo Snow has been an active missionary in the cause he espoused, —either at home or abroad, wherever his labors were required,—having performed several missions in this as well as in foreign countries.

"In 1837, with his father's family, he moved to Daviess County, Missauri, and the next spring, when he was filling a mission in the South, his people were driven from Missouri into Illinois, where he joined them, and, after performing a mission to the Eastern States in 1840, he was sent on his first mission to Europe. In England, where he arrived Oct. 21, 1840, he succeeded his predecessors in the Presidency of the London Conference, and after the Twelve had left England, he acted as Counselor to Parley P. Pratt, who presided over the European Mission. * * *

"Before leaving England, President Brigham Young, who had succeeded in raising means to publish the Book of Mormon, gave directions for copies to be specially prepared and richly bound for presentation to her Majesty and the Prince consort. The honor of this devolved on Lorenzo Snow, who was at that time President of the London Conference. The presentation was made in 1842, through the politeness of Sir Henry Wheatley; and it is said her Majesty condescended to be pleased with the gift. * * *

"A pamphlet entitled 'The Only Way to be Saved,' which Elder Snow published while on this mission, has been translated into every language, where the fulness of the Gospel has been preached under the 'Mormon' dispensation.

"At the close of this mission of nearly three years, he took charge of a large company of Saints, with whom he safely landed in Nauvoo, via New Orleans and the Mississippi River, April 12, 1843.

"Some time after his return he was married, and in the winter of 1845–46, with his family, crossed the Mississippi, and joined the mass of pilgrims from their beautiful city, in that strange and eventful exodus of the nineteenth century, 'from the Land of the Free and the Home of the Brave' (!); stayed in Mount Pisgah, Iowa, until the spring of 1847, when, taking charge of a train of one hundred wagons, he arrived in Salt Lake Valley in the autumn following. The next winter (Feb. 12, 1849) he was ordained into the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles, and in the ensuing autumn called to go to Italy to introduce and establish the Gospel in that land; his mission also extended to other nations and countries wherever opportunity should present.

"After an absence of nearly three years he returned home via Malta, Gibraltar, Liverpool and New York, arriving in Salt Lake City Aug. 30, 1852, and in the following autumn was elected a member of the Utah Legislature.

"The next mission of importance was to locate fifty families in Box Elder County, sixty miles north of Salt Lake City, where a small settlement had been formed, which, for want of the right master-spirit, had lost every vestige of enterprise. and was minus all aim in the direction of advancement. This was in October 1853. To diffuse active energies into this stereotyped condition of things, was not unlike raising the dead, and a man of less strength of purpose would have faltered. Not so the one in question. He went to work, laid out a city, naming it 'Brigham,' in honor of the President of the Church, moved his family to the new city, and thus laid the foundation for the great financial co-operative enterprise that he there built up.

"When the county was organized by the anthority of the Legislature he took the Presidency, as a Stake of Zion. He was elected a member of the Legislative Council to represent the district composed of the counties of Box Elder and Weber.

"In 1864, with Elders E. T. Benson, Joseph F. Smith and others, he visited the Sandwich Islands on important matters relative to the interests of the Saints on those Islands.

"But the great work designed to bring into exercise the gigantic powers, and exhibit this entirely devoted man in the higher plane of practical engineering as an organizer, statesman and financier, was yet to come.

"Prompt to the suggestions of President Young, in an order designed to firmly cement the bonds of union among the Saints, thereby laying a foundation for mutual self-support and independence, through a combination of temporal as well as spiritual interest, on a general co-operative basis, Hercules like, Lorenzo put his shoulder to the wheel, and, although he saw at a glance the magnitude of the undertaking—that it required almost superhuman skill, and the labor of years, his duty was the watchword, and success the ultimatum. Subsequent results showed that no difficulties were too great for him to encounter.

"His first step in the co-operative movement was in the mercantile line. In 1863–64 he commenced by establishing a co-operative store, with stock in shares of $5.00, thus making it possible for people of very moderate circumstances to become shareholders.

"Many difficulties occurred in the start, and the progress was slow, but it steadily gained in the confidence of the people, the stockholders realizing from twenty to twenty-five per cent. per annum in merchandise, and in five years it was an acknowledged success. Then, aided by the profits from the mercantile department, an extensive tannery was erected at a cost of $10,000, the people having the privilege of putting in labor as capital; and soon after these departments were in succesful operation, a woolen factory, at a cost of nearly forty thousand dollars, was brought into working order, again taking labor as stock.

"A co-operative sheep-herd, for supplying the factory, was soon added—then co-operative farms, and to these a cheese dairy. Thus one department of industry after another was established, until between thirty and forty departments were combined — all working harmoniously like the wheels of a grand piece of machinery.

"In 1872–73 Elder Snow accompanied George A. Smith on a tour through Europe, Egypt, Greece and Palestine. While in Vienna, on his return, he received information of his appointment as assistant Counselor to President Young.

"As a missionary he has traveled over one hundred and fifty thousand miles. Probably none of his compeers have been longer in the field, or traveled more, in preaching the Gospel among the nations of the earth."

On Nov. 20, 1885, Lorenzo Snow was arrested by seven U. S. Deputy Marshals at his residence at Brigham City, on a charge of unlawful cohabitation, three indictments having been found against him by the grand jury of the First District Court. There were three regular trials, the first one commencing Dec. 30, 1885, and the last one ending Jan. 5, 1886, conviction being the result in each case. He was sentenced by Judge O. W. Powers, Jan. 16, 1886, the judgment being the full penalty of the law — imprisonment for six months and a fine of $300 and cost—under each conviction. On being asked by the judge, before sentence was passed, if he had anything to say. Brother Snow read the following:

Your honor, I wish to address this court kindly, respectfully, and especially without giving offense. During my trials, under three indictments, the court has manifested courtesy and patience, and I trust your honor has still a liberal supply, from which your prisoner at the bar indulges the hope that further exercise of those happy qualities may be anticipated. In the first place the court will please allow me to express my thanks and gratitude to my learned attorneys for their able and zealous efforts in conducting my defense.

In reference to the prosecuting attorney, Mr. Bierbower, I pardon him for his ungenerous expressions, his apparent false coloring, and seeming abuse. The entire lack of evidence in the case against me on which to argue, made that line of speech the only alternative in which to display his eloquence; yet, in all his endeavors, he failed to cast more obloquy on me than was heaped upon our Savior.

I stand in the presence of this court a loyal, free-born American citizen; now, as ever, a true advocate of justice and liberty. "The land of the free, and the home of the brave," has been the pride of my youth and the boast of my riper years. When abroad in foreign lands, laboring in the interest of humanity, I have pointed proudly to the land of my birth as an asylum for the oppressed.

I have ever felt to honor the laws and institutions of my country, and, during the progress of my trials, whatever evidence has been introduced, has shown my innocence. But, like ancient Apostles when arraigned in pagan courts, and in the presence of apostate Hebrew judges, though innocent, they were pronounced guilty. So myself, an Apostle who bears witness by virtue of his calling and the revelations of God, that Jesus lives—that He is the Son of God, though guiltless of crime, here in a Christian court I have been convicted through the prejudice and popular sentiment of a so-called Christian nation.

In ancient times the Jewish nation and the Roman empire stood versus the Apostles. Now, under an apostate Christianity, the United States of America stands versus Apostle Lorenzo Snow.

Inasmuch as frequent reference has been made to my Apostleship, by the prosecution, it becomes proper for me to explain some essential qualifications of an Apostle.

First, an Apostle must possess a divine knowledge, by revelation from God, that Jesus lives—that He is the Son of the living God.

Secondly, he must be divinely authorized to promise the Holy Ghost; a divine principle that reveals the things of God, making known His will and purposes, leading into all truth, and showing things to come, as declared by the Savior.

Thirdly, he is commissioned by the power of God to administer the sacred ordinances of the Gospel, which are confirmed to each individual by a divine testimony. Thousands of people now dwelling in these mountain vales, who received these ordinances through my administrations, are living witnesses of the truth of this statement.

As an Apostle, I have visited many nations and kingdoms, bearing this testimony to all classes of people—to men in the highest official stations, among whom may be mentioned a President of the French republic. I have also presented works embracing our faith and doctrines to Queen Victoria and the late Prince Albert, of England.

Respecting the doctrine of plural or celestial marriage, to which the prosecution so often referred, it was revealed to me, and afterwards, in 1843, fully explained to me by Joseph Smith, the Prophet.

I married my wives because God commanded it. The ceremony, which united us for time and eternity, was performed by a servant of God having authority. God being my helper, I would prefer to die a thousand deaths than renounce my wives and violate these sacred obligations.

The prosecuting attorney was quite mistaken in saying "the defendant, Mr. Snow, was the most scholarly and brightest light of the Apostles;" and equally wrong when pleading with the jury to assist him and the "United States of America," in convicting Apostle Snow, and he "would predict that a new revelation would soon follow, changing the divine law of celestial marriage." Whatever fame Mr. Bierbower may have secured as a lawyer, he certainly will fail as a prophet. The severest prosecutions have never been followed by revelations changing a divine law, obedience to which brought imprisonment or martyrdom.

Though I go to prison, God will not change his law of celestial marriage. But the man, the people, the nation, that oppose and fight against this doctrine and the Church of God, will be overthrown.

Though the Presidency of the Church and the Twelve Apostles should suffer martyrdom, there will remain over four thousand Seventies, all Apostles of the Son of God, and were these to be slain there still would remain many thousands of High Priests, and as many or more Elders, all possessing the same authority to administer Gospel ordinances.

In conclusion, I solemnly testify, in the name of Jesus, the so-called "Mormon Church" is the Church of the living God; established on the rock of revelation, against which "the gates of hell cannot prevail."

Thanking your honor for your indulgence, I am now ready to receive my sentence.

After being sentenced, the defendant took an appeal to the Territorial Supreme Court and was in the meantime allowed to remain at large under bonds. The decision of the Territorial Supreme Court confirmed the judgment of the lower court, Chief Justice Zane concurring with Associate Justices Boreman and Powers in the first case, but dissenting from them in the other two. The two Associate Justices held that unlawful cohabitation was proved, in the absence of any other evidence, when it was shown that the defendant had lived with a plural wife while he had a legal wife living and undivorced. They held that the law presumed the living with the legal wife. In this view Judge Zane did not concur. The defendant took an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. In order to have the cases advanced upon the calendar of the court of last resort, it was necessary that he should be in durance. For the benefit of many of his brethren who had been indicted and others who were likely to be under the "segregating" process, he elected to go to prison to have the question of the right of the lower courts to so construe and administer the law, and other points, tested as early as practicable. The cases were argued and submitted, and, on May 10, 1886, the U. S. Supreme Court dismissed the cases for want of jurisdiction. To make a show of consistency it reconsidered its own decision in the case of Angus M. Cannon, formerly disposed of, repealed its mandate therein, and treated it in the same fashion, as it belonged to the same class of cases as those of Lorenzo Snow.

On Oct. 22, 1886, he petitioned the First District Court for a writ of habeas corpus, which was denied the following day, but on the 25th, pursuant to section 9 of the Organic Act of Utah and section 1909 of U. S. Revised Statutes, an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States was allowed. This finally came up for hearing on Jan. 20, 1887, and a decision was rendered on Feb. 7th to the effect that:

(1.) There was but one entire offense for the continuous time. (2.) The trial court had no jurisdiction to inflict a punishment in respect of more than one of the convictions. (3.) As the want of jurisdiction appeared on the face of the proceedings, the defendant could be released from imprisonment on a habeas corpus. (4.) The order and judgment of the court below must be reversed, and the case remanded to that court, with a direction to grant the writ of habeas corpus prayed for.

The next day (Feb. 8th), agreeable to this decision, Apostle Snow was liberated from the Utah Penitentiary. The following extract from a letter to his family, dated Salt Lake City, Feb. 9, 1887, speaks for itself:

"Eleven months I had been incarcerated within the walls of a gloomy prison! Imagine for yourselves, how like a dream it seemed, when, suddenly and unexpectedly the prison gate flew open, and, clad in my striped convict suit, I was at once ushered into the presence of a multitude of warm-hearted friends, anxiously awaiting my appearance. O, what warm clasping and shaking of hands! What hearty greetings and expressions of congratulation!

"Having gone the rounds of this animating introductory scene, I repaired to the tailors department of the prison, and donned a new black broad-cloth suit and 'Richard was himself again.'

"Amid the soul-enlivening and heart-cheering gaze of my numerous friends, I was conducted by Hon. F. S. Richards to a carriage and seated with my daughter Eliza S. D., my son Alvirus, and a son of Hon. F. S. Richards.

"When we started for Salt Lake City, it was a matter of astonishment that so large a gathering should put in an appearance on the spur of the moment. Included in the number were Heber J. Grant and John W. Taylor, of the Quorum of Apostles, Hon. F. S. Richards and wife, Abraham H. Cannon, representing the seven Presidents of Seventies, John Nicholson and Geo. C. Lambert, representing the Deseret News, President L. W. Shurtliff of the Weber Stake, and many others—ladies and gentlemen—noble men and women of God, of whose society I am justly proud."

ERASTUS SNOW.

Sixth son of Levi and Lucina Snow, was born at St. Johnsbury, Caledonia Co., Vermont, Nov. 9, 1818. His father's family was among the early settlers of the Massachusetts colony. At an early age Erastus Snow was much impressed with religion, his mother being a member of the Wesleyan-Methodist Church. In the spring of 1832 Elders Orson Pratt and Luke S. Johnson visited Vermont and commenced to preach the fulness of the Gospel. William and Zerubbabel, two elder brothers of Erastus, were the first of the Snow family who were baptized. All the family (there being seven sons and two daughters) subsequently came into the Church, excepting two of the sons and the father. Erastus, who was only fourteen years of age, believed the testimony of the Elders when he first heard it, and was baptized by his elder brother, William, Feb. 3, 1833.

Immediately after his baptism, he commenced to search the scriptures diligently and soon became very disirous to preach. Consequently he was ordained to the office of a Teacher, June 28, 1834, by Elder John F. Boynton. At that time he worked on his father's farm at St. Johnsbury, where a branch of the Church had been organized. Erastus met regularly with the Saints on Sundays and visited them in their houses. He also made several short missionary trips to the neighboring villages, in company with his cousin Gardner Snow and others.

On Nov. 13th he was ordained by his brother William to the office of a Priest, after which he extended his missionary labors into the States of New York and New Hampshire, holding meetings and baptizing quite a number. After being ordained an Elder by Elder Luke S. Johnson, Aug. 16, 1835, he continued his mission with increased zeal in New Hampshire and Vermont, in company with Wm. E. McLellin, his brother Willard and others.

Nov. 8, 1835, he left St. Johnsbury together with Elder Hazen Aldrich and traveled to Kirtland, Ohio, a distance of some seven hundred miles eastward. After a hard journey, during which they came near being shipwrecked on Lake Erie, they reached their destination Dec. 3rd. In Kirtland Elder Snow met the Prophet Joseph Smith for the first time and lived with him several weeks. During the winter he attended the Elders' School, and the following spring received his endowments in the Temple, together with some three hundred other Elders. He was anointed by President Alvah Beman, whose daughter he subsequently married. Thus in his early youth he participated in the glorious blessings which at that time were poured out upon the members of the Church, and especially upon those bearing the holy Priesthood. About the same time he was ordained into the second quorum of Seventies, and received his patriarchal blessings under the hands of Joseph Smith, sen.

After the endowments in Kirtland, the Elders went out preaching with greater diligence than ever, and Elder Snow started on a mission to Pennsylvania April 16, 1836. He was absent over eight months, during which time he traveled 1,600 miles, preached 220 sermons, baptized 50 persons, organized several branches of the Church in western Pennsylvania, and returned to Kirtland, Dec. 29th. On this trip he encountered much opposition from the clergy and endured considerable persecution. On one occasion (Aug. 22nd), when an armed mob had collected at Cherry Run, Armstrong Co., for the purpose of driving him out of the county, he had a narrow escape from having personal violence inflicted upon him. Arriving at Kirtland, he met a number of his friends from the East.

In the beginning of 1837 Elder Snow, together with Luke S. Johnson, made a missionary trip to Portage, 40 miles south of Kirtland, and later, in company with Elder Wm. B. Bosley, he visited the Saints in Pennsylvania. After his return he frequented the High School at Kirtland. Continuing with Elder Bosley as a missionary companion, he started on another mission to the East on the 9th of May. In Andover, Ohio, he held a discussion on the divinity of the Book of Mormon, with a Campbellite preacher by the name of Roberts. The meeting lasted until midnight and resulted in victory to Elder Snow. In Bridgeport, Franklin Co., Penn., two sisters, who were lying at the point of death, were miraculously healed under his administration. Many other cases of healing occurred on this and his former missionary trips. On one occasion, while holding a meeting at Bridgeport, he was disturbed by a mob, which drove him from the place and pelted him with rotten eggs. At Leitersburgh, Maryland, he was accosted in public by a Campbellite preacher, with whom he discussed for twelve hours. On Dec. 5th, after seven months' absence, he returned to Kirtland, having labored faithfully in Ohio, Pennsylvania and Maryland, preached 147 sermons and baptized about forty people.

On Jan. 2, 1838 he started from Kirtland on another missionary tour. A couple of days later he attended a conference of Elders at Milton, 50 miles south. There he was challenged for a debate by a Mr. Hubbard, a Campbellite preacher, who denounced the Book of Mormon as false. Elder Snow suggested to the congregation that he would produce as much proof for the divinity of the Book of Mormon as his opponent could for the Bible. With this the people seemed to be entirely satisfied, and a meeting was appointed for the following day. But when the hour of meeting arrived, none of the six Campbellite preachers, who were present, would abide by Elder Snow's proposition. Being anxious to use every opportunity that presented itself to lay the truth before the people, Elder Snow finally consented to other arrangements, and the debate was continued until 11 o'clock at night. As usual, the truth was triumphant, although Elder Snow was abused in various ways. After this he visited a number of branches in Ohio, Pennsylvania and Maryland, held many meetings and baptized quite a number. He also crossed the Potomac and held meetings in Virginia. Finally he was forced into discussion with another Campbellite preacher in Cookstown, Penn., which was continued for two nights, and ended with complete victory to Elder Snow, although his opponent was the Rev. Mr. Young, considered to be one of the ablest man in the State. The people were almost thunderstruck at the result of the discussion, and Elder Snow, in compliance with their earnest solicitations, remained in the neighborhood several days longer and preached to them.

In the latter part of May he received a message from Kirtland, notifying him to return to Ohio, for the purpose of going to Missouri. With joy he complied with this call and arrived in Kirtland June 3rd, after five months' absence.

In Kirtland he met Elders Kimball and Hyde, who had just returned from their missions to England, and were now preparing for a journey to Missouri. Most of the Kirtland Saints were also preparing to remove to Missouri because of apostasy and persecutions in Ohio. Together with forty or fifty others, Elder Snow started from Kirtland June 25th and traveled by land to Wellsville, on the Ohio River, thence with steamboats down that river, 950 miles, and up the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers, 550 miles further, to the Richmond landing in Missouri. From this place the company traveled 40 miles northward to Far West, in Caldwell County, where they arrived July 18th. Here Elder Snow met his parents and other relatives who had removed thither from Vermont. Some of them were suffering with the fever and ague.

Elder Snow now commenced manual labor, but when the persecution shortly afterwards broke loose against the Saints, he was forced to take up arms, like his brethren, in defence of the people against mob violence. After participating in the defence in Daviess County, he was seized with the fever and ague, and when Far West subsequently was besieged by the mob militia, his physical weakness had become so great that he could hardly walk half a mile. Yet he remained bravely at his post, in the ranks of the defenders of Far West, until the town capitulated. He was also present at the remarkable mock trial before Judge Austin A. King, at Richmond, Ray County.

In Dec. 13th Elder Snow married Artemesia Beman and taught school the following winter in Far West.

In the following February, (1839 , together with other brethren, he was sent by the Church at Far West as a messenger to Liberty, Clay Co., where Joseph Smith, the Prophet, and fellow-prisoners at that time were incarcerated. When the jailor on the evening of Feb. 8th brought supper to the prisoners, the visiting brethren were permitted to enter the cell. That same evening the prisoners, agreeable to an arrangement made the day previous, made an attempt to escape, but failed. When the jailor went out, Hyrum Smith took hold of the door, and the others followed ; but before they could render the assistance needed, the jailor and guard succeeded in closing the door, shutting in the visiting brethren as well as the prisoners.

The jailor immediately gave the alarm, and the greatest excitement followed. Not only the citizens of the town, but a great number from the surrounding country, gathered around the jail. Every mode of torture and death that their imagination could fancy, was proposed for the prisoners, such as blowing up the jail, taking the prisoners out and whipping them to death, shooting them and burning them to death, tearing them to pieces with horses, etc. The brethren inside listened to all these threats, but believing that the Lord would deliver them, laid down to rest for the night. The mob finally became so divided among themselves that they were unable to carry out any of their numerous plans.

That night, while some of the visiting brethren spoke about their being in great danger, the Prophet Joseph told them "not to fear, that not a hair of their heads should be hurt, and that they should not lose any of their things, even to a bridle, saddle, or blanket; that every thing should be restored to them; they had offered their lives for their friends and the Gospel; that it was necessary the Church should offer a sacrifice and the Lord accepted the offering."

The brethren had next to undergo a trial, but the excitement was so great, that the guard dared not take them out until it abated a little. While they were waiting for their trial, some of the brethren employed lawyers to defend them. Elder Snow asked Brother Joseph whether he had better employ a lawyer or not. The Prophet told him to plead his own case. "But," said Brother Snow, "I do not understand the law." Brother Joseph asked him if he did not understand justice; he thought he did. "Well," said Brother Joseph, "go and plead for justice as hard as you can, and quote Blackstone and other authors now and then, and they will take it all for law."

He did as he was told, and the result was as Joseph had said it would be; for when he got through his plea, the lawyers flocked around him, and asked him where he had studied law, and said they had never heard a better plea. When the trial was over, Brother Snow was discharged, and all the rest were held to bail, and were allowed to bail each other, by Brother Snow going bail with them. They also got every thing that was taken from them, and nothing was lost, although no two articles were found in one place.

Before Elder Snow and his companions left Liberty, some of the lawyers, merchants and other leading citizens promised them that they would set the prisoners at liberty for a compensation of $10,000 worth of real estate, but when the brethren, after their return to Far West, had raised that amount, the parties neglected to fulfil their promise. In the meantime the Saints commenced to leave the State, but Elder Snow and others concluded not to go away until the Prophet and his fellow-prisoners were set free. Elder Snow therefore proceeded to Jefferson City and tried to get their case before the judges of the Supreme Court of Missouri. These dignitaries, however, utterly refused to take action in the matter. After much exertion and pleading Elder Snow, finally, through the assistance of the Secretary of State, managed to get an order issued for a change of venue, on the strength of which the prisoners were started from Daviess to Boone County. On this journey, as is well known, they escaped from their guards. On April 15th Elder Snow started with his family for Quincy, Ill., arriving there on the 27th. The prisoners had arrived a few days before.

In the beginning of May, Elder Snow visited Commerce, in Hancock County, which had been selected as a gathering place for the Saints. Here he commenced a new home, and in the following June removed his family to Montrose, on the opposite side of the river, where he had secured a small hut for a temporary dwelling. On July 4, 1839, he started on a mission, to which he had been called at the conference held in Quincy two months previous. He traveled through several counties in Illinois, held a number of meetings and administered to the sick, until it was revealed to him in a dream that his family was sick and needed his presence. He returned home

July 31st and found his wife and a number of his relatives in bed with the fever and ague. They had already suffered a great deal, as there were none to render them assistance, most of the Saints on both sides of the river being sick at that time. Elder Snow, in company with other Elders, went from house to house administering to the sufferers until he also was taken sick. In August he was somewhat better and undertook a journey to Quincy with a team. On the return trip the horses ran away, tipping the wagon in a river. Elder Snow was thrown into the middle of the stream, right under the horses, and was unable to extricate himself. Only through the marvelous preservation of a kind Providence was he saved from drowning. This accident, however, caused a fresh attack of the fever, and he was confined to his bed for several weeks afterwards.

At the October Conference (1839) held in Commerce, Elder Snow was appointed a member of the High Council, at Montrose, and in November following he attempted to go out and preach, but after having held a few meetings, he was again prostrated by sickness and laid up for some time in the house of Brother Haws in Knox County, about seventy miles from Commerce. While remaining there in a helpless condition, he received word from home that his wife lay at the point of death at Commerce. All he could do, however, was to pray for her, as he was not able to return home until the 20th of December following. Then she was much better.

When President Joseph Smith returned from Washington in March, 1840, he told Elder Snow that his labors were much needed in Pennsylvania. Wishing to act upon this suggestion, he at once prepared for a mission to that State. But as the protracted illness to which he and his family had been subjected had reduced him to the depths of poverty, he had no means wherewith to defray traveling expenses, and he was too weak to undertake the journey on foot. After preaching several times in Quincy and attending the April Conference in Commerce, where he received some means from kind-hearted Saints, he finally took leave of his family April 28, 1840, and started on his mission with Elder S. James as a companion. They traveled down the Mississippi and up the Ohio rivers, a distance of about fourteen hundred miles, to Wellsburgh, in Virginia, where they landed May 7th and commenced their missionary labors. After having held a two days' discussion with a Campbellite preacher (Matthew Clapp), Elder Snow continued to Philadelphia and afterwards visited New York and Brooklyn. In these cities he preached several times, and in August visited Rhode Island, where one of his brothers resided. After this he held meetings for five successive days in a New Jersey forest, where 2,000 people were present on one occasion, and seven were baptized. He continued to preach and baptize in Philadelphia and vicinity, and also in New Jersey, until towards the close of September, when he received a letter from Nauvoo to the effect that his mother-in-law, with whom his wife resided, was dead. Concluding under these circumstances to bring his wife to Pennsylvania, he left Philadelphia Sept. 30th and arrived at Nauvoo Oct. 21st, having been absent about six months and traveled 5,650 miles.

On Nov. 7th, after a stay of seventeen days in Nauvoo, he started for Pennsylvania, taking his wife with him. After his arrival in Philadelphia, he published a small pamphlet, which he had written in answer to a publication issued against the Saints by a Methodist preacher. His wife, who had been provided with a home at the house of Brother Wm. Gheen, in Chester County, bore a daughter, Elder Snow's first-born, on Jan. 21, 1841.

With unabating zeal Elder Snow continued his missionary labors, principally in Philadelphia and surrounding counties and New Egypt (New Jersey) and neighborhood, preaching baptizing, visiting the Saints and administering to the sick. Finally he happened to meet Elder Geo. A. Smith, who was returning from his mission to England, and also Elders John E. Page, Dr. Galland, Wm. Smith, Hyrum Smith, Wm. Law and others from Nauvoo. The two last named brethren had visited the New England States, and meeting Elder Snow on their return they desired that he should go to Salem, in Massachusetts, to open the Gospel door. In a revelation given in 1836 the Lord had said that he had much people in that city. Although Elder Snow had expected to return to Nauvoo in the fall and he also knew that his long absence would affect his temporal affairs considerably, he made up his mind to go to Salem, after making the subject a matter of sincere prayer. Consequently he left his former field of labor, where he had gained many warm - hearted friends, who would administer to the wants of himself and family, and on Aug. 16, 1841, he started for a far and to him unknown country, where not a single member of the Church could be found. He took his wife and infant child, which was sick, to Woonsocket, near Providence, Rhode Island, and left them there with his brother, while he continued to Boston. There he held several meetings and met Elder Benjamin Winchester, who had been appointed his missionary companion. They had previously labored together in Pennsylvania. On the 3rd of September they proceeded to Salem, a city which at that time had about fifteen thousand inhabitants, situated 14 miles northeast of Boston. They put up at one of the cheapest hotels in the city and prayed earnestly to the Lord to open the way for the introduction of the Gospel to its inhabitants. The following day they secured the Masonic Hall to preach in and held their first meeting there in the evening of the 6th. Their next move was to print 2,500 copies of a somewhat lengthy circular addressed to the inhabitants of the city, in which the principles of the Gospel were set forth in great plainness.

Elder Winchester then went to Philadelphia, while Brother Snow continued to preach four times a week in the Masonic Hall. By contributions from the congregation he succeeded also in raising means to pay for the use of the hall. He now received numerous invitations to visit people in their houses, and while improving every opportunity that presented itself to deliver his message of peace and salvation, he at length found himself surrounded with friends, and he no longer found it necessary to live at the hotel. Next he asked the Lord to open the heart of some one to receive his family. His prayer was answered. A Mr. Alley, who resided in Lynn, some five miles from Salem, and who was deeply interested in the work, kindly offered Elder Snow's family the hospitality of his home. Brother Snow consequently went to Woonsocket in the beginning of October and brought his family to Lynn, where they remained four weeks, while Elder Snow continued his labors in Salem and Marblehead. Afterwards they removed to Salem. Besides speaking three times every Sunday in the Masonic Hall, he also held meetings in private houses. Among his opponents and the enemies of truth was a priest by the name of A. G. Comings, the editor of a religious periodical. This man published in his paper a number of wicked falsehoods against the Saints, but refused to insert Elder Snow's refutation of them. This led to a public debate in the Mechanic's Hall, where about five hundred people were present. The discussion was continued for six successive nights, and as the interest gradually increased with the listeners, the popular feeling turned against Mr. Comings, whose arguments consisted chiefly of slander and abuse.

The result of it all was, that many more began to investigate the fulness of the Gospel than formerly, and from that time Elder Snow's meetings were so well attended that the Masonic Hall could not hold all who came to hear. Consequently three leading men of the town took it into their heads to rent a more commodious hall, in which Elder Snow preached to full houses for six Sabbaths. On Nov. 8th he reaped the first fruits of his work in Salem, by initiating the first five persons into the Church by baptism, and before the close of February, 1842, the number of baptized had increased to 35. On March 5th he held a conference meeting in the Masonic Hall, and organized a branch of the Church, consisting of 53 members. He also ordained an Elder and a Priest. Subsequently he extended his field of labor to Boston, where he assisted Elder Nickerson in organizing a branch of the Church, and to Marblehead, Bradford, Lynn, Petersboro (in New Hampshire) and other places. In April, 1842, he visited Philadelphia, Penn., where he attended a five days' conference. After his return to Salem, his first son was born on May 1, 1842. Another conference was held in Salem on May 28th, on which occasion 79 members were represented, and the number had increased to 90 the following June, when some of the Saints commenced emigrating to Nauvoo, Ill.

Elder Snow continued his labors in Salem and surrounding country until the spring of 1843. Besides the numerous meetings he held, he had several discussions with preachers of various denominations, which always resulted in victory for the side of truth. Among others, the apostate, John C. Bennett, put in an appearance at Salem, and commenced to lecture against the Saints in Nauvoo and Joseph Smith, but Elder Snow confronted him so ably and energetically that Mr. Bennett soon found it adviseable to leave the town. Under Elder Snow's administrations a number of sick were also healed. Among such could be mentioned a Mr. Baston, in Boston, who, even before he had been baptized, was healed from a deadly fever, and a Sister Spooner in Chelsea, who was healed by the laying on of hands, after being declared by a council of physicians to be incurable. She had for seven months suffered with dropsy of the worst kind. Having set the branch in order and appointed a brother to preside, Elder Snow left Salem March 9, 1843, leaving his family behind, and arrived in Nauvoo April 11th. He had this time been away about two years and a half, and was agreeably surprised to witness the many changes and extensive improvements which had taken place during his absence. He now spent one month among his brethren and the Saints at headquarters, and received much valuable instruction. Among other things the Prophet Joseph Smith personally taught him the principle of celestial and plural marriage.

On May 11th Elder Snow once more turned his face eastward and returned to his family in Salem, but after laboring a few months he took his wife and children and returned to Nauvoo, where they arrived November 5th.

The following winter Elder Snow remained in Nauvoo, and in order to support his family and also complete a house, which he had commenced, he entered into a mercantile business together with Parley P. Pratt, in which he was somewhat successful. Altogether he spent a very pleasant winter in the society of the Prophet and other leading men of the Church, with whom he frequently met in council, and learned many things, to which he formerly had been a stranger. Early in the winter he became a member of the masonic lodge at Nauvoo, and advanced quickly through the various degrees to that of a grand master. When the Masonic Temple in Nauvoo was dedicated on April 5, 1844, Elder Snow delivered the dedicatory speech.

At the General Conference held in Nauvoo April 6, 1844, and the four succeeding days, Elder Snow was again called to go on a mission to the Eastern States. Consequently, about three weeks later (April 30th), he took a memorable leave of his family and the Prophet, whom he never saw again in this life, and commenced his journey. After having visited the branches in Massachusetts, New Hampshire and Vermont, he, in company with four of the Twelve, held a conference in Salem, Mass., July 6th and 7th. About this time the sad news of the martyrdom of Joseph and Hyrum Smith reached him, and he concluded to return home. When he arrived at Nauvoo July 25th he found the Saints bowed down with grief over the loss of their beloved leaders. Elder Snow attended the special meetings on Aug. 8th, at which the Twelve Apostles, with Brigham Young as President, were acknowledged as the highest authority in the Church, notwithstanding Sidney Rigdon's claim to the leadership. Elder Snow spent the winter in Nauvoo, and although his health was poor, he performed considerable public work besides taking care of his family. In February, 1845, he was appointed to make a missionary trip to Wisconsin Territory and northern Illinois. He started almost immediately, but his horse took sick, and he was obliged to return to Nauvoo, where he then attended the April Conference, and a few weeks later witnessed the mock trial of the murderers of Joseph and Hyrum Smith, at Carthage.

During the summer and following fall considerable sickness prevailed in Nauvoo and vicinity, and Elder Snow and family were among the sufferers. In September the mob commenced to persecute the Saints in Hancock County and burn their houses. Elder Snow was present in the general council of the Church, held in Nauvoo the following Oct., where General Warren, Judge Douglas and other State dignitaries, sent by Governor Ford, were present, and where the Saints agreed to leave the State early the following spring. From that time the Saints doubled their efforts in completing the Temple, in order to receive their blessings before leaving for the wilderness. In the beginning of December the attic story was dedicated for giving endowments, Elder Snow and his wife received their anointings Dec. 12th, after which he was called to administer in the Temple, and he remained there night and day for six weeks together with the Twelve and others who were called to officiate in a similar manner. On Jan. 23, 1846, Elder Snow yielded obedience to the principle of plural marriage, by having not only his wife Artimesia, but also a second wife, Minerva, sealed to him for time and all eternity. They also received their second anointings.

During the winter the difficulties with the mob continued to loom up, and when it was decided in council to commence the emigration westward in February, Elder Snow was sent to Quincy to lay in supplies for the pioneer company. After his return President Young counseled him to make preparations for the journey of himself and family. He sold as many of his loose effects as he could at a very low price and equipped himself with such teams and provisions as his limited means would allow, and on Feb. 16, 1846, he left Nauvoo with his family. Through the carelessness of the managers, the boat, which brought his effects across the river, capzised, whereby some of his goods were destroyed and his eldest child had a narrow escape from drowning. He left buildings and real estate in Nauvoo to the value of $2,000. Most of the other exiles made similar sacrifices, and this property was left in the hands of a committee, who was authorized to sell it and use the means thus received for the removal of the poor.

Elder Snow and family traveled in the advance companies until Grand River was reached and the temporary settlement of Garden Grove was located. He then, having lost a number of animals and being short of provisions, concluded to return to Nauvoo to sell his property and thus get means wherewith to continue the journey. Giving his family instructions to press on to Mount Pisgah, he commenced his backward trip on May 14th, together with Brother Edmund Ellsworth, and reached Nauvoo in safety. He, however, found it no easy task to dispose of his property, and it was not until in the beginning of July that he succeeded in trading it for about one fourth of its real value. With the ready means thus gained he paid his debt, bought two other teams and some provisions, took his mother and another widow by the name of Aldrich and her family with him, and again took up the line of march westward on July 5th, accompanied by his brothers, William and Willard, their families and others from Nauvoo. Towards the latter end of the month the little company arrived at Mount Pisgah, where Elder Snow found his family anxiously awaiting his return. The Twelve Apostles and the main camp of the Saints had already reached Council Bluffs, 138 miles further west, and, after tarrying a few days at Mount Pisgah, Elder Snow and family continued the journey to the Missouri River. There the Saints were scattered in small camps, and were busy building huts and preparing for winter. The Twelve had made their temporary head quarters at a point which they had named Cutler's Park, about three miles west of the river on the land of the Omaha Indians. Elder Snow crossed the river and joined the main camp at this place Sept. 1st.

After his arrival at Cutler's Park, he and other members of the family took sick, and his youngest child died Sept. 9th. In the beginning of December, however, he had so far recovered that he, during the remainder of the winter was enabled to make several trips to St. Joseph and other places in Missouri, to lay in supplies for himself and others. Some time before this the main camp of the Saints had removed from Cutler's Park to the Missouri River, where they built the noted Winter Quarters.

In January, 1847, a revelation was given through President Young, showing the mind and will of the Lord concerning the organization of the "Camps of Israel" for further movements. In this revelation Orson Pratt, Wilford Woodruff, Amasa M. Lyman, George A. Smith, Ezra T. Benson and Erastus Snow were selected to organize the Saints into companies and appoint captains of tens, fifties and hundreds, with a President and two Counselors over each company, etc.

In order to comply with this revelation Ezra T. Benson and Erastus Snow visited the Saints, who were temporarily located on Running Water, about one hundred and seventy miles north of Winter Quarters. They were received with much joy by the Saints, to whom they administered advice and comfort.

On April 6th a special conference was held at Winter Quarters and the following day President Young and others of the Pioneers broke up for the West. Elder Snow, having been selected as one of the Pioneers, called his family together (April 8th), laid his hands on his wives and children and blessed them, and after giving them the necessary instructions, and arranging for their comfort as best he could, he joined the Pioneer Camp which was located on the prairie, some seven miles distant. A few days later the actual journey of over one thousand miles was begun. Elder Snow writes:

"Many interesting episodes occurred on the journey, but among trying and affecting ones was the appearance of the mountain fever among us, first attacking Elder Ezra T. Benson, at our encampment at the South Pass of the Rocky Mountains on the 27th of June. From one-third to one-half of our entire company were attacked with this malady before we reached the Valley of the Great Salt Lake, and among the number was Pres. Brigham Young. I, myself, had a severe attack, from which, however, I recovered in about a week. This affliction detained us so that, with the labor on the roads through the Wasatch Mountains, we were unable to reach the Salt Lake Valley until the 21st of July, when Orson Pratt and myself, of the working parties, who were exploring, first emerged into the Valley and visited the site of the future Salt Lake City, and when we ascended Red Butte, near the mouth of Emigration Canyon, which gave us the first glimpse of the blue waters of the Great Salt Lake, we simultaneously swung our hats and shouted, Hosannah! for the Spirit told us that here the Saints should find rest. After about six weeks' labor here, laying out the City and Fort, plowing and planting fields, and building cabins around the Fort block, I started with the rear camp of the Pioneers on the return trip, on Aug. 26th, and, on the last day of October reached Winter Quarters on the Missouri River, where I had left my family, having been about six weeks without tasting bread. The sweet joy of this meeting was mingled with deep grief at the loss of a dear little daughter, Mary Minerva, who had died during my absence.

"Many of our people remaining at Winter Quarters were becoming comparatively destitute of clothing and other necessaries to fit them for a march into the desert: and it was determined, in the councils of the Church, to send a few Elders into the Eastern and Southern States to solicit contributions (from the benevolent) of money or clothing in aid of our poor, most of whom had received little or nothing for their farms, homes and worldly possessions which they had left behind them in Illinois. It fell to my lot to accompany Elder Ezra T. Benson, one of the Twelve, into the Eastern States, to New York, Boston, and many other Eastern towns and cities, soliciting aid. Some received us kindly and contributed money and clothing; but by far the greater proportion of the people turned a cold shoulder to us. We left Winter Quarters about the first of January, 1848, and returned on the 29th of April to Winter Quarters. Sometimes we were together, at other times we were separated, operating in different places. On my return trip, I passed through Ohio and visited the Kirtland Temple, and at St. Louis fell in company with several returning Elders and a company of Saints, with whom I ascended the Missouri River.

"Soon after our return to Winter Quarters there was a general stir and bustle of getting ready for starting with our families to Great Salt Lake Valley, and gathering our year's supply of seeds and provisions. Most of my oxen had perished during the winter, or had been eaten up by the Indians, and I was under the necessity of yoking up my cows and all my young stock to work with the few oxen I had left, to haul the wagons for the journey. I traveled in company with President Young and Kimball and had a very pleasant and agreeable journey, my teams holding out well and my family enjoying good health. We reached our destination with much joy on the 20th of September.

"Soon after our arrival in Salt Lake City, I was appointed one of the Presidency of the Stake, and during the following winter (Feb. 12, 1849), I was called and ordained into the quorum of the Twelve Apostles, together with Charles C. Rich, Lorenzo Snow and Franklin D. Richards, these all filling vacancies caused by the apostasy of Lyman Wight and the organization of the quorum of the First Presidency out of the quorum of the Twelve.

"I continued to labor in the ministry, in common with my brethren, though all were obliged to labor with their hands during the week, in opening up farms and building houses for our families. We all wintered in the Old Fort, which had been commenced and partly built by the pioneers, using our wagon beds chiefly for our sleeping rooms. During the spring of 1849, we began to move out on to our lots, divided the city into wards, and began to fence by wards. During the summer, I built, chiefly with my own hands, two rooms on my lot, one of adobe, the other of logs, separated from each other for a shed between, and got my family moved into them, with some wagon beds by the side of them for sleeping apartments.

"This year the Perpetual Emigrating Fund Company was organized, and the system of emigration inaugurated, which has so largely contributed to the gathering of our people and the building up of Utah Territory. I was appointed one of the committee of three in gathering funds to put into the hands of Bishop Hunter, to send back to our poor brethren left on the Missouri River. At that time our settlements extended only to Provo on the south and to Ogden on the north. We gathered about $2,000. About this time also I participated in the organizing of the provisional government of the State of Deseret.

"At the semi-annual conference in October, I was appointed on a mission to Denmark, to open the door of the Gospel to the Scandinavian people. At the same time Elder John Taylor was appointed to France, Lorenzo Snow to Italy, Franklin D. Richards to England, with several Elders accompanying each of us. We took our departure from Salt Lake City on the 19th of October. Our little company consisted of 12 wagons, 42 horses and mules, 1 carriage and 35 men. This included a couple of our merchants, going to St. Louis after goods, and a number of brethren who went east on business. Shadrach Roundy was appointed captain, and Jedediah M. Grant captain of the guard. Bishop Edward Hunter was also one of the company.

"The chief incident of the journey was a charge made upon our party by about two hundred Cheyenne warriors during our noon halt on the Platte, forty miles above Laramie, on the 12th of November. They were on the look-out for a war party of Crows and thought to gobble up our little party for pastime; but we did not quite relish the sport, and having about one hundred and thirty shots with us, in about one minute's time we formed a line of battle, under the direction of our gallant captain, Jedediah M. Grant, in front of our wagons, with our animals behind them on the river's bank, and when every man's finger was upon his piece ready to fire, the savage horsemen were brought to a sudden standstill. A parley commenced, which resulted in their giving us the road, and they withdrawing to their camps, while we made a good afternoon's march. During the night following a party of Crows succeeded in making a descent upon their camp and running off a number of their horses.

"We went down on the south side of the Platte, and reached the Missouri River, at a point where now stands Nebraska City, on the 7th of December, in a blinding snow storm which had lasted about fourteen hours. The snow was about three feet deep when we reached the old barracks (Old Fort Kearney) on the west side of the river. And how joyful we were at finding there cabins to shelter ourselves and shelter for our animals. We held a meeting that evening, and gave God thanks for our successful journey and our safe arrival over the bleak and dreary plains.

"The Missouri River was full of mush ice, and we saw no means of crossing it. We all joined in prayer that night that the Lord would cause the ice speedily to congeal, and make a bridge for us to cross over. When we woke up the next morning, the river was gorged with ice a little below us, and was piling up with floating ice. The second day we all passed safely over with our horses and wagons, and the day after the ice broke up again and there was no more crossing the river for three weeks after.

"After a visit to Kanesville, about fifty miles up the river, where the Saints received us with much joy, most of the missionaries journeyed together till we reached St. Louis, whence we expected to take different directions through the States to visit the remnants of the Saints, remaining in the States and gathering means for crossing the water. During the week we stopped in St. Louis I had varioloid, (mild smallpox) and was very sick for a few days. I suppose I must have contracted the disease on my overland journey through Misssouri. Sister Streeper, my kind-hearted hostess, who cared for me like a faithful mother, had a large family of children, including a young babe, who was frequently laid in the bed with me, and when the pits began to appear on me, and the character of my disease became known, she in her anxiety exclaimed, "Oh! my poor babe, and my poor children, none of whom have been vaccinated." At first, for a moment, a feeling of grief came over me, that I should be the cause of this agony; but straightway the Spirit came upon me, and I said to her: 'Be of good cheer; because of what you have done to me God will shield you and your house, and none of you shall suffer on my account.' She believed my words and was comforted; and, so far as I know, no soul took the disease from me, except sister Felt, who had a few moments conversation with me, while the fever was on me, and her little infant daughter, who well-nigh perished with the smallpox.

I sailed from Boston on the 3rd of April on a Cunard steamer, for Liverpool, where I landed on the 16th, and two days later Lorenzo Snow arrived in a sailing vessel from New York. We visited many of the churches in England, Scotland and Wales. During the next four weeks I received many contributions in aid of our missions. On the 14th of June, 1850, I landed in Copenhagen, the capital of Denmark, in company with Elders George P. Dykes and John E. Forsgren—the former an American and the latter a native of Sweden. We were met at the wharf by Elder P. O. Hansen, a native of that city, who had embraced the Gospel in America, and had left Salt Lake City with us, but had made his way in advance of us to his native land."

Brother P. O. Hansen conducted Elders Snow, Dykes and Forsgren to a hotel, where, after being shown an upper room, they all kneeled together and offered up thanksgiving to God, dedicating themselves to His service. Finding the hotel noisy, they moved to a private house (L. B. Malling's) the next day, where they were kindly received and well entertained. On the following Sunday (June 16th) they attended a meeting, conducted by Mr. P. C. Mønster, a Baptist reformer, who had been subjected to much persecution because of his religious belief. He was an educated man and commenced to investigate the principles taught by the "American missionaries" in real earnest, and at one time it seemed as if he would embrace the fulness of the Gospel, together with his whole congregation, but finally he hardened his heart and rejected the truth. The principal and best part of his followers, however, were subsequently baptized into the true Church of Christ, and as was the case with the Campbellites in Kirtland, Ohio, in the early days of the Church, so also did a congregation of reformed Baptists furnish the first fruits of the preaching of the Gospel in its fulness in Denmark.

On the 12th of August, 1850, Apostle Snow baptized fifteen persons in the clear waters of the beautiful Øresund, near Copenhagen. Ole U. C. Mønster was the first man and Anna Beckstrøm the first woman baptized. These had all been members of Mr. P. C. Mønsters reformed Baptist Church.

On Aug. 14th the first confirmations took place in Denmark, and on the 25th the sacrament was administered there for the first time by divine authority in this dispensation. On the latter date the first ordination to the Priesthood also took place, Brother K. H. Bruun being ordained to the office of a Priest. The first native Elder ordained was Brother Christian Christiansen. After the first baptisms others came forward and followed the example, and on Sept. 15, 1850, the first branch of the Church in Scandinavia was organized in Copenhagen, with 50 members.

The young Saints rejoiced exceedingly under the influence of the Spirit of God, which was abundantly poured out upon them, the manifestations of the power of God in the healing of the sick also gladdened their hearts, and before the end of the year the work had taken deep root, not only in Copenhagen, but in the province of Jutland, where another branch of the Church had been organized in Aalborg by Elder George P. Dykes, Nov. 25, 1850.

In the meantime Elder John E. Forsgren had gone to Sweden, where he succeeded in baptizing a few, after which he was arrested, guarded and finally banished from the country.

Apostle Snow, assisted by Elder P. O. Hansen and others, set diligently to work translating the Book of Mormon into the Danish language. The book was published in the beginning of 1851, and was the first edition of that divine record published in a foreign language. In order to get means for its publication Elder Snow had to make a trip to England, where he raised the necessary amount among the British Saints. After its completion he made a second trip to England. Shortly before his return home, in 1852, he also published the Doctrine and Covenants in the Danish language.

In September 1850 Apostle Snow wrote an interesting pamplet entitled "En Sandheds Røst" (A Voice of Truth) explaining the first principles of the Gospel in a very plain and forcible manner. Nearly 200,000 copies of that little work has since been published in the Danish and Swedish languages. "Remarkable Visions" by Orson Pratt and a number of other pamphlets were subsequently translated and published in Danish.

By diligent application and close study Elder Snow also acquired a sufficient knowledge of the Danish language to enable him to converse quite freely with the people; and thus he became more intimately acquainted with their characteristics, manners and habits. By an exemplary and consistent life and kind ways he soon gained the love and confidence of a race, whose devotion to the cause of truth and high regard for its advocates has been subjects of much comment in later years. Apostle Snow soon learned to appreciate the warm feelings, full-heartedness and true friendship of the Scandinavian Saints, and to-day better than ever, no doubt, he realizes the fact that among his best and truest friends are some of those who embraced the fulness of the Gospel under his administrations in that comparatively unknown country of the north. It is here also worth recording that none of the missions established by the Elders in this last dispensation, save the British, has been so fruitful as the one founded by Apostle Snow in the years 1850–52 in Scandinavia.

In 1851 a Danish hymn book was prepared and printed and a monthly (soon changed to a semi-monthly) periodical called "Skandinaviens Stjerne" commenced. This paper is still the Church organ in Scandinavia, and is now running on its 36th volume.

As in all other countries, where the fulness of the Gospel has come in contact with the erroneous traditions and creeds of men, persecutions on the part of the clergy and the ignorant soon began to show its face in Denmark, and in various places the Elders and Saints were subjected to cruel treatment by mobs. Religious liberty had been granted the year before the mission arrived, but the people generally did not seem to understand the change proposed by this action of the government, and the authorities also were slow in rendering protection to such as were openly denounced by the clergy and others as false Prophets. But the more severe the persecutions, the better the work flourished. New branches sprang into existence in nearly all parts of Denmark, and in the latter part of 1851 the Gospel was also succesfully introduced into Norway.

Elder Snow soon found himself surrounded by a host of intelligent native Elders, who labored with a zeal perhaps up to that time unequaled in the history of the Church. Returning from England in Aug., 1851, he held the first general conference of the Church in Scandinavia. The second one was held in the following November, on which occasion three conferences (Copenhagen, Fredericia and Aalborg) were organized. In the beginning of 1852, having laid a good and firm foundation for the work of God in Denmark, Apostle Snow began to make preparations for returning home. On Feb. 20th, 21st and 22nd the third general conference was held in the city of Copenhagen, on which occasion nearly six hundred members were represented in Denmark, besides a few in Norway and Sweden. On the 24th a farewell feast was arranged for Brother Snow in a large hotel parlor. About three hundred persons were present on that occasion, and a time, such as had never been had before in that land, was enjoyed by the young and confiding Saints. All vied with each other in showing their appreciation of and good feelings towards the man who had brought them the true religion of Christ.

On March 4th Apostle Snow, taking an affectionate leave of his flock, sailed from Copenhagen, accompanied by nineteen emigrating Saints. These, together with nine others, who had embarked a few weeks previous, were the first direct fruits of the Gospel from the Scandinavian countries. They have been followed by more than twenty-five thousand others.

After spending a few weeks in England, attending to the organization of the Deseret Iron Company and other matters, Apostle Snow embarked from Liverpool on May 8th, in company with Franklin D. Richards, and arrived safely in Salt Lake City Aug. 20, 1852, having been absent from his mountain home nearly three years.

At the October Conference, 1853, he was called, in connection with Geo. A Smith to gather fifty families to strengthen the settlements in Iron

County; and the following year he was sent east to take charge of the Church in St. Louis and the Western States. Accompanied by other Elders he left G. S. L. City July 8, 1854, and on the 4th of November following he organized a Stake of Zion at St Louis, Mo. On Nov. 22, 1854, he commenced the publication of the St. Louis Luminary, and he also superintended the emigration, crossing the plains. In 1855 over two thousand Saints commenced the journey to the valleys from Mormon Grove, a place near Atchison City, Kansas, which had been selected by Elder Snow as the starting point for the overland journey. From this mission he returned to Salt Lake City Sept. 1, 1855.

On April 22, 1856, Elder Snow left his mountain home on another mission to the States, from which he returned in August the following year. Having returned from still another mission to the East he was called, in connection with G. A. Smith and other Elders, on a mission to Southern Utah, with a view to locating settlements in the valleys of the Rio Virgin and Santa Clara, for the purpose of raising cotton. This mission started from Salt Lake City Nov. 29, 1861. St. George and other settlements were located the same year; and Apostle Snow has ever since devoted a great deal of his time to the interest of Southern Utah, over which he presided spiritually for many years and also represented the southern counties in the Council branch of the Utah Legislature, until disfranchised by the Edmunds law.

In 1873 he performed a short mission to Europe, on which he again visited Scandinavia, since which he has principally been engaged in traveling among the Saints in Utah, Arizona, New Mexico and Colorado, aiding in locating new settlements, organizing new wards and Stakes of Zion, as well as strengthening and building up the older ones. Perhaps no other man in the Church has done more pioneer labor than has Apostle Snow. His diligence, untiring zeal and energy are really remarkable; and his name will go down to future generations as a man who devoted all his strength and ability to the building up of the kingdom of God on the earth and for the benefit of mankind. But notwithstanding all he has done in the interest of his country, he is now numbered among the "exiles for conscience sake," not being allowed, under the pressure of the unhallowed persecution now raging against the Latter-day Saints, to remain in peaceful possession of a home within the borders of that land over which the "stars and stripes" wave in supposed triumph over tyranny and oppression. Though now somewhat advanced in years, Apostle Snow enjoys good health, and his mind is apparently as bright and active as ever. His long and varied experience makes him a wise and safe counselor in the midst of his brethren of the Priesthood.

THE BARK "JULIA ANN."

Out of the great number of companies of Latter-day Saints which have crossed the ocean from Europe, Asia, Australia and the Islands of the Sea, the following instance is the only one on record, where loss of life has been caused by shipwreck:

The American bark Julia Ann, Captain B. F. Pond, sailed from Sydney, New South Wales, Australia, Sept. 7, 1855, bound for San Francisco, Cal., with 56 souls on board. Twenty-eight of that number, including Elders James Graham and John S. Eldredge, two American missionaries returning home, were Latter-day Saints on their way to Utah. Elder John Penfold, sen, had been appointed by President Augustus Farnham to take charge of the company. The bark left the Sydney Heads at 2 o'clock p. m. with the wind blowing from the north-east. Rather rough weather was encountered for a few days, with strong winds from the east north-east, which caused considerable sea sickness. Otherwise the voyage was successful until the 3rd of October, about nine o'clock p. m., when the vessel struck on the reefs off the Scilly Islands. Captain Pond, expecting to pass between Mopea and the Scilly Islands, had set the watch in the foretop. The log was hove about 8 o'clock p. m., and the bark was found to be making 11½ knots per hour. Shortly afterwards the sea became broken, and in about an hour the vessel with a tremendous crash dashed head on to a coral reef. She immediately swung around with her broadside to the reef, and the sea made a complete breach over her at every swell.

Directly after she struck, Captain Pond ordered all the passengers into the after-cabin. A scene of indescribeable confusion followed as the steerage passengers rushed into the cabin, and several mothers were seen holding their undressed children in their arms as they had snatched them from their slumbers. In a few moments the fear was in some measure delayed by a sailor who came to the cabin for a light, and who told the passengers that although the ship would be lost their lives would be saved, as they were close to the reef.

By the aid of the spanker boom and the expert swimming of one of the sailors, a rope was carried ashore and fastened to the reef, by means of which many succeeded in making their escape in comparative safety from the vessel. Five, however, were drowned, namely Sisters Humphrey and Harris and three children. Brother John McCarthy, one of the passengers, who furnished the editor of the Western Standard with a graphic description of the disaster, writes:

"I saw mothers nursing their babes in the midst of falling masts and broken spars, while the breakers were rolling twenty feet high over the wreak. One lady—sister Harris—preparatory to leaving the ship with her two children, the eldest of which was two years old, tied the youngest, a babe six weeks old, to her breast; the vessel immediately afterwards broke in two across the main hatch, and the waters rushing in, engulfed herself and child amid the struggling waves and timbers of the wreck.

"There was another lady—sister Humphrey—who had three children. When the vessel struck she told her friends to protect her children and convey them safely to Great Salt Lake City, for her earthly career was run. Shortly afterwards she, with one of her children, was swept by a sea into the foaming surf, and they were seen no more. There was also a young mother of seventeen, who manifested true courage during the dreadful scene; her husband took their child and lashed it to his back, and struggled to the reef on a rope, with his wife close behind him, and the three were saved unhurt. I must here remark, that amidst all these awful and appalling scenes, not a shriek of despair was heard from one of these mothers and children.

"By about midnight the principal part of the passengers had reached the reef, with the exception of Elder James Graham, and some of the brethren. Soon afterwards the vessel broke to pieces, and the part they were on was providentially carried high upon the rocks, and they were landed in safety. All hands reached the reef, excepting two women and three children who were drowned.

"With our bodies much lacerated by the sharp coral reef, and with a dreary waste of water without land in sight, our situation was a pitiable one; but when the light burst forth from the eastern horizon, we discovered at the distance of about twelve miles, the outline of the Scilly Isles. Is was then ascertained that the vessel had struck on the south-west reef of these isles; and by a subsequent observation it was ascertained, that the true position of the Scilly Isles was sixteen miles from the place indicated by the chart.

"At sunrise all hands commenced to make a raft with fragments of the wreck, to convey us to the islands. By about noon the remains of a quarter boat was also fixed up with canvas and copper, to convey the women and children to the land; still the men were compelled to remain on the reef two days and two nights, without anything to eat or drink, and this under a burning tropical sun. The third day we succeeded in reaching the island upon the raft, and found that its only inhabitants were rats and seafowl; there was no fresh water to be seen in any direction. By scraping holes, however, in the sand, near the water's edge, with a pearl shell, we were enabled to obtain water, which, by filtration through the sand, was rendered comparatively fresh and palatable. We kindled a fire by the aid of a sun glass, and roasted some shell-fish, and made a very light repast.

"After we were all landed on the island, Captain Pond called all hands to order, and delivered a short address, stating that as we were cast away upon a desolate island, a common brotherhood should be maintained, and every man should hunt birds and fish for our common sustenance, to which proposition all assented. The next morning we found a turtle upon the beach that weighed about three hundred pounds; this gave us strength and confidence to exert ourselves with energy; and we placed sentinels around the island to watch for turtle and wild fowl. Too much can not be said in commendation of the Saints in this trying situation. I have seen an old lady upwards of sixty years of age out at night hunting turtle.

"In this situation we remained seven weeks. By that time the ship's carpenter had repaired the quarter boat so that it was thought that she might possibly live to perform a voyage to some inhabited land. This, after great difficulty, was launched over the reef, and the captain and nine men, including myself, embarked. Our provisions were a little salt pork and jerked turtle, with two casks of water; there was great danger of being swamped in crossing the reef, with our small boat, but we providentially succeeded in getting safely outside, and were heartily cheered by those on shore. We returned their cheers and took our departure.

"Our boat was almost level with the water; but after four days' hard pulling through squalls and calms, we succeeded in reaching Borabora, one of the Society Islands, a distance of about two hundred miles. The inhabitants treated us with much kindness, and fed us upon poi and breadfruit. From thence I went with the mate and one of the crew to the island of Mopiti, and petitioned King Tapoa for relief. We were received with kindness, and obtained two small schooners with which to return and rescue the passengers. In these we returned to the Scilly Isles.

"In the meantime Capt. Pond had chartered the Emma Packer at Huahine, and had sailed for the Scilly Isles and reached there twelve hours before us. She took the passengers from the island and went to Tahiti, consequently when I found they had been taken off, I returned in the schooner to Mopiti. I would here state that while on this uninhabited island we held our regular meetings, dividing the time between worship and labor, as we would have done had we been at our ordinary occupations."

The noble and heroic disposition of Capt. Pond was exhibited throughout the whole sad affair. While the crew was engaged in getting the passengers ashore, Mr. Owens, the second mate, was going to carry a bag containing eight thousand dollars belonging to the captain ashore. The captain ordered him to leave the money and carry a little girl ashore instead. He did so; the child was saved, but the money was lost.

It was on the 3rd of December, 1855, that the unfortunate emigrants were taken from their lonely and exiled condition on the Scilly Islands, by the untiring perseverance of Captain Pond, connected with the charitable good feelings of Captain Latham, master of the schooner Emma Packer, who came to their relief. They were first taken to Huahine, one of the Society Islands, thence to Tahiti, where they were most kindly treated by the inhabitants. The United Board or Masonic Lodge took immediate measures to relieve their wants, by providing or finding shelter and food for all. The American Consul provided for the crew.

Elders Graham and Eldredge returned with the schooner to Huahine, where they remained a month and then sailed for Honolulu, on the Sandwich Islands. After remaining there two weeks they were enabled, by the assistance of an Elder Evans and others, to engage passage on board the Francis Palmer, with which they, after twenty three days' sailing, safely arrived in San Francisco, Cal., April 23, 1856.

Elder John McCarthy, after returning to Mopiti, commenced to preach the Gospel there, found favor with King Tapoa, and soon had the satisfaction of baptizing the king's interpreter, Captain Delano, a Maltese by birth, who could speak seven languages. Brother McCarthy ordained this man an Elder and was enabled through him to preach to the natives, who received his testimony with much favor. After about three weeks' stay at Mopiti, Elder McCarthy sailed for the island of Riatea, where he baptized a Spaniard by the name of Shaw and ordained him an Elder. He remained on that island two weeks, when he obtained passage for Tahiti in a French sloop, and from thence sailed for San Francisco, Cal., where he arrived April 14, 1856.

After the departure of Elders Graham, Eldredge and McCarthy, and another one of the emigrants from Tahiti, the following Saints were left at that place: John Penfold, the President of the company, and his wife, two sons and three orphan children, whose parents were lost; Brother Anderson, wife and seven children, and Brother Logie, wife and one child. Brothers Penfold and Logie, with their families, embarked for California a short time afterwards; and finally Brother Anderson and his family, the last members of the ship-wrecked company, embarked and sailed from Tahiti on the G. W. Kendall on May 5th, arriving at San Francisco, June 27th, after at edious passage.

MISCELLANEOUS.

SNOW, (WILLARD,) a brother of Apostle Erastus Snow, was born May 6, 1811, in St. Johnsbury, Caledonia County, Vermont, was baptized into the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, June 18, 1833, by Elder Orson Pratt, and removed to Kirtland, Ohio, in the spring of 1834, together with his brother Zerubbabel and other members of the family. The same year Willard joined Zion's Camp, in which he traveled to Missouri, where he had a narrow escape from death, being among the number which, while the camp rested in Clay County, Mo., was attacked by cholera. Early in 1835 he returned to Kirtland, where he, on Feb. 28th, was ordained a member of the first quorum of Seventies. After this he performed several missions in the United States, preaching the Gospel in various parts of the country. In 1836, after receiving his blessings in the Kirtland Temple, he removed to Missouri, where, and later in Illinois, he shared in the persecutions raging against the Saints. Thus following the Church from place to place he finally arrived in Great Salt Lake Valley, where he honorably filled the offices of a Counselor to Daniel Spencer, the President of the Stake at G. S. L. City, a member of the committee of the Perpetual Emigrating Fund, a magistrate under the Provisional State of Deseret, a lieutenant-colonel in the Nauvoo Legion, etc. On Aug. 6, 1851, he was elected a representative to the legislative assembly of Utah Territory. At a General Conference held in G. S. L. City, commencing Sept. 7, 1851, he was called to go on a mission to Europe. To fill this he soon afterwards left his mountain home, leaving a wife and four children, and arrived in Liverpool, England, Dec. 29th following. Immediately after he was appointed to labor with Elder Robert Campbell in the pastoral charge of the Church in Scotland, where he continued nearly three months. In March, 1852, Apostle Erastus Snow, who had finished his mission in Scandinavia, arrived in England, on his way to G. S. L. City, and on the 18th of March, 1852, Willard was appointed to succeed his brother in the Presidency of that mission. On April 21st he took the steamer at Hull and arrived at Copenhagen, Denmark, on the 26th. He set to work with a will to learn the Danish language, in which he was quite successful, and at the departure of Elder John E. Forsgren, who had presided temporarily, Willard took full charge of the mission, Dec. 20, 1852, laboring diligently, faithfully and successfully in the discharge of his important duties. While addressing a council of Elders in the evening of Aug. 15, 1853, in Copenhagen, he was so violently attacked with illness that he was unable to proceed. Upon receiving the administration of the Elders he experienced great relief and decided to go to England. On the 18th he took passage on board the steamer Transit, but while on board he was again prostrated. He soon became unconscious, and continued to sink gradually until the evening of Aug. 21st when he expired. Elders P. O. Hansen and H. P. Jensen were with him, but notwithstanding their earnest solicitations, the body, to comply with the captain's wishes, was sunk into the sea only a few miles out from Hull. Elder Snow's first wife, Melvina Harvey Snow, died in Salt Lake City, Utah, Oct. 24, 1882, about 71 years of age. Of his two other wives one died shortly after her arrival in the valley, and the other is still alive.

WILLARD SNOW.

"WESTERN STANDARD," (THE) a 24 column newspaper, edited and published in the interest of the Church in San Francisco, Cal., by Elder Geo. Q. Cannon, assisted by Elder Joseph Bull, the latter attending to the typographical work. The first number was published on Feb. 23, 1856, and the paper continued for nineteen months, the total number of issues being 70. It was printed on good paper and from clear type, formerly used in the publication of the Book of Mormon in the Hawaiian language. The reading matter on each page containing six columns measured 21½ × 16½ inches. In the fall of 1857, the march of the United States army on Utah and the probability of a collision between the troops and the Saints, caused the withdrawal of the missionary Elders from California and the suspension of the Standard, the last number of which was dated Sept. 18, 1857. Under the title of "Writings from the Western Standard," its leading articles and editorials were re-published in Liverpool, England, by Geo. Q. Cannon, in 1864. The book contains over five hundred pages of reading matter and is for sale at the Juvenile Instructor Office, Salt Lake City.

THE TWELVE APOSTLES.

FRANKLIN DEWEY RICHARDS,

A son of Phinehas Richards and Wealthy Dewey, was born in Richmond, Berkshire Co., Mass., April 2, 1821. He was the fourth born and is the oldest surviving of his father's nine children. Being raised on a farm, he became at an early age accustomed to heavy labor, but used all the spare time he had for getting an education and laying up treasures of knowledge. Before he was ten years old, he had read every book in the Sunday School, comprising some scores of volumes, and when thirteen years old spent a winter at Lenox Academy. His parents, being devout and respected Congregationalists, trained their children in the pious way, and Franklin was early in life impressed with solemn views on religion. His ideas in regard to many scriptural points was, however, very different from those intertained by most other people, with whom he associated, and this caused him to decline a special offer made to him, to be educated for the ministry in a leading New England college.

In the summer of 1836, Elders Joseph and Brigham Young came from Ohio to Richmond as messengers of the true Gospel of Jesus Christ. They left a copy of the Book of Mormon with the Richards family, and it was carefully and intelligently perused. Franklin brought all the ardor of his studious mind to bear upon it, and after having studied it carefully, accepted it as the truth and believed.

In the autumn of that year (1836) Willard and Levi Richards went to Kirtland, Ohio, as delegates and leaders of the family to the truth. They accepted the Gospel and remained. In the succeeding April, Phinehas with Franklin's younger brother, George Spencer—aged 14 years—also journeyed to Kirtland. They in turn received and acknowledged the truth. In the autumn of 1837, Phinehas returned to Richmond. He found Franklin awaiting baptism; and on the 3rd day of June, 1838, Phinehas had the pleasure of immersing his son within the waters of Mill Creek in Richmond, his native town.

Franklin abandoned his employment, and on Oct. 22, 1838, left Richmond for Far West, Missouri. It was a lonely, toilsome journey.

On the 30th day of that month (October) he crossed the Alleghanies; and almost at the same hour his beloved brother, George Spencer Richards, was slain by an assassin mob at Haun's Mill. But the news of his brother's tragic death and the hideous stories of the "Mormon War" were alike powerless to restrain his purpose and he journeyed on eventfully. After visiting Far West and gaining confirmation of his faith, he found employment along the Mississippi River.

In May, 1839, he first met the Prophet Joseph, and the following spring he was ordained to the calling of a Seventy and was appointed to a mission in northern Indiana. He journeyed and preached with great success; established, by his own personal efforts, a branch of the Church in Porter County; and before he was twenty years of age delivered, at Plymouth, a series of public lectures which attracted much attention. The April Conference for the year 1841 saw him at Nauvoo an adoring witness to the laying of the corner stone of the Temple; and at this eventful gathering he was called to renew his labors in the region of northern Indiana. Just before he was to start on this momentous journey he saw Joseph Smith and Sidney Rigdon take the lead of nearly five hundred baptisms and confirmations, and the glorious sight made his zeal mightier than ever.

In the summer of that year he was at La Porte, Indiana, sick nigh unto death, and yet determined to progress with his mission. He found consoling care in the kindly home of Isaac Snyder, and through several weeks he was nursed as a beloved son of the house. When the family of Father Snyder took up its march for Nauvoo, Franklin was carried back by them to the beautiful city; but soon after the succeeding October Conference he was once more moving in the missionary field—this time being the companion of Phinehas H. Young, in Cincinnati and its vicinity. He fortunately visited Father Snyder's family again in the summer of 1842, just as he was convalescing from an almost fatal attack of typhoid fever; and in December of that year he wedded the youngest daughter of the house—Jane Snyder, who is yet alive. He remained with the Saints at Nauvoo until the latter part of May, 1844, in the meantime being ordained a High Priest; and then was called to depart upon a mission to England. He was accompanied by Apostle Brigham Young and others to the Atlantic States, but before setting sail for Europe he heard the dreadful news of the Carthage tragedy, and was called back to Nauvoo.

The opening months of the next year, 1845, were spent by him in traveling more than a thousand miles among the branches of the Church in Michigan and elsewhere to gather donations for the Temple. He returned to Nauvoo with nearly five hundred dollars for this sacred purpose, and then was chosen by his uncle Willard to be a scribe in the office of the Church Historian. He also labored through the spring of 1846 as carpenter and joiner in the lower main court of the Temple, until the structure was completed and dedicated — having previously received his endowments and participated in the administration of the sacred ordinances therein.

When these duties were concluded and the time for the exodus had come, he sacrificed the pleasant little home, built by his own toil; and with the meagre proceeds he purchased a wagon and cattle and such few necessaries as he could compass for the use of his family—an invalid wife and baby girl. With the heroism of the martyrs, he saw his loved ones starting on that melancholy journey into the Western Wilderness. He committed them to the great Creator's care, and then he turned his face resolutely towards the East to fill his mission to England—without money or sufficient clothing, to make his way by faith alone, across continent and ocean into a strange land. His younger brother Samuel was called to accompany him, and the two missionaries crossed the river to Nauvoo and slept the first night of their arduous journey in a deserted building there. The God whom they so unselfishly served opened their way; they pursued their journey via the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers to Pittsburgh, and across the mountains to the coast; and on Sept. 22, 1846, they sailed from New York in company with Apostle Parley P. Pratt and others. The last word which Franklin received from the Camp of Israel, before the ship put to sea, was that his wife Jane amidst all the privations of the exodus was lying at the point of death—that a little son had been born to her, but the child had quietly expired upon its mother's devoted bosom. This was the comfort brought to the courageous missionary to speed and solace him upon his trying voyage!

On the 14th day of October he landed in Liverpool. A few days later he was appointed to preside over the Church in Scotland, with Samuel as his assistant. Apostle Orson Hyde was at this epoch the President of the British mission and editor of the Millennial Star; though he was soon to depart for America and was to be succeeded by Elder Orson Spencer. But at the hour when the change was expected to be made, a false report of Elder Spencer's death reached Liverpool. The rumor was believed and Apostle Hyde appointed Franklin, then only twenty-five years old, to both of the positions which he, himself, was vacating, but just as he was entering upon his high trust Elder Spencer arrived in England. Franklin was then chosen to be one of his Counselors; and during the subsequent serious illness of the President, Franklin was obliged to sustain the responsibilities and perform the duties of that calling. He labored there until Feb. 20, 1848, when he was appointed to take charge of a large company of Saints who were emigrating to the Rocky Mountains, crossing the Atlantic in the ship Carnatic.

During the time of Franklin's stay in the British Isles, the Saints there had been relieved of the treacherous "Joint Stock Company." The dishonest projectors of the despicable scheme had fled to other regions; and hope and confidence again held sway. But while all in the mission was prosperous, and the young Elder could justly feel proud and happy in the great work of proselyting, melancholy news came to him from the wilderness. His brother Joseph William Richards, a member of the Mormon Battalion, had succumbed to the rigors of the march and his wearied form had been laid in a lonely grave by the banks of the Arkansas River. Franklin's little daughter Wealthy had also died, and left his wife heartbroken, childless and alone.

The homeward journey via New Orleans and St. Louis to Winter Quarters was completed by the middle of May, 1848, and there Franklin found his wife and such of their relatives as had survived the perils and privations of the times. In June he was sent through western Iowa negotiating for cattle with which to move the company of Willard Richards across the plains to the Salt Lake basin. His effort was completely successful, and on the 5th of July the train started, with Franklin acting as captain over fifty wagons. The journey was a most distressful one to his wife. Much of the time it seemed as though each day would be her last. But they found kind and helpful friends who ministered to their wants; and on the 19th of October they entered the valley through Emigration Canyon and camped in the fort, more grateful to God than words can express to find a resting place for wearied frames worn with toil and sickness.

Franklin sold his cloak and every other article of clothing which he could spare, and with the proceeds purchased building material. Before the violence of the winter was felt he was able to construct a small room of adobies without roof and without floor. From this rude mansion on the succeeding 12th day of February, he was called to receive his ordination to the Apostleship.

The young Apostle became immediately associated with the other leading minds of the community in the Provisional Government of the State of Deseret, in general legislative and ecclesiastical work, and in the labors of creating a Perpetual Emigration Fund.

In October, 1849, he was once more called to leave home with its tender ties and its responsibilities of love, and renew his great missionary labor in the British Isles. He traveled in company with President John Taylor, Apostles Lorenzo and Erastus Snow and others, and had a most eventful journey. Hostile Indians, inclement weather and turbulent, icy streams, combined to delay and imperil their progress. But the hand of Providence protected them and the opening month of the year 1850 found them at St. Louis, visiting with dear old friends and brethren.

This was among the grandest missionary movements in the history of the Church. President Taylor was on his way to France, Lorenzo and Erastus Snow were destined for Italy and Scandinavia, and Franklin was to officiate once more in the British Mission.

Orson Pratt had been presiding and editing at Liverpool; but when Franklin arrived there, March 29, 1850, he found that the elder Apostle had been called on a hurried trip to Council Bluffs, and the Star contained a notification that during his absence Apostle Franklin D. Richards would preside over the Church affairs in Great Britain. The young President immediately began the establishment of the Perpetual Emigration Fund, and founded it upon a basis which has enabled its beneficent power to endure until the present day. Later in the season Orson Pratt returned to England, and Franklin relinquished his place as chief, and became Apostle Pratt's associate for a few months; but with the opening of the next year, 1851, Orson was called to the valley, and Apostle Richards was instated as the President. Within twelve months following, his energy and zeal, with that of his brethren, had spread the truth with irresistible sway throughout the Isles of Britain: while Franklin, with tireless hand and brain, doubled the business at the Liverpool office; revised and enlarged the Hymn Book and printed an edition of 25,000 copies; prepared his pamphlet, the Pearl of Great Price; stereotyped the Book of Mormon and arranged for stereotyping the Doctrine and Covenants; issued a new edition of Parley P. Pratt's Voice of Warning; and devised a plan which made the Star a weekly instead of a semi-monthly periodical and increased the number of its issue. He had also paid an interesting visit to President Taylor at Paris, had sent to Zion the first company of Saints whose passage came through the Emigration Fund, and with Apostle Erastus Snow had made arrangements for the organization of a company to engage in the manufacture of iron in Utah. In January, 1852, pursuant to advice from the First Presidency of the Church, who contemplated a visit from him to the Great Salt Lake Valley, he installed in the Liverpool office his brother Samuel, who had been formerly his associate during his ardent and successful Scottish ministry, in order to fit the younger Richards to maintain the increasing work in Franklin's temporary absence.

The baptisms in the British Mission during these two years of Franklin's stupendous labor, extending from the summer of 1850 to the close of spring in 1852, aggregated about sixteen thousand; while the perfected organization of conferences, branches, pastorates, etc., was commensurate with this marvelous increase. After exhaustive investigation Franklin rejected the theory of emigrating the Saints by way of Panama to the California coast; and instead adopted the project of sending one ship to each of the three ports, Boston, Philadelphia and New York. The last received the decided preference, after the experiment; and the plan of voyage between Liverpool and Castle Garden, instituted by Apostle Richards for the European Saints, a third of a century since, is still the universally favored route.

On May 8, 1852, he sailed from Liverpool for New York, and arrived safely in G. S. L. City Aug. 20th. A few days later (Aug. 29th) he was attending the special conference in G. S. L. City, at which was promulgated to the world the famous revelation, which Franklin had long before heard and received, upon the subject of the eternity and plurality of the marriage covenant.

On December 13, 1852, in the Territorial Legislative Assembly he renewed his labors as a law maker. In the opening of the year 1853, he participated in the dedication of the Temple grounds at G. S. L. City and in laying its corner stones. In the succeeding month of July he journeyed with his wife Jane and their two children to Iron County to proceed with the establishing of the iron works, and on the trip encountered, but without any immediate disaster, several parties of hostile Indians. At Cedar City military orders were received from Governor Young and Lieut.-General Wells, in view of Indian disturbances, and Franklin continued assiduously in the work of bringing in the outposts, changing the site of Cedar City, and fitting the people for the resistance of savage aggressions.

He returned to his home in G. S. L. City in time to soothe the closing hours of his mother's life; but was again on the march for the iron region on the 22nd of October His mission there accomplished, he came to G. S. L. City to take part through the winter in the legislative councils, and while thus engaged he was requested by President Young to prepare for another mission to Europe.

Just before departing for England, he held a family gathering, at which he set the example of dedicating his home and all he possessed to the Lord. He reached Liverpool in safety June 4, 1854. His letter of appointment from the First Presidency, published in the Millennial Star, authorized him "to preside over all the conferences and all the affairs of the Church in the British Islands and adjacent countries." This was the signal for the closer amalgamation of all the European Mission under one head. He traveled on the Continent promoting peace and harmony as well as increase to the branches there. Emigration facilities were perfected and enlarged.

In 1855 he engaged for the better accommodation of the growing business in Liverpool, the convenient premises known now as 42 Islington, which have been occupied as the chief offices of the Church in Europe from that day until the present time. In October of this year, the Saxon Mission was originally established in Dresden under his personal direction—a mission which has yielded intelligence and numerical strength to the cause.

His travels were constant and extended to nearly every part of western Europe—until he was probably better informed than any other man regarding the work in foreign lands. He gathered around him a most devoted band of American and foreign Elders; and the cause progressed amazingly. It was also within his province to direct the branches of the Church in the East Indies, Africa, Australia, New Zealand and other parts—making altogether a sphere which no man could fill unless every ambition were centered in the cause.

On July 26, 1856, President Richards, accompanied by Elder C. H. Wheelock, sailed from Liverpool, homeward bound, on the steamer Asia.

At a meeting of the Presidents of conferences, held in London previous to his departure, an affectionate and glowing tribute of esteem was unanimously dedicated to him. On Oct. 4, 1856, he arrived once more in his mountain home, and in December became again a member of the Utah Legislature. January 5, 1857, he was again elected a regent of the University of Deseret. He soon became immersed in the settlement of the estate of his deceased and revered uncle Willard. On Monday, April 20, 1857, he was elected and commissioned brigadier-general of the second brigade of infantry of the Nauvoo Legion. Soon afterwards he paid a visit of observation, with other dignitaries, to Fort Limhi on Snake River.

When the coming of Johnston's army was announced, Brigadier-General Richards was called into council upon measures for public safety and defense; and later, was engaged with a detachment of men from his brigade in giving support to Lieut.-General Wells in Echo Canyon. He, with other devoted citizens, left his valuable property under the charge of a trusty friend, who was to apply the torch and offer it all as a burning sacrifice before it should be seized or desecrated by the boastful invaders. And, after the tragic folly of the invasion was brought to its proper close, he, with others, received a somewhat unnecessary pardon from James Buchanan, President of the United States.

On July 21, 1859, he began a political tour through southern Utah, to advise and arrange for the election of delegate to Congress; and immediately upon his return to G. S. L. City he departed with President John Taylor, to meet two companies of emigrants—many of whom were endeared by old and affectionate associations with Apostles Taylor and Richards.

During the years from 1859–1866, his labors were multifarious; he was engaged in ecclesiastical, political, legislative, military and educational works—besides having a large family responsibility and such growing private interests of agriculture and mill building as his public duties would permit him to inaugurate. He was upon three occasions very ill, but each time he recuperated and renewed his labor with increased energy.

On July 29, 1866, he was once more appointed to England, and in a fortnight was on his journey. Arriving in Liverpool on the 11th of September following, he began the welcome and grateful labor of visiting the principal conferences of the European Mission; including the Scandinavian and other Continental conferences.

In July, 1867, he was again instated as President of the European Mission. Once more he gathered a staff of enthusiastic Elders to his support, and in the year following, in Great Britain alone, 3,457 souls were baptized, and in the same length of time, from the same country, there were emigrated to Utah more than three thousand two hundred Saints.

Always projecting his thoughts into the future to find means for advancing the work of God, he at this time decided that emigration by sailing vessels was inadequate for the needs of the renewed proselyting work in Europe. He, therefore, made the necessary changes—at that early day not inconsiderable—and two large companies of Saints were sent out from Liverpool by the steamships Minnesota and Colorado bound for New York. This change from sailing vessels to steamships has continued till the present time.

This was the last foreign mission of Apostle Richards, and his active work in the field had a fitting close. Eight times he had crossed the mighty deep and four eventful periods he had spent in the ministry abroad. His last effort had demonstrated that the soil of humanity in Europe would still produce rich fruits.

Although his ardor as a missionary had not waned, his value as a home counselor had increased, and with the opening of the following year a new epoch was commenced in his career. On Feb. 19, 1869, he was elected probate judge of Weber County, and from that event Ogden and Weber County may date no small share of the worthy progress which has made them respectively, in importance, the second city and county of Utah.

In May, 1869, Franklin D. Richards established his residence in Ogden. In all the intervening years he has been the presiding ecclesiastical authority of the Weber Stake of Zion. Many of his assistant laborers possessed a measure of his own paramount quality of generous loyalty to the cause, and these men came readily to his support in the revival work of the home ministry. When he reached Ogden to attend his first term of court, the town had no newspaper; before a year had passed, he established, and for a time edited, the Ogden Junction, over which he long exercised a guardian care and which practically exists to-day under the name of the Ogden Daily Herald. Schools had been all that the people felt they could support, but they were still not up to a high grade; he wrote, preached and labored personally, and with his accustomed success, to advance the educational interests of the people. The young people, in many cases, lacked cultured associations and ambition for education and refinement; he organized societies which were the heralds, if not the direct progenitors, of the later Mutual Improvement Associations which permeate the Territory; and he originated a plan by which the youth of Weber County might hear, without cost, lectures by the best scientists and most talented orators of Utah. With the advent of the railway came an influx of worldly persons and sentiment; he taught the Saints how to preserve from this rude aggression, their political and moral integrity, and he showed them by precept and example how to make home beautiful and home pleasures attractive for the youth.

He was probate and county judge of Weber County continuously from March 1, 1869, until Sept. 25, 1883. During this period of more than fourteen years, hundreds of suits for divorce and cases of estates for settlement were brought before him. In no single instance has his decision in these matters been reversed by a higher tribunal. He adjudicated all the land titles in the important city of Ogden and the populous towns of Huntsville, North Ogden and Plain City. No one of these adjudications has ever been set aside by any court. For the first five years following his induction into office, his court had original and appellate jurisdiction in all common law and chancery cases; before him were tried numerous civil suits, habeas corpus cases and trials of offenders charged with all crimes from misdemeanor to murder. Not one single judgment or decree rendered by him in all this lengthy general judicial service was reversed on appeal. His justice and humanity, united with keen legal sense, made his name proverbial.

In his administration of county financial affairs he was no less successful, aided by associates of shrewdness and integrity. During his regime the finest court house in Utah was erected in Ogden; roads and bridges innumerable were built; the only toll road in the county—extending through the magnificent Ogden Canyon, was purchased and made free; taxes were kept low, but were collected promptly; the county was maintained clear of debt. His position carried with it no salary.

Although Apostle Richards always had a mass of business at home, he found time to travel and observe throughout the Territory. He continued, as he had previously been, when in Utah, a member of the successive legislative assemblies and constitutional conventions—in which his scholarship, legal lore, and patriotism made him conspicuous. In 1877 he traveled with President Young to organize nearly all the Stakes of Zion; and attended the dedication of Temple sites and Temple buildings. After the death of President Young, and especially since his own retirement from political life, Franklin has been entirely immersed in the councils and labors of the Church. At the present trying time, his dictation and advice are in more than usual demand by the Saints. *

Towards the close of his official career Judge Richards became a party to one of the most important law suits, so far as the public is concerned, that was ever instituted in the Territory. In the summer of 1882 Congress passed what is known as the "Hoar Amendment" which authorized the governor of the Territory to fill vacancies caused by the failure to elect officers at the August election, 1882. Under claim of authority from this act Governor Murray appointed some scores of persons to fill offices throughout the Territory, and among them James N. Kimball was appointed to be probate judge of Weber County. After demanding the office from Franklin D. Richards, he commenced a mandamus suit to compel the relinquishment of the office and records to him. Franklin denied that there was any vacancy in the office because of the failure to hold the election and insisted that he had the right, under his commission, to hold the office "until his successor was elected and qualified." The District Court decided in favor of Mr. Kimball, but an appeal was taken to the Supreme Court of the Territory, where the decision of the lower court was affirmed. The case was then taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, where it rested until the term expired for which Mr. Kimball was appointed, and until Judge Richards' successor was elected and qualified. This was a test case, and if it had not been contested with the determination and skill which characterized the defense, the result would have been the displacement of all the officers of the Territory by the governor's appointees, and the "Liberal Party" would have gained the political control of the Territory. This determined legal contest was a fitting close to the successful official career of Judge Richards and saved the Territory from political bondage.

GEORGE QUAYLE CANNON,

Was born on Thursday, Jan. 11, 1827, in Liverpool, Lancashire, England. His parents, George Cannon and Ann Quayle, were natives of Peel, on the Isle of Man.

The Cannon or Cannan family came originally from the borders of England and Scotland. The earliest mention of the name in the parish record of Kirk Michael, on the Isle of Man, is the burial in 1598, of one Marian Cannan. The name is spelled on the records both Cannan and Cannon, though Cannan appears to be the earlier and more common style.

The family removed from Scotland to the Isle of Man on acconnt of political or religious troubles, in which they became involved, and they had to flee there for refuge. Several of the Cannons were engaged in the wars of that period. The name of the place which has been owned by the family on the Isle of Man for nearly three hundred years, and which is still in the possession of an older branch (the present owner being a cousin of George Q.'s grandfather), is Cooilshallagh. Train, in his History of the Isle of Man, Vol. 1, page 85, note 2, alluding to this homestead, says: "Cooil, in the Manx language, signifies a 'hiding-place'" He then mentions Cooilshallagh in Kirk Michael. Whether this place received its name from the Cannons because of it having proved a "hiding-place" or place of refuge for the family, does not appear, though it is not improbable.

George Quayle Cannon was the eldest of his parents' children. The other children were: Mary Alice Cannon, now the wife of Brother Charles Lambert, of Salt Lake City; Anne Cannon, married to Brother Orin N. Woodbury, of St. George; Angus M. Cannon; David H. Cannon; Leonora Cannon, the wife of Brother Robert Gardner, of St. George; and Elizabeth Cannon (the daughter of his father by a second marriage), the wife of Brother William Piggott of Bloomington. These are all alive and in full fellowship to-day in the Church.

Miss Leonora Cannon, his father's sister, had a very intimate friend who married a gentleman by the name of Bacon, a colonel in the British army, who had received the appointment of Secretary to the governor of Canada. This friend exacted a promise from her that when she married and went to Canada, she (Miss Cannon) should accompany her on her wedding tour to that country. She kept the promise and sailed with her friend; and while in Canada, she being a devout Methodist and greatly attached to her religion, made the acquaintance of President John Taylor, who was at that time a local preacher in the Methodist Church. This was in the city of Toronto. She had fully expected, when she left her home, to return there; but in consequence of a dream which she had, she felt convinced that it was her duty to accept the offer of marriage, which she had received from President John Taylor, and remain in Canada.

Some time after their marriage, Elder Parley P. Pratt visited Toronto, having been drawn there by the prayers of a number of persons who were diligently seeking for the truth, among whom President Taylor was very prominent. They felt that Methodism was not strictly in accordance with the Scriptures, and that there were many blessings and gifts which God had given to His church in ancient days, of which their church was destitute. They met together often, examined the Scriptures with great earnestness and care, and prayed fervently for additional light, and that, if there was a church on the earth which possessed these heavenly powers and gifts, they might be made acquainted with it. Elder Pratt's arrival in the city of Toronto in the summer of 1836 created some excitement. A few of this band of seekers after truth received his testimony and were baptized into the Church; among them President John Taylor and his wife.

The history of the events connected with President Taylor's espousal of the truth are related in his own biography. Suffice it to say, that after his wife received the Gospel, she was convinced in her own mind that her brother George would receive it also; for when she had, previous to her departure for Canada, reasoned with him and urged him to espouse religion, that his soul might be saved, he had, on one occasion, remarked to her that her religion could not satisfy him; that it was not according to the Bible, which he could prove to her. "But," continued he, "of what use is it for me to unsettle you in your faith; it gives you joy and satisfaction, and I cannot offer you anything better; but it would not satisfy me."

From this and other conversations which they had had, she was convinced that he was only waiting for the true Gospel to be preached to receive it gladly. When her husband, therefore, with the other brethren of the Twelve Apostles, took their mission to England in 1840, he repaired, upon his landing at Liverpool, to the house of his brother-in-law, George Cannon. The latter was not at home at the time, and after conversing with his wife, he (Pres. Taylor) returned to the vessel. After he went out of the house, George Q.'s mother remarked to him, he being then a child of twelve years of age, "Your uncle is a man of God." As soon as he preached the Gospel, therefore, to the family she was ready to be baptized, knowing for herself, as she said, that the principles which he taught were the true Gospel of the Son of God. Her husband, George Cannon, the father of George Q., read the Book of Mormon through carefully twice before his baptism, and on laying it down after finishing it the second time, he remarked, "No wicked man could write such a book as this; and no good man would write it, unless it were true and he were commanded of God to do so." They joined the Church, and three of their children who were old enough to enter the Church, were baptized some months afterwards (June 18, 1840.)

Upon hearing the doctrines of the Church taught by his uncle and his fellow-laborer, Elder Joseph Fielding, George Q., though so young, drank them in eagerly. He believed every word they said, and his joy was unbounded; for he had been a close reader of the Bible, and had asked his father why it was that the ancient gifts and blessings of the Gospel were not manifested in these days as they were anciently. More than once he had wept because it had not been his privilege to live in the days of the Savior and His Apostles and witness the mighty works which they performed. His gratitude to the Lord, therefore, was great when he learned that once more, and in his own days, the Gospel had been restored to the earth in the plenitude of its power, and that the everlasting Priesthood had been again given to man to administer its ordinances.

Long before his marriage, the father of the family had a dream concerning the death of his wife, and when emigration was talked about, they both seemed to be aware that she would not live to reach Zion. Her relatives remonstrated with her for going with the Saints, but in reply she said to them, that though she knew she never would live to reach the body of the Church, she was determined to undertake the journey for the sake of her children, and she never shrank at the prospect before her. The manifestation that they had received proved to be true. They started for Zion, sailing from Liverpool in the ship Sidney, Sept. 17, 1842, but she died and was buried in the ocean.

The family continnued their journey until they reached Nauvoo. The day after their arrival there was a large gathering of people at the steamboat landing to meet a company of Saints who had arrived from St. Louis. Among them were the Prophet Joseph, his brother Hyrum, the Patriarch, and a number of other leading men who had gone there to welcome the people. Though no one had pointed the Prophet out to George Q., and he had never seen a portrait of him, he knew him instantly. It seemed to him as if he had always been acquainted with him, and that he would have known him to be the Prophet Joseph anywhere in the world. On August 19, 1844, George Q. and his brothers and sisters were bereft of their father, who died at St. Louis while there on a short visit from Nauvoo.

At that time President Taylor was editor and publisher of the Times and Seasons and the Nauvoo Neighbor. George Q. Cannon learned the printing business in his office, having gone to live with him shortly after the arrival of the family at Nauvoo. From that time until October, 1849, he was a member of the household of President Taylor. He was ordained an Elder, under the hands of President Taylor, Feb. 9, 1845, and on the same day was ordained a Seventy and became a member of the 19th Quorum of Seventies. He acted in the capacity of clerk to that quorum for several years.

In 1846 he traveled with the main body of the Saints from Nauvoo to Winter Quarters, and from Winter Quarters to Great Salt Lake Valley in the summer of 1847, arriving in the valley on the 3rd of October of that year.

During the two following years he was occupied in all the labors incident to the founding of Great Salt Lake City, and in the fall of 1849, with a number of other brethren, was called to go to California, under the direction of Brother Charles C. Rich. After a hazardous journey, during which they attempted to reach California by way of a "cut off" that added greatly to the dangers and duration of the trip, the company reached Lower California in a starving condition. During the remainder of 1849 and the greater part of 1850 he was in various parts of California, which had not then become a State. In the latter part of the summer of 1850 he was called, in company with nine others, to go on a mission to the Sandwich Islands. Elder Hiram Clark was appointed to preside. Apostle Charles C. Rich, before leaving for home, set them all apart, and they landed on the Sandwich Islands, Dec. 12, 1850. Though they were sent to preach to the whites, the Elders soon saw that but little could be done among this class on the Islands. The majority of the Elders were in favor of returning without attempting to teach the natives; but Brother George Q., seeing himself surrounded by a whole nation which was ignorant of the principles of the Gospel and who ought to be taught the message of salvation which God had empowered them to carry, was so powerfully impressed with the feeling that he ought to stay and warn the nation, that he declared that if all should leave, he would, though the youngest of the party, remain and learn the language and do his duty as an Elder to that people, even if he did not baptize a soul. Consequently he, together with Elders Henry W. Bigler, James Keeler, William Farrer and James Hawkins, remained, acquired the language, and were the means in the hands of God of bringing large numbers to the knowledge of the truth. The subject of our sketch acquired the language with great ease, and was soon able to preach and baptize, and organize branches. He also translated the Book of Mormon into the Hawaiian language; and when he and his fellow-laborers with whom he had gone, left the Islands, there were upward of four thousand members in the Church. They sailed from the Islands for San Francisco July 29, 1854.

Elder Cannon remained in San Francisco about six weeks helping Brother Parley P. Pratt on his biography, and then repaired to San Bernardino, and from there traveled, in company with Elder Charles C. Rich, to Great Salt Lake City, where he arrived November 28, 1854.

Before returning from the Islands, he was chosen to be one of the Presidents of the 30th Quorum of Seventies, and upon his arrival at Great Salt Lake City was ordained to that position.

He was soon afterwards notified to prepare for another mission to the Islands, as the Elders there desired him to return and take charge of the press which he and they had purchased, and which had arrived after his departure. Subsequently, however, the press and printing materials, with the stock of paper sent with it, were forwarded to Elder Parley P. Pratt, at San Francisco, and he wrote to the First Presidency desiring the return of Elder Cannon to California to assist him in the publication of a paper; the prospectus of which he had issued.

On May 10, 1855, Elder Geo. Q. Cannon left Great Salt Lake City, accompanied by his wife and two missionaries—Elders Jos. Bull and Matthew F. Wilkie—having been appointed to publish the Book of Mormon in the Hawaiian language and to assist Elder Parley P. Pratt in the publication of a paper. Elder Orson Hyde, who was appointed at the same time to establish a settlement at Carson Valley and to labor in California, had also been instructed to assist in this work.

Upon Brother Cannon's arrival at San Francisco, he found that Elder Parley P. Pratt had started on his return home. He followed him to the place appointed for the camp to start from, and had an interview with him, and was by him set apart to preside over the mission in California and Oregon. The difficulties which he had to contend with in establishing an office in San Francisco, in printing the Book of Mormon, and afterwards in the publication of the Western Standard, form a very interesting chapter of history.

It required great energy and the exercise of much faith and perseverance to accomplish the work entrusted to them; but the mission was a successful one. The translation of the Book of Mormon into the Hawaiian language had demanded much care. Elder Cannon could get no aid from white men in this labor; but he had the assistance of several of the natives, who were pretty well educated in their own language. He read his translation to them as it progressed, and conversed with them upon the principles to see if they obtained the same idea from the translation that the English edition gave to its readers. In this way he went through the whole book very carefully while the work of translation was going on. After the work was completed, he went through it again with a number of the best educated and most intelligent natives he could meet, all of whom were members of the Church. He afterwards examined the translation carefully with the aid of Brother William Farrer and a native who belonged to the Church, who was credited with being the best master of the Hawaiian language in the kingdom. In printing the book, he had no one to help him read the proofs, as Brothers Joseph Bull and M. F. Wilkie, who set the type, could not understand the language, though they acquired remarkable facility before the work was finished in reading the manuscript and setting the type. His method of reading the proofs was to have his wife read from the English Book of Mormon, while he read the proofs in Hawaiian, and, from his familiarity with the language, he was able to correct the proofs. The entire translation thus underwent three revisions, in addition to the first reading and examination. The book was printed and bound and sent to the Islands; the Western Standard was published, and did creditable work in defending and advocating the principles of the Gospel.

When the news of the march of Buchanan's army and the attitude assumed by Gov. Brigham Young and the Saints in regard thereto reached California, it created great excitement; and as it was thought that perhaps evil would befall the army, it was strongly advocated in one or two of the leading journals that George Q. Cannon should be seized and held as a hostage for the safety of the officers of the army. All this talk, however, was confined to the newspapers. Before matters had progressed that far, he thought it wise under the circumstances to send his wife and child home with those who were leaving for Utah and in charge of his brother David, who had joined him on a mission in California. He remained to attend to affairs there until Elders Orson Pratt, Ezra T. Benson, John A. Ray, John M. Kay, William Miller and John Scott came to San Francisco from England, on their way to the valley. Under the counsel of the two Apostles he wound up his business and arranged the affairs of the mission to the best possible advantage, and left with them for Great Salt Lake City, by way of San Bernardino. He reached the city Jan. 19, 1858.

On the night of his arrival home he was appointed adjutant in the standing army that was being organized for defence, and from that time until the move southward was decided upon the ensuing spring, he was busily engaged in organizing and arranging for service. After the decision was reached that Great Salt Lake City and the settlements north should be abandoned with the view to their being burned, President Young appointed Brother George Q. Cannon to take the Deseret News press and a portion of its material, with a few printers and move to Fillmore, where the President wished that paper to be issued in reduced size. He reached Fillmore in April, and from that time until the succeeding September published the paper there.

On his return from Fillmore with his family, he was met at Payson, Utah Co., on Monday, Sept. , 1858, by a messenger from Pres. Young, who bore a note to him, in which it was stated that he had been appointed a mission to the Eastern States, and that a company of brethren were waiting for him who expected to start the next day. As the note was dated on Sunday, and the next day was the day that he received the message, he saw that there was no time to be lost. He had just stopped for dinner at the house of Brother Wm. B. Preston, who was then residing in Payson. In three quarters of an hour after receiving the message he was ready for his mission, and left his family on the road side, in the care of his brother David, who was but a youth, and to the tender mercies of his Heavenly Father. He had no home in Great Salt Lake City or anywhere else, but he felt that the same kind Providence which had blessed him thus far in his life, would still care for his loved ones, if he manifested willingness to do his duty. Probably this was as short a notice as any Elder in the Church ever received for a mission of such duration. He reached Salt Great Lake City the next morning before daylight, and after receiving his instructions, started the same day for the States, and was gone only a few days short of two years.

This mission was of a semi-political character. At the time that Buchanan's army had been sent to Utah the whole country had been flooded with misrepresentations and falsehoods concerning Utah and its condition. These falsehoods had furnished the administration with a basis for its action in sending the army. It had been charged that the court records and the territorial library had been destroyed, that the lives of the federal judges had been threatened and endangered, and that Utah was in a state of rebellion. The whole affair had been ingeniously and artfully worked up by persons who were interested in creating hostility between the general government and the people of Utah. Besides the politicians, the contractors were deeply interested in the scheme, and it became literally a contractors' war; for the government made the most extravagant contracts for transportation, etc., with various parties who in many instances had contributed to create the prejudice against the people of Utah, and who were in this way profiting by their villainous schemes. When the peace commissioners, sent by President Buchanan, came to Utah, they found how baseless the stories were which had obtained currency in the country. Governor Cumming had already informed the goverment that the court records and territorial library were intact, and that he had found upon his arrival here that the government had been grossly deceived. These representations had been made and authenticated, but scarcely a word had been permitted to leak out to give the public a true knowledge of the situation. The feeling in the United States was very general that Utah had actually been in rebellion, and that the "Mormons" merited severe punishment.

It was to help correct these falsehoods that Brother George Q. was sent to the States. By means of influential friends, especially the late General Thomas L. Kane, he secured excellent letters of introduction to leading editors and to prominent senators and members of Congress, and labored assiduously to bring a true knowledge of the condition of affairs to public men generally. By this means much ignorance which existed concerning Utah and her people was removed, and many falsehoods were corrected.

Besides attending to this business, he had been appointed to take charge of the branches of the Church in the East, and in 1859 and 1860 he acted as agent of the emigration at New York. He also purchased oxen, wagons and provisions for the people at the frontiers and organized them into companies to cross the plains. In this labor at Florence the first year (1859) he worked with the late Elder Joseph W. Young, being assisted also by the experienced supervision of President Horace S. Eldredge.

While on that mission he received notification from the First Presidency and the Twelve Apostles that he had been chosen to fill the place made vacant in the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles by the death of Elder Parley P. Pratt. He was selected to this office Oct. 23, 1859, and his ordination took place, after his return from his mission, Aug. 26, 1860.

Six weeks after his return he started on another mission, being appointed together with Elders Chas. C. Rich and Amasa M. Lyman (who had preceeded him to Liverpool) to preside over the European Mission. The duties assigned him by the First Presidency were to take charge of the Millennial Star and the publishing business connected therewith, and also of the business of the emigration. He reached Liverpool on the night of Dec. 21, 1860. Soon after his arrival he established a Church printing office, the printing for the Church up to that time having been done by contract with other offices.

These three Apostles presided over the European Mission until May 14, 1862, when Elders Amasa M. Lyman and Charles C. Rich returned home, and Elder George Q. Cannon repaired to Washington, D. C., to which place he had been called by a dispatch from home which informed him that he and Hon. W. H. Hooper had been elected United States Senators, and that he was to join Brother Hooper at Washington and endeavor to get the Territory admitted into the Union as a State. They labored faithfully in this direction until the adjournment of Congress; after which Brother George Q. returned again to England, reaching there July 26, 1862; and from that time until his return home in 1864, he presided over the European Mission, visiting twice the branches of the Church in Scandinavia, Germany, Holland, Switzerland and France. During the four years he was on this mission and in charge of the emigration business, there were upwards of thirteen thousand Saints shipped from Liverpool for Zion, and it was a cause of pleasure to all engaged in the work at that time to know that more souls had joined the Church during the same period than had emigrated.

In company with Elder John W.

Young he sailed from Liverpool Aug. 27, 1864, but they were detained in New York and at Atchison by an Indian war, in which the settlements on the frontiers and many of the stage stations were destroyed. They went through by the first stage after the interruption and incurred considerable risk in making the journey; but they were anxious to reach home by conference, which pleasure, however, was denied them, as it was on the 12th of October, 1864, that they arrived in Great Salt Lake City.

His return from this mission was almost fifteen years to a day from the time of his departure in 1849 on his first mission. During these fifteen years he had been constantly away from Great Salt Lake City on missions with the exception of about nine months.

Upon his arrival home at this time President Brigham Young desired him to be his private secretary. He acted in this capacity for the three succeeding years.

The comparatively barren results of the labors of the Elders abroad in the missionary field had drawn his attention to the vast field of usefulness open and only imperfectly occupied at home. Thousands of children were growing up, whose opportunities for becoming acquainted with the doctrines and history of the Church were too meagre. During the winter after his return from Europe (1864–65) he organized and taught a Sunday School in the 14th Ward of Great Salt Lake City. In Jan., 1866, he commenced the publication of the Juvenile Instructor, designed expressly for the education and elevation of the young. This periodical has now entered upon the twenty-second year of its publication, and has been of great value in giving to the children and youth of Zion a knowledge of the principles of the Gospel and of the historical events connected with the establishment of this great latter-day dispensation. From the organization of the Sunday School Union up to the present he has held the position of Superintendent of Sunday Schools.

In the fall of 1867, by the appointment of President B. Young, he took charge of the Deseret News and issued a daily edition, this being the commencement of the Deseret Evening News. For a number of years he continued to occupy the position of editor and publisher of the Deseret News, traveling, as circumstances would permit, with the First Presidency and the Twelve, during the summer months through the various settlements and holding meetings with them, as was the custom in those days, every year.

During the fall of 1871 a great many articles appeared in various papers on the subject of admitting Utah into the Union as a State, on the condition that the Latter-day Saints relinquish their practice of plural marriage. So much was said in favor of, and so little said in opposition to, this method of dealing with the question, that Presidents Brigham Young and Geo. A. Smith, who were then at St. George, felt that there was danger of the Latter-day Saints being put in a false position, and they telegraphed Brother George Q. Cannon to proceed at once to Washington, D. C., and define the true position of the Saints on this important point. He remained in Washington until Congress adjourned for the holidays, when he returned to Utah.

A constitutional convention met early in the following February (1872), and he was elected a member and helped to frame the constitution which was then adopted. Together with Hon. Thomas Fitch and Hon. Frank Fuller, he was chosen a delegate to present the constitution to Congress and work for Utah's admission as a State. With them he proceeded to Washington, and remained there with Delegate Hooper, until the adjournment of that session.

Upon Brother Hooper declining to be again nominated for delegate, George Q. Cannon was nominated and elected in August, 1872. He spent the next winter with Delegate Hooper, at Washington. At four successive elections he carried the Territory as delegate to Congress by a very heavy majority in his favor. Neither the history of the part he took in Congress during his terms of office, and the success of his efforts and labors in that capacity, nor the history of the conspiracy, which was entered into to prevent him, at his last election, from taking his seat because of his domestic relations, can be given in this sketch. These proceedings form an important chapter in the history of the Latter-day Saints, and, when compiled, will prove interesting reading.

To the chagrin of a great many enemies, and to the surprise of many of the Latter-day Saints, he obtained his seat when first elected, though a most determined effort was made to prevent this. It was only by Governor Murray breaking his official oath, and being guilty of an infamous abuse of the authority of his position, that he was refused his certificate of election in 1881. Though George Q. Cannon had been elected by a vote of 18,568—a majority of 17,211 votes over his competitor—this man Murray, determined to bring matters to an issue by refusing to give him the certificate of election, but which he gave to his opponent, who had only received 1,357 out of 19,925 votes. But the instrument whom these conspirators used—for Murray was not alone in this conspiracy against the rights of the people—did not have the satisfaction of getting his seat. Congress was not prepared to readily join in a scheme of villainy of this transparent character, though there were many public men who hated the "Mormons" sufficiently to take advantage of the opportunity which Murray's perfidy offered to them.

It was not, however, until the Edmunds bill had passed and become law—March 22, 1882—that Congress took action on the case. It is probable that a majority of the House could not have been secured in favor of denying George Q. Cannon his seat had not the Edmunds bill been passed; and this was rushed through with unceremonious and indecent haste, and by wilfully and flagrantly trampling upon the rules of the House, in order to furnish members who had scruples respecting this transaction with a justifiable basis of action in voting against the measure. On April 19, 1882, the case came before the House and was decided against the duly elected delegate taking his seat, by a vote of 123 against 79. Before, however, taking his departure from the place where he had labored for so many years, he had the opportunity of delivering a speech in vindication of his own case and that of the people, whom he represented. The position he was in on this occation was somewhat trying. As the vote had not been taken upon his case, numerous friends, who intended to vote for him, begged him not to say anything, as they were afraid that in the discussion of this phase of religion—plural marriage—something might be said by him that would place them in an awkward position before the country and with their constituents. They thought that silence on his part would be the better course and would leave his friends in a better position. He felt, however, that he owed a duty to his people, and that he could not consistently with that duty hold his tongue, when an opportunity of this character was offered—the only opportunity which he would have. The delicacy of the position can easily be understood: he had to do his duty to his constitnents, and at the same time not compromise his political friends. He succeeded in satisfying both his friends at home and in Washington.

President Brigham Young died Aug. 29, 1877. He had made his will in 1873, and had sent his son Brigham and Elder George Q. Cannon east to get a form of will that would be suitable to his circumstances and family relations. This will was adopted by him, and under his direction, Brother George Q. Cannon prepared it and was made the principal executor, Brigham Young, jun., and Albert Carrington being the co-executors. The settlement of this estate during 1878 and 1879 engrossed nearly his entire time when he was not in Washington.

In 1879 a suit was commenced by some few dissatisfied heirs against the Church and against the executors. The executors were under $300,000 bonds, but Judge Boreman was determined to place them under additional bonds and so decided. This they refused to comply with, thinking the bonds they had already given sufficient for all purposes, and they were adjudged by him guilty of contempt and ordered to the penitentiary. They accepted the alternative and went to the penitentiary, Aug. 4, 1879, and remained there upwards of three weeks, when they were released by action of Chief Justice Hunter, who had been recently appointed chief justice of the Territory. Shortly afterwards the suit was settled, and the settlement of the estate was proceeded with. Probably no estate in America had ever presented so many difficulties in the settlement as this had, because of the various interests involved and the number of heirs to be settled with.

In October, 1880, it was decided by the council of the Apostles, after due deliberation, to reorganize the First Presidency. President John Taylor was elected President of the Church, with George Q. Cannon as his first, and Joseph F. Smith as his second Counselor. From that time until the present, George Q. Cannon has continued to act in that capacity.

Pres. Canuon has also served in the Utah Legislature and acted as Chancellor of the University of Deseret.

JOSEPH FIELDING SMITH,

A son of Hyrum Smith and Mary Fielding, was born Nov. 13, 1838, in Far West, Caldwell County, Missouri. He was driven out of Nauvoo with his widowed mother and her family, in the summer of 1846, and drove an ox team most of the way from the Mississippi to the Missouri River, reaching Winter Quarters towards the autumn of that year.

"During the family sojourn at this place, Joseph F. was occupied as a 'herd boy,' having charge of the stock belonging to his mother and his uncle Joseph Fielding. He came to Utah in 1848, arriving in Great Salt Lake Valley Sept. 22nd. He drove an ox team across the plains, yoking, unyoking and hitching up his own team, and did a man's duty in the camp, except standing night-guard, although he was only about nine years of age. He writes:

"My principal occupation from 1848 to 1854 was that of a herd-boy, although I made 'a hand' always in the harvest-field and at threshings, and in the canyons cutting and hauling wood. Though I had the principal care of the family stock, as herd-boy, from 1846 to 1854, I cannot recall the loss of a single 'hoof' by death, straying away or otherwise, from neglect or carelessness on my part during that period. Wolves were very numerous, and of the large kind, during much of this time, and occasionally they would attack our sheep in the corral at night; more than once they captured one or two; a fine colt was killed by them one night almost within a stone's-throw from our home near Canyon Creek (the old Sugar House Ward), and another, the same night, severely bitten and wounded. These were the full extent of our losses of stock, within my remembrance, except death by old age and starvation, during the winter at Winter Quarters and on the plains.

"My mother died Sept. 21, 1852, aged 51 years and 2 months, and in April, 1854, I was called to take a mission to the Sandwich Islands. I received my endowments in the old Council House, and was set apart at the same place under the hands of Parley P. Pratt and Orson Hyde, Parley being mouth. He declared that I should obtain a knowledge of the Hawaiian language 'by the gift of God, as well as by study.' Up to this time my schooling had been extremely limited. My mother taught me to read and write, by the camp fires, and subsequently by the greater luxury of the primeval tallow-candle in the covered wagon and the old log cabin, 10 × 12 feet in size, where first the soles of our feet found rest, after the weary months of travel across the plains. When I say, therefore, that within four months after my arrival on the Sandwich Islands—two weeks of which time, were consumed by the most severe sickness I had ever known—I was prepared to enter upon the duties of my ministry, and did so with a native companion, with whom I made a tour of the Island of Maui, visiting, holding meetings, preaching, baptizing, confirming, blessing children, administering the sacrament, etc , etc., all in the Hawaiian language, it may be inferred that Parley's promise upon my head was literally fulfilled.

"I left my mountain home on this mission May 27, 1854, in company with a number of other missionaries destined for the Islands, I being the youngest of the company, only 15 years of age. We journeyed through the southern settlements of Utah, in company with Prests. Brigham Young, Heber C. Kimball, Daniel H. Wells and a large party who were on a tour of the South, to Harmony, then the most southern settlement in Utah. At Cedar City, our little band of missionaries, with Apostle Parley P. Pratt at our head, separated from the Presidency and party, and commenced our journey in earnest across the southern deserts to California. Our journey in the main was a very prosperous one. We found the Pah-utes, a very low and degraded tribe of Indians, quite numerous along the Santa Clara and Rio Virgin, and as far south as the Mountain Springs. They would follow us for days together, and gather around our camp at night in considerable numbers, all hungry and some almost famishing for food. We had no alternative but to share our provisions with them, which we did with as much economy as possible, in order to keep them friendly towards us, until we passed beyond the limits of their country. The result was that during the last few days of our journey we were compelled to subsist upon very short rations, consuming the last crumb of our supplies on the morning of the day that we reached the Cajon Pass, and thence to San Bernardino. Here we met with warm friends who made us welcome to the best they had. We made a halt at this place for several weeks; Apostle Pratt proceeded forward by steamer to San Francisco.

"During the sojourn of the company at San Bernardino I found employment in the mountains in the service of a member of the Church, in the manufacture of cut shingles, first steaming the wood.

"At San Bernardino we met a company of Australian Saints, immigrating to Utah under the guidance of Elder William Hyde, to whom we disposed of most of our animals and out-fits for money. This, together with what we had earned, paid our expenses to the Islands.

"Sometime in July a number of friends provided us with teams to convey us to San Pedro, about ninety miles distant, via El Monte and Los Angeles.

"At San Pedro we took steamer to San Francisco, making the passage in three days. Here we met Apostle Parley P. Pratt, who had, in connection with Nathan Tanner and others, arranged for the purchase of the Brig Roslin, with the view of plying her in some kind of trade between the coast and the Islands. Our company of missionaries were detailed to commence work on the vessel, to put her in repair and fit her up for sea, it being designed that we should play the roll of seamen on our voyage to our field of labor. A requisition was made upon the Elders for what money they possessed, which was freely turned over to Brother Parley, towards making payment on the purchase of the vessel. A number of the brethren continued to labor upon the old Brig Roslin, while a few sought employment in the harvest-field across the bay, and otherwise, until the project of entering into the Marine commercial business with the old Roslin was abandoned, our money returned to us, and passage for the greater number of our party secured on board the clipper Vaquero for Honolulu. Special arrangements had been made, the cabin being full, and there being no steerage accommodations, for us to occupy a portion of the forecastle, in connection with the sailors —a somewhat rough, profane and reckless crew—but not more so than the commander of the vessel. It was anything but an agreeable or aspiring position for us to occupy.

"On our embarkation, bets were freely made between the captain and others, respecting the time that would be required for the voyage, the captain being sanguine that he would make it in about eight days. But in this he was sadly disappointed and greatly enraged. No sooner had we passed beyond the Golden Gate, than we were becalmed, and there we lay tossing upon the dead swells in full sight of the Gate, scarcely moving for two days. Sail after sail was spread to the baffling breeze, until every piece of canvass possible was hoisted, but to little purpose, until at length a breeze sprang up and continued to grow stronger and stronger until the mates suggested the propriety of reducing sail; but the captain, with fearful oaths, swore that not a rag should be taken in until it blew down, and he was about as good as his oath, for, not long after, a spar, which stayed a large square sail, stretched across the forecastle, broke under the heavy pressure of the wind, and the sail had to be hauled in. In this manner sail after sail gave way, and was then gathered in, until only the main sails of the vessel remained, and with these we seemed almost to fly through the mighty deep, like a bird. The Vaquero was a rakish, suspicious looking craft, and it was more than once hinted by the sailors that she was not built for lawful purposes. Suffice it to say, the captain had several sums of money at stake in bets that he would reach Honolulu in eight days, and win he would, if canvass and favoring gales would lend their auspicious aid. But calm succeeded calm, and so we loitered on our course, at length casting anchor in the harbor of Honolulu, on Sept. 27, 1854. As nearly as I remember, we were about twenty-seven days making the voyage, our captain being then a somewhat wiser, if not a better man. We rejoiced to see and set our feet once more on land and gladly bade adieu to the Vaquero and her forecastle, with all their charms never to behold them, or their like, again.

"The names of the Elders who crossed in the Vaquero, are as follows: Silas Smith, Silas S. Smith, Simpson M. Molen, Jos. F. Smith, Geo. Spiers, Ward E. Pack, William W. Cluff, Eli Bell, John R. Young and Sextus E. Johnson.

"Nine others of the company arrived at various times subsequently. Their names are as follows: Henry P. Richards, Washington B. Rogers, John T. Caine, Orson K. Whitney, John A. West, Jas. A. Peck, Edward Partridge, Smith B. Thurston and Wm. King.

"We remained a few days in Honolulu and were in the meantime being set apart for our several fields of labor. My lot fell to the island of Maui, in company with my cousin Silas Smith, and Elders S. B. Thurston and Wm. B. Rogers. On my way to Maui, on board a small schooner, I was attacked with a severe fever, which clung to me for over two weeks, during which time I was attended by Sister Mary J. Hammond with all the kindness a mother could show to her son, for which, and for many subsequent acts of kindness, she ever held a warm, rateful place in my memory. She was a noble, good woman, and the only Utah woman then upon the Islands. She accompanied her husband, Elder F. A. Hammond, to the Islands in 1851, and he was at the time of our arrival presiding over the Maui Conference.

"As soon as I recovered from my sickness, I was assigned to Kula, (the place where Brother Geo. Q. Cannon first opened the door of the Gospel to this poor Hawaiian race), to study the language, a portion of my time being spent at Wailuku. Some two weeks or more having been lost to study, through my sickness, I found myself a little behind some of my companions in that direction. But remembering Apostle Pratt's promise to me, I set to work with all my might, prayerfully seeking the fulfillment of his words. For a little over two months I applied myself to the study of the language, during which time I became quite fluent in ordinary conversation. Elder Redick N. Allred then made me a visit. He seemed a little surprised at the readiness with which I spoke 'native,' and enquired if I had done any preaching as yet. Of course I answered no. He replied that there was nothing in the way of my doing so, so far as the language was concerned, for he thought I could speak it about as well as he could. The result was that at our next meeting, he being in charge, I was called upon to give out the hymn, then to pray, and then, before the close of the meeting, to speak, all of which I did to the best of my knowledge, and I felt, and so did he, that the 'ice' was now broken. Either that or the following day I accompanied Brother Allred to another branch, Honuaula, where I took my part with him in administering the sacrament, blessing some children and baptizing and confirming, all of which I did in the Hawaiian language, and with far greater ease than I could have done the same thing in my native tongue. I recollect distinctly, as I recorded it in my journal at the time, that this occurrence took place on the one hundredth day after my arrival on the Islands.

"On Elder Allred's return to Lahaina, he informed Pres. Hammond of my success in the language, and a few days later I received instructions to take with me a native Elder and make a tour to East Maui, to visit the branches and engage in missionary labors. Without delay, with one horse between us, Elder Pake, (one of the first converts to the Gospel, under the hands of Pres. Geo. Q. Cannon) and I started out on our missionary tour. The distance around the east end of Maui is about one hundred and twenty miles. We made a successful tour, visited all the branches, held meetings and were warmly received and kindly treated by all.

"After this trip around eastern Maui I visited all the other branches on the island, making several circuits of both eastern and western Maui. I spent a little over eighteen months upon this island, laboring constantly in the ministry, the latter portion of the time, after the departure of Pres. Hammond for his home in Utah, as President of the Maui Conference. Subsequently I labored six months as President of the KohalaConference,and six months as President of the Hilo Conference on the Island of Hawaii.

"I was laboring upon this island at the time of the great volcanic eruption in August, 1855. I experienced the tremendous shocks of earthquake which immediately preceded the eruption, and subsequently visited the great lava-flow, which issued from the crater. It was said that this eruption, in the quantity of lava thrown out, has probably never been surpassed during the residence of foreigners on the Islands. The flow continued for about thirteen months, reaching to within six or seven miles of the city of Hilo, more than sixty miles from the crater; the city and bay of Hilo were in imminent danger of destruction for months. I have seen it stated since, that the area covered by lava from this eruption exceeded three hundred square miles, or about one thirteenth of the area of the Island of Hawaii.

"After spending a year upon the Island of Hawaii, I was transferred to the Presidency of the Molokai Conference, with Elder Thos. A. Dowell as an assistant. On this island we found many of the Saints on the back-ground and most of the people afflicted with a scarcity of food. In making a journey from the east to the west end of the island, Brother Dowell and I were compelled to journey nearly thirty miles on foot in the hot sun, without either food or water to drink the whole distance, until Brother Dowell flagged and finally declared his inability to go further; but I stood by him, urged and helped him along until we reached the home of Mr. R. W. Meyers, a German, who kindly received us and administered to our necessities, and with whom, by his request, we spent several days. Mr. Meyers, from this time forward, became our warm and faithful friend, and ever made us welcome at his home. He furnished me a good riding horse to visit the branches of the Church, from time to time,which was a great relief. Brother Dowell could not talk the language, and consequently the labors of the ministry wholly devolved upon me.

"From Mr. Meyers' we visited a small branch of the Church at a place called Kalaupapa, to which there was no access except by sea, and by a narrow, zigzag path down an almost perpendicular pali or precipice,about eighteen hundred feet. At this place we met a cold reception. Not that the few Saints of the place appeared displeased to see us, but the whole place was in the height of a wi, or famine. For four days Bro. Dowell and I visited among this people, holding several meetings, but had nothing to eat,save a few wild herbs that we gathered from the mountain side, and some opihis, which we found on the sea-shore during low tide. The people themselves spending most of their time stretched out on their mats, 'waiting for their potatoes and squashes to grow.'

"At the end of four days we concluded to return to Mr. Meyers', and as we were passing a grass hut, near the outskirts of the town, the thatch of which had been considerably abraded by the hogs, we saw through the openings a family surrounding a calabash of poi. We at once turned aside and called in, but we found only some poi and salt, upon which we regaled with the gusto of an apetite four days old. We then bade adieu to Kalaupapa, climbed the great pali and again found welcome shelter and food at the hospitable home of Mr. Meyers. He kept a large number of cows and made butter. We went to work and built him a milk-house, and as I was accustomed to milking cows, I made a hand at that business whenever stopping with him.

"He placed in my hands a good shot-gun and plenty of ammunition, and gave me the liberty to furnish a turkey or two for the table each day, which I succeeded in doing with very little trouble, from the numerous wild flocks which infested his ranch.

"During my sojourn upon this island I had a very trying and prolonged spell of sickness, in consequence of which I returned to Lanai, which for some time had been the headquarters of the mission. It was at this place (Palawai, Lanai) that our conference-house was burned down, consuming my trunk and its contents, with those of several others of the Elders, leaving us almost destitute of clothing. Here I remained until the fall of 1857. Having in the meantime regained my health, I sailed for Honolulu to meet with the Elders of the mission in conference.

"About this time instructions came from the First Presidency to release the foreign Elders to return home to Utah, in consequenee of the movement of the U. S. army towards the Territory. Accordingly, on the 6th of October, 1857, I embarked on board the bark Yankee for San Francisco, in company with the following named Elders: Silas Smith, Ward E. Pack, Sextus E. Johnson, Edward Partridge, Smith B. Thurston and William King. My cousin, Silas Smith, having been at work in Honolulu for some time, and thereby having sufficient money, kindly paid my fare. We took passage in the hold of the vessel, she having no steerage accomodations, and we not having sufficient means to take cabin passage. We found the weather considerably cooler than we had been accustomed to, which we felt all the more keenly on account of the destitute condition a few of us were in, through having lost all our effects by fire but a short time previous.

"On landing at San Francisco in the latter part of October, 1857, we at once reported ourselves at the office of the Western Standard, to Pres. Geo. Q. Cannon, who was then editing that paper. He perceived the destitute condition that Elder E. Partridge and I were in and took us to a clothing store, where he fitted us out with a good warm overcoat each and a pair of blankets between us. With this outfit Brother Partridge and I started down the coast to Santa Cruz County, Cal., where we joined a company under the captaincy of Charles W. Wandell, with whom we traveled down the coast, and through the country southward as far as the Mohave River, some three or four hundred miles from San Francisco. At this point a number of us left the company, camped on the Mohave, and made a visit to San Bernardino. Here I met a number of my old friends, who were very kind to me, and provided me with means to clothe myself very comfortably for the remainder of the journey home. We found the Saints of San Bernardino all preparing for a general hegira to Utah.

"While visiting San Bernardino I made two trips to Los Angeles, to visit the widow of my uncle Don Carlos Smith and her family, in the hope of assisting them to move with the Saints to the valley. Having fortunately met Elders Orson Pratt, Geo. Q. Cannon and others at San Bernardino—they being on their way to Utah—I was enabled to arrange for a good wagon and team for that purpose, but they preferred to remain where they were, probably through the influence of Wm. Pickett, to whom my aunt was married, he being a rank apostate.

"Being under no obligations to continue traveling with C. W. Wandell's company, with whom I had sojourned down the coast, I engaged to drive team for George Crismon, and accordingly commenced my homeward journey again, sometime in the winter. I arrived in Great Salt Lake City Feb. 24, 1858, having been absent about three years and nine months.

"Brother Partridge left me at San Bernardino, and I did not see him again, nor the brethren, from whom we parted in San Francisco, until we met, years later, in Utah.

"The day following my arrival home I reported myself to President Young, and immediately enlisted in the 'Legion' to defend ourselves against the encroachment of a hostile and menacing army. From that time until the proclamation of peace, and a 'free and full pardon' by Pres. Buchanan came, I was constantly in my saddle, prospecting and exploring the country, between Great Salt Lake City and Fort Bridger, under the commands of Col. Thos. Callister and others.

"I was on picket guard, with a party of men under O. P. Rockwell when Commissioners Powell and M'Collough met us near the Weber River, with the President's proclamation. Subsequently I was on detail in the deserted city of Great Salt Lake until after the army passed through the city, and thence to Camp Floyd. After this I assistedmy relatives to return to their homes, from which they had fled to the south some time previous.

"During the winter of 1858–59 I served as sergeant-at-arms of the Council in the Territorial Legislature. The members of this session had difficulty in getting their pay, through the penuriousness and bigotry of Secretary Hartnett, the Legislature having adjourned from Fillmore to Great Salt Lake City, which was the cause of a technical quibble in the mind and on the part of the secretary.

"I was ordained into the 32nd quorum of Seventies March 20, 1858, soon after my return from the Islands. On April 5, 1859, I was married, and on Oct. 16th, of that year, I was ordained a High Priest and appointed a member of the High Council of the Salt Lake Stake of Zion.

"At the April Conference, 1860, I was called to go on a mission to Great Britain. I arranged my little affairs, closed up house-keeping, my wife returning to her mother to live with her during my absence, I left what little means I had in her hands toward her support, and left Great Salt Lake City again, on the 27th of April as a teamster for a Brother Beebe, for whom my cousin, Samuel H. B., and myself drove each a four-mule team, to Fort Des Moines, Iowa, for our passage and board that far on our journey to England. Brother Beebe, who was very much on the back-ground, considered that he had done us a great favor in allowing us to drive his teams and guard them, day and night, across the plains, for the favor of our passage and board!

"At Fort Des Moines, we borrowed money of a brother, which he had saved to immigrate his sister to America, to pay our fare forward to Liverpool. We called at Nauvoo on our way east, where I had an interview with Cousin Joseph and his brothers, Frederick and Alexander.

"I will relate two little incidents which occurred during our visit to Nauvoo. We arrived in the morning early, having lodged over night at Montrose, as we traveled from Burlington down to Montrose by a river steamer. We found Joseph occupying the old homestead of his father, near the river bank, and put up with him. We (Samuel and I) were soon afterwards conducted over to the Mansion, the residence of Aunt Emma and Mr. Bidaman and their family, by Frederick and Alexander. In the large dining room, which I had last entered in my childhood to witness the slain bodies of the two martyrs, some sixteen years before, we found Aunt Emma sitting, tailor-like, on the large side table. I knew her instantly; she was sewing. Frederick remarked, 'Mother, do you know these young men?" She instantly raised her eyes, lifted her glasses on to her forehead, and looking at me said, 'Why, as I live, it is Joseph! Why, Joseph, I would have known you in hell. You look so much like your father!' These were her exact words. They fell with bewildering surprise upon my ears, and I shall never forget them. She had not seen me for fourteen years or more, and did not know till that instant that I was within two thousand miles of her. She seemed not to be so clear in recognizing Samuel, although he had visited them a short time before.

"When Joseph conducted Samuel and myself to our chamber, he said, on bidding us good-night, 'John S. slept here a while ago, and he had a dream. I have had several myself in this room, and I would like you to remember what you dream to-night and let me know." This was but a few weeks after his acceptance of the position he now occupies at the hands of Wm. Marks and others. He was feeling somewhat zealous and urged us not to go any further on our missions, but stop and reflect, etc. In the morning I asked Samuel if he had dreamed any thing. He replied no. I then told him my dream, as follows: 'I thought I was standing on a large pine raft, moored at the foot of the street in the edge of the river, and was fishing with a hook and line, and I thought I pulled out the fish almost as fast as I could bait my hook. The water seemed clear, so that I could see into it at great depth. I stood on the outer edge of the raft, which was large, filling the space opposite the street. Soon I dropped my hook as usual, and no sooner had it sunk below the surface than I saw a huge gar making directly for it. Fearing I would lose my hook, I drew it rapidly out, but the gar was so determined to nab it that he ran out of the water more than half the length of my arm in the vain attempt to snap it. However, I saved my hook and line, and carried away my fish.' When I told Joseph my dream, he made no reply and the subject dropped. They treated us very kindly, but were quite solicitous for our welfare, as they supposed.

"From Nauvoo we visited the three sisters of the Prophet, two of whom were living at a little town called Colchester, in McDonough Co., Ill., and the other near by. We spent some little time among them, and held meetings. They were all seemingly opposed to Joseph and inclined to look favorably toward us. There were a few members of the Church at this place, with whom, in connection with our kindred, we met.

"From here we proceeded to New York City, arriving there in the beginning of July, and witnessed the celebration of the great national anniversary in that great metropolis.

"July 14th, we set sail for Liverpool on board the ocean steamer City of Edinburgh, and we arrived in Liverpool July 27th. Our company consisted of the following brethren: A. M. Lyman and son (Francis Marion), C. C. Rich and son (Jos. C.), David M. Stuart, S. H. B. Smith, R. A. McBride, John Brown, John S. Gleason, Samuel L. Adams, John Tobin, James Brown, and Wm. H. Dame.

"As soon as possible, after our arrival at Liverpool, Samuel and I made arrangements with Brother N. V. Jones, then acting as President of the mission, for the payment of the funds we had borrowed for our transportation from Des Moines, and by the blessing of the Lord we were soon able to pay our debt. My cousin and I were appointed to labor in the Bradford Conference, under the direction of Elder Thos. Wallace, who was then the 'Pastor' of the district, comprising the Bradford, Sheffield, Hull and Lincolnshire Conferences. Soon after our arrival in England, Elder Geo. Q. Cannon, who had previously been appointed, took charge of the European Mission. I was appointed President of the Sheffield Conference, and when Brother Wallace emigrated, I was appointed to take charge of the 'Pastorate.' In this capacity I labored continually until the fall of 1862, when by invitation from Pres. Cannon, I had the pleasure of accompanying him on a very interesting visit to Denmark, where I had the opportunity of visiting the Copenhagen, Aarhus and Aalborg Conferences. Again in the spring of 1863, by permission, and the liberal assistance of Pres. Cannon, I visited Paris, France, in company with Bishop C. W. West and B. Young, jun. In June, 1863, I was released to return home, and crossed the Atlantic, in company with Brother Geo. Peacock and Sister E. H. Cannon and family, on board the steamer City of Baltimore. We reached New York City in time to witness the dreadful riots which occurred there, in the forepart of July of that year. Every negro was run out of the city, compelled to conceal himself, or be killed, and every pane of glass was broken in the New York Tribune Office; the press was also broken and the type pied.

"Having no means to go forward, Sister Cannon and family were sent on to the frontier without me, and I waited the arrival of the next company of immigrants. Elder H. S. Eldredge was agent that season. I came to Florence in connection with D. M. Stuart's company, and thence across the plains, as chaplain and 'physician,' in Captain John W. Woolleys company. My brother-in-law, C. E. Griffin, drove a team and wagon which contained a ton of gun powder. We passed through several thunder-storms on the Platte, which created lively sensations among those in proximity to this wagon. At Green River we were met by Lewis Robison and a small party of men, with pack animals, who came to convey this powder across the country to the city. I joined this party, and with them arrived in Great Salt Lake City.

"I found my wife in a very delicate state of health, on my arrival home, and the excitement consequent upon my return seemed to add to her nervous afflictions. For six weeks I waited upon her night and day, without ten minutes' unbroken sleep, and without removing my clothing except to change them. Finally her health began gradually to improve. At the October Conference, in 1863, or soon afterwards, President Young made a proposition to the congregation assembled in the old Tabernacle, to make Samuel and myself a present of $1.000, each, to start us for home life, as we had been away from home so much of late on missions. This afterwards proved a great source of annoyance to both of us, as neither of us realized more than a couple of hundred dollars from the affair, while many seemed to think we were rich!

"In March, 1864, I started by stage, in company with Apostles Ezra T. Benson and Lorenzo Snow; and Elders Wm. W. Cluff and A. L. Smith, having been called by the Presidency of the Church, on another mission to the Sandwich Islands. We arrived in Honolulu March 27, 1864, having crossed the sea in the bark Onward, Capt. Hempstead. A few days later we landed at Lahaina on Maui, where Brothers Benson, Snow, Cluff and A. L. Smith were capsized in the sea, and Brother Snow came so near losing his life. On April 2nd we crossed the channel to Lanai, and partook of the hospitality of Mr. Walter M. Gibson, who had established himself as the leader of the Saints on the Islands. After laboring with him for several days, he was excommunicated from the Church, and we returned to Lahaina, from thence to Honolulu, and on the return of the Onward, the Apostles left myself and the other American Elders in charge of the mission.

"We at once set about visiting the native Saints, and endeavored to gather up the shattered fragments of the Church whenever we could find them. In June we were reenforced by the arrival of Elders John R. Young and Benjamin Cluff. We visited all the islands, and concluded that our prospects to accomplish permanent good among the people were exceedingly precarious without some move to establish a permanent location and head-quarters, with labor and enterprise in view. We communicated our views to President Young in writing and were instructed to make enquiry into the value of suitable lands, and report. This we did, and were later on instructed to leave the mission for the present in the hands of one or two of our number, and the rest return home. We accordingly selected Brother A. L. Smith to take charge, with Brother Benjamin Cluff to study the language and assist him, and Brothers W. W. Cluff, J. R. Young and myself returned to the coast, arriving late in October of the same year. We took with us the widow and children of Albion Burnham, and two natives. At San Francisco we were met by Elders F. A. Hammond and George Nebeker, on their way to the islands to purchase land and establish a permanent gathering place for the Saints.

"The location formerly selected, on Lanai, had fallen into the hands of W. M. Gibson, which he had filched from the poor natives. At first we could make no impression upon his adherents, but they soon all left him and returned to the true fold, leaving Mr. Gibson friendless and alone. Brothers Hammond and Nebeker brought word that we were at liberty to return with them to the Islands, or continue on home, just as we chose; of course we chose the latter. The two native brethren, however, chose to return with them.

"Meanwhile Brother J. R. Young with the Burnham family had departed for southern California, and thence to southern Utah. My wife, whose health had been very feeble for some time, by advice of friends, met me in San Francisco. With her I spent a short time, expecting her to return with me to Great Salt Lake City. Her friends and relatives were very solicitous for her to remain longer, and every persuasion was used to induce me to remain. But my mind was bent on home. I therefore made the necessary preparations, and Brother W. W. Cluff, myself and wife started for home.

At Dutch Flats, in the Sierra Nevada Mountains, we were snowed in, with eight feet of snow, for several days. My wife became nervous and frightened and desired to go back to San Francisco till spring. I consented, and when the road was broke through the snow, Brother Cluff and I continued our homeward journey, and my wife returned to the coast. We arrived home safely in December. The means which I received towards the $1,000 donation was not sufficient to pay my expenses on this mission. On the contrary, I spent $100 more than I ever received from this source, which was supplied to me by my aunt M. R. Thompson. The only article that I ever possessed from this proposed gift, was a few gallons of molasses and a small fancy dwarf stove, which was valued at $30.

"Soon after my return from this mission, I was employed as a clerk in the Historian's Office, and at the Endowment House, frequently traveling through the Territory, when required, in the capacity of a home missionary.

"I was elected a member of the city council of Great Salt Lake City, for several terms, and also served in the Territorial legislature as a member from Great Salt Lake County. In 1866 I entered into the holy order of plural marriage, by and with the advice, consent and approval of the presiding authorities of the Church, and my first wife, which step I have never regretted. Had it not been for plural marriage I should in all probability have been childless to the day of my death, for my first wife was barren, whereas I am now the father of many sons and daughters.

"On July 1, 1866, I was ordained an Apostle and a Counselor to the President of the Church, under the hands of Pres. Brigham Young, Daniel H. Wells and the quorum of the Twelve Apostles, at Great Salt Lake City. And on Oct. 8, 1867, I was appointed to fill the vacancy in the quorum of the Twelve.

"In 1868 I was called to go to Provo, Utah Co., together with Apostle W. Woodruff, A. O. Smoot, E. F. Sheets, Geo. G. Bywater and others. I was elected a member of the Provo city council and removed a part of my family to that place. All the others who were called there did likewise. During this year Prests. Young and Kimball also removed branches of their families to Provo. This was some months prior to the death of the latter.

"I remained in Provo during this summer, except when traveling through the Territory as a home missionary, and labored in the cabinet shop of the Cluff Bros. for daily wages. By permission of President Young, I removed my family back to Salt Lake City, during the winter of 1868–69, and resumed my labors in the Historian's Office and the Endowment House. I also attended the meetings of the Provo city council as circumstances permitted until my term of office expired, and traveled throughout the Territory, in company with Pres. Young and members of the quorum of the Twelve, in the discharge of the duties of my calling.

"Feb. 28, 1874, having been previously appointed, I started on my second mission to Great Britain, to take charge of the European Mission. I was accompanied to New York City by Elder F. Theurer who had been appointed a mission to Switzerland. He was, however, detained in New York in the effort to obtain his citizenship papers, and I proceeded to Liverpool alone, arriving there March 21st. There were only half a dozen passengers, all told, on board the steamer Idaho. It was surmised that fears of equinoctial storms was the cause of so few passengers. The voyage, however, proved to be one of the calmest and most pleasant within the memory of the captain and crew, the whole passage being made without putting the racks upon the tables.

"On my arrival at Liverpool, I was met by Bros. J. C. Graham and Geo. F. Gibbs, the former in charge of the Star, and the latter chief clerk in the office, Albert Carrington, who was nominally presiding over the mission, having returned to Utah the previous fall. I at once engaged, to the best of my ability, in the important duties of my calling, and I am thankful to believe, that with the able and faithful assistance of my co-laborers, many of whom were experienced men, during the ensuing eighteen or twenty months an excellent spirit was diffused throughout the mission, and a good work was done.

"During this mission I visited Scandinavia, Germany, Switzerland and France, but soon after the death of Pres. George A. Smith, in the fall of 1875, I was released to return home. Albert Carrington was appointed to succeed me in the Presidency of the mission.

"Some time after my return from this mission I was appointed President of Davis County, the county then not being organized into a Stake of Zion.

"I acted in this capacity, still retaining my residence in Salt Lake City, and continuing my temporal labors there and my Apostolic duties, as usual, until the spring of 1877, when I was again sent to take charge of the European Mission. In April, 1877, I attended the conference at St. George, and the dedication of the Temple at that place, and in May following I took my departure once more for Europe, having for companions and fellow-laborers Elders F. S. Richards, C. W. Nibley, Alma L. Smith, Royal B. Young, E. D. Woolley, jun., John R. Young, W. B. Smith and others. We arrived in Liverpool May 27, 1877. Pres. B. Young informed me that I would probably remain several years on this mission, and was therefore at liberty to take one of my wives with me, which I did. During the summer Apostle Orson Pratt came to Liverpool, commissioned, I think, by the Presidency and Council, to publish the Book of Mormon and Doctrine and Covenants in phonetic characters. I devoted a portion of my time to assist him in this labor and accompanied him to Bath and London in the furtherance thereof; but when our arrangements were being about completed for beginning the work of publication, we received a cable dispatch announcing the death of Pres. B. Young. This sudden and sad news fell like a thunderbolt upon us.

"Following these sorrowful tidings, we received another dispatch from the council of Apostles, ordering Brother Pratt and myself to return home forthwith. On the 12th of September we embarked on the steamship Wyoming, and reached Salt Lake City on the 27th. I attended the conference, and from thenceforth continued in council and in the duties devolving upon me, in connection with the brethren, until August, 1878, when Elder Orson Pratt and myself started on a short mission to the State of New York. On our way we visited Independence, Jackson Co., Mo. There we had an interview with Wm. E. McLellan, which led to a correspondence between him and myself that continued until his death. We also visited Richmond (where we had several interesting interviews with David Whitmer and others) and Far West, Mo.; Plano, Ill.; Kirtland, Ohio; the towns of Palmyra and Manchester, the Hill Cumorah, and the city of Buffalo, N. Y.

"In New York City we spent a few days in company with Elder W. C. Staines, and there Brother Pratt left me to go to New Hampshire, and I returned home calling again at Plano, Ill., where I had a short visit with Joseph Smith, relative to the manuscript of the inspired translation of the Bible. Further on I also called for a few hours at Colchester, Ill., where I saw, for the last time, the youngest sister of the Prophet Joseph Smith, Lucy Milikin and a number of her children. Her husband, Arthur Milikin, and soon afterwards she herself, died, at their home in Colchester.

"I arrived in Salt Lake City in time for the opening of conference, followed closely by Elder Pratt.

"After the opening of the St. George Temple, the Endowment House in Salt Lake City was closed for ordinances, but after the death of President Young, when it was found necessary to again open it, I was placed in charge thereof, which position I filled until the summer of 1884, when the house was again closed.

"In October, 1880, in the reorganization of the First Presidency, I was chosen by Pres. Taylor as his second Counselor.

"I was a member of the council of the Utah Legislature, during its session of 1882, and by the courtesy of the councilors was chosen President of the council. At this session Governor Murray asserted his claim to the right of appointing Territorial officers, and the Edmunds bill becoming a law, polygamists were relieved of the onerous duties and burdens of office. At this session a resolution was passed providing for the election of members to a convention, to be held in April, to draft a constitution, and appoint delegates to present the same to Congress and ask for the admission of Utah into the Union as a sovereign State. I had the honor of being chosen President of that convention, which I attended faithfully during its session, and subsequently from time to time pursuant to adjournments.

"In 1883 I visited Colorado in company with Pres. W. Woodruff, B. Young and John Morgan, and took part in the organization of the Conejos Stake of Zion in June of that year.

"In August and September, 1884, in company with Elders Erastus Snow and John Morgan, I visited Emery Stake, Conejos Stake, the Eastern Arizona Stake, and the settlements in the Little Colorado and San Juan Stakes, holding meetings and conferences in all the principal settlements. Since then I have been in exile, and have traveled in northern Utah, in Idaho, Oregon, Wyoming, Colorado, Nebraska, New Mexico, Arizona, south-eastern Utah, Mexico and California, as duty and my safety from the hands of malicious persecutors demanded."

THE THREE WITNESSES.

While Joseph Smith, the Prophet, with Oliver Cowdery as scribe, were engaged in translating the Book of Mormon, in Fayette, Seneca Co., N. Y., in the year 1829, they ascertained that the plates, from which they were translating, should be shown by the power of God to three special witnesses, who should bear record of the divinity of the book, etc. (See Book of Mormon, Ether 5th Chap.)

Almost immediately after making this discovery, Oliver Cowdery, David Whitmer and Martin Harris asked the Prophet Joseph to "inquire of the Lord to know if they might not obtain of him to be these three special witnesses." At length Joseph complied with their wishes, and through the Urim and Thummim received for them a revelation, granting them the privilege conditional upon their faith. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 17.)

"Not many days after the above commandment was given," writes Joseph Smith, "we four, viz. Martin Harris, David Whitmer, Oliver Cowdery and myself, agreed to retire into the woods, and try to obtain by fervent and humble prayer, the fulfilment of the promises given in the revelation, that they should have a view of the plates, etc.

"We accordingly made choice of a piece of woods convenient to Mr. Whitmer's house, to which we retired, and having knelt down, we began to pray in much faith to Almighty God to bestow upon us a realization of these promises. According to previous arrangements I commenced by vocal prayer to our heavenly Father, and was followed by each of the rest in succession. We did not, however, obtain any answer or manifestation of the divine favor in our behalf. We again observed the same order of prayer, each calling on and praying fervently to God in rotation, but with the same result as before. Upon this our second failure, Martin Harris proposed that he should withdraw himself from us, believing, as he expressed himself, that his presence was the cause of our not obtaining what we wished for; he accordingly withdrew from us, and we knelt down again, and had not been many minutes engaged in prayer, when presently we beheld a light above us in the air, of exceeding brightness; and behold, an angel stood before us; in his hand he held the plates which we had been praying for these to have a view of; he turned over the leaves one by one, so that we could see them, and discover the engravings thereon distinctly. He then addressed himself to David Whitmer, and said, 'David, blessed is the Lord, and he that keeps His commandments.' When, immediately afterwards, we heard a voice from out of the bright light above us, saying, 'These plates have been revealed by the power of God, and they have been translated by the power of God. The translation of them which you have seen is correct, and I command you to bear record of what you now see and hear.'

"I now left David and Oliver, and went in pursuit of Martin Harris, whom I found at a considerable distance fervently engaged in prayer. He soon told me, however, that he had not yet prevailed with the Lord, and earnestly requested me to join him in prayer, that he also might realize the same blessings which we had just received. We accordingly joined in prayer, and ultimately obtained our desires, for before we had yet finished, the same vision was opened to our view, at least it was again to me, and I once more beheld and heard the same things, whilst, at the same moment, Martin Harris cried out, apparently in ecstacy of joy, ''Tis enough; mine eyes have beheld,' and jumping up he shouted 'Hosannah,' blessing God, and otherwise rejoiced exceedingly.

"Having thus, through the mercy of God, obtained these manifestations, it now remained for these three individuals to fulfill the commandment which they had received, viz., to bear record of these things, in order to accomplish which, they drew up and described the following document:—

"'The Testimony of Three Witnesses.

"'Be it known unto all nations, kindreds, tongues, and people unto whom this work shall come, that we, through the grace of God the Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ, have seen the plates which contain this record—which is the record of the people of Nephi, and also of the Lamanites, their brethren, and also of the people of Jared, who came from the tower of which hath been spoken; and we also know that they have been translated by the gift and power of God, for His voice hath declared it unto us; wherefore we know of a surety that the work is true. And we also testify that we have seen the engravings which are upon the plates, and they have been shown unto us by the power of God, and not of man; and we declare with words of soberness, that an angel of God came down from heaven, and he brought and laid before our eyes, that we beheld and saw the plates and the engravings thereon; and we know that it is by the grace of God the Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ, that we beheld and bear record that these things are true; and it is marvelous in our eyes; nevertheless, the voice of the Lord commanded us that we should bear record of it; wherefore, to be obedient unto the commandments of God, we bear testimony of these things. And we know that if we are faithful in Christ, we shall rid our garments of the blood of all men, and be found spotless before the judgment-seat of Christ, and shall dwell with him eternally in the heavens. And the honor be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost, which is one God. Amen.

OLIVER COWDERY,
DAVID WHITMER,
MARTIN HARRIS.'"

OLIVER COWDERY,

Was born in the town of Wells, Rutland Co., Vermont, in October, 1805. He was principally raised in the town of Poultney, Rutland Co., whence his father removed when Oliver was only three years old. About the year 1825, Oliver removed to the State of New York, where his elder brothers were married and settled, and some two years later his father also moved to that State. Oliver was employed as clerk in a store until the winter of 1828–29, when he taught the district school in the town of Manchester, Ontario Co., N. Y., nine miles from his father's house. There he first became acquainted with the family of Joseph Smith, sen. (father of the Prophet), who was one of those who sent children to the school, and Oliver went to board awhile at his house. During that time the family related to him the circumstances of young Joseph having received the plates of the Book of Mormon. Oliver became deeply ested and determined to find out the particulars about this wonderful event. He also prayed to the Lord to enlighten his mind, and one night, after he had retired to rest, the Lord manifested to him, that he had been told the truth in relation to the finding of the plates. He then concluded to pay Joseph Smith a visit, in order to learn more about it, which he did, and on April 5, 1829, he first met the Prophet at his temporary home in Harmony, Penn., whither he had removed because of the persecutions to which he had been subjected in the State of New York. This meeting of Joseph and Oliver was not only providential for the latter, but also for the Prophet himself, who had already been the custodian of the plates of the Book of Mormon for some time, but had been unable to proceed with the translation for the want of a scribe. In Oliver he saw the proper person to assist him in his work, and two days after his arrival, Joseph Smith "commenced to translate the Book of Mormon," with Oliver Cowdery as scribe. A few days later a revelation was given to Oliver Cowdery through Joseph Smith. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 6.)

While engaged in the work of translating, Oliver became exceedingly anxious to have the power to translate bestowed upon him, and in relation to his desire two revelations were given to him through the Prophet (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 8 and 9.) On various other occasions he was favored with the words of the Almighty direct through the Prophet, with whom he for a number of years afterwards was so closely connected in his administrations in the Priesthood and official duties generally. (See Doc. & Cov., Sec. 7, 13, 17, 18, 23, 110, etc.)

On May 15, 1829, Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery went into the woods to pray and inquire of the Lord respecting baptism for the remission of sins, which they found mentioned in the record. While engaged in prayer, a messenger from heaven descended in a cloud of light, and laying his hands upon them, he ordained them, saying:

"Upon you my fellow-servants, in the name of Messiah, I confer the Priesthood of Aaron, which holds the keys of the ministering of angels and of the Gospel of repentance, and of baptism by immersion for the remission of sins; and this shall never be taken again from the earth, until the sons of Levi do offer again an offering unto the Lord in righteousness."

This heavenly messenger said that this Aaronic Priesthood had not the power of laying on of hands for the gift of the Holy Ghost. He also told them that his name was John, the same that is called John the Baptist in the New Testament, and that he acted under the direction of Peter, James and John, who held the keys of the Priesthood of Melchisedek, which Priesthood he said would in due time be conferred on them, when Joseph should be the first and Oliver the second Elder in the Church.

The messenger also commanded them to go and be baptized and ordain each other, and directed that Joseph should first baptize Oliver, and then Oliver baptize Joseph. This they did, after which Joseph laid his hands on Oliver's head and ordained him to the Aaronic Priesthood. Oliver then laid his hands on Joseph and ordained him to the same Priesthood. The Prophet writes:

"Immediately on our coming up out of the water after we had been baptized, we experienced great and glorious blessings from our heavenly Father. No sooner had I baptized Oliver Cowdery, than the Holy Ghost fell upon him, and he stood up and prophesied many things which should shortly come to pass. And again, as soon as I had been baptized by him, I also had the spirit of prophecy, when, standing up, I prophesied concerning the rise of the Church, and many other things connected with the Church and this generation of the children of men. We were filled with the Holy Ghost, and rejoiced in the God of our salvation."

Early in June Joseph Smith and wife and Oliver Cowdery removed to Fayette, Seneca Co., N. Y., where the translation of the Book of Mormon was continued and finished. John Whitmer, one of the sons of Peter Whitmer, sen., assisted considerably in the writing. It was some time during the month of June of this year (1829) that the plates were shown to the three witnesses; and not long afterwards Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery were ordained to the Melchisedek Priesthood by Peter, James and John. A revelation directed principally to Oliver Cowdery was also given, making known the calling of Twelve Apostles in the last days. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 18.)

When the Church was organized in Fayette, April 6, 1830, Oliver Cowdery was one of the original six members, and was on that occasion ordained by Joseph Smith to be the second Elder in the Church. April 11th, Oliver preached the first public discourse delivered by any Elder in this dispensation. The meeting in which this took place was held in Mr. Whitmer's house in Fayette.

In the following June, Oliver accompanied the Prophet to Colesville, Broome Co., where a large branch of the Church subsequently was raised up, amidst considerable persecution.

In October, 1830, Oliver Cowdery, Parley P. Pratt, Peter Whitmer, jun., and Ziba Peterson were called to go on a mission to the Lamanites in the wilderness. These missionaries took leave of their friends late in October of the same year, and started on foot. After traveling for some days, they stopped and preached to an Indian nation near Buffalo, N. Y., and subsequently raised up a large branch of the Church in Kirtland, Ohio. Among the converts at the latter place was the famous Sidney Rigdon, who afterwards became so prominent in the Church. In the beginning of 1831, after a very hard and toilsome journey in the dead of winter, the missionaries finally arrived in Independence, Jackson County, Missouri, about fifteen hundred miles from where they started. This was the first mission performed by the Elders of the Church in any of the States west of New York. Oliver Cowdery and P. P. Pratt commenced a prosperous mission among the Delaware Indians across the frontier line, but they were finally ordered out by the Indian Agents, accused of being disturbers of the peace. Being thus compelled to cease their work among the Lamanites for the time being, the Elders commenced preaching to the whites in Jackson County, with considerable success. In February Elder Pratt was sent back to the East, while Elder Cowdery and his other companion remained in Missouri until the arrival of the Prophet Joseph and many other Elders from the East, July following, when Jackson County was designated as a gathering place of the Saints and dedicated for that purpose.

When the Temple site was dedicated, Aug. 3, 1831, Elder Cowdery was one of the eight men present. He subsequently returned to Kirtland, Ohio, with the Prophet, where they arrived Aug. 27th. In the following November he and John Whitmer was sent back to Missouri with the revelations, which were to be printed there by W. W. Phelps.

On the Prophet's second visit to Missouri, in 1832, Oliver Cowdery was appointed one of a committee of three to review and prepare such revelations as were deemed proper for publication. He was also one of seven High Priests appointed to stand at the head of affairs relating to the Church in Missouri.

After the destruction of the printing press and the troubles in Jackson County, in July, 1833, Oliver Cowdery was sent as a special messenger from the Saints to Kirtland, Ohio, to confer with the First Presidency there. He arrived there in the latter part of August.

At a council held in Kirtland, Sept. 11, 1833, he was appointed to take charge of the printing office to be established at that place, and there he subsequently recommenced the publication of the Evening and Morning Star. When the press was dedicated, Dec. 18, 1833, the Prophet records the following concerning Elder Cowdery:

"Blessed of the Lord is Brother Oliver; nevertheless there are two evils in him that he must needs forsake, or he cannot altogether forsake the buffetings of the adversary. If he forsake these evils, he shall be forgiven, and shall be made like unto the bow which the Lord hath set in the heavens; he shall be a sign and an ensign unto the nations. Behold, he is blessed of the Lord for his constancy and steadfastness in the work of the Lord; wherefore, he shall be blessed in his generation, and they shall never be cut off, and he shall be helped out of many troubles; and if he keeps the commandments, and hearkens unto the counsel of the Lord, his rest shall be glorious."

At the organization of the first High Council in the Church, at Kirtland, Feb. 17, 1834, Elder Cowdery was elected a member. He acted as clerk of the Council for a number of years, and subsequently acted as President of the Council. When the Prophet, with Zion's Camp, started for Missouri in May following, Oliver, together with Sidney Rigdon, was left in charge of the Church in Kirtland.

On the evening of Nov. 29, 1834, Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery united in solemn prayer and made a covenent with the Lord, that if He would prosper them in certain things, they would give a "tenth to be bestowed upon the poor of his Church, or as he shall command." This was the first introduction of the paying of tithing among the Latter-day Saints.

In Feb., 1835, the Three Witnesses, Oliver Cowdery, David Whitmer and Martin Harris, chose twelve men from the Elders of the Church, to officiate as the Twelve Apostles. In blessing them and giving them instructions Oliver Cowdery took a prominent part. He was also one of the trustees of the school in Kirtland, where he studied Hebrew and other languages, in connection with the Prophet and other Elders. Sept. 14, 1835, he was appointed to act as Church Recorder.

He was present at the dedication of the Temple in Kirtland, and took a very active part in giving the assembled Elders their washings and anointings; and on April 3,1836, he, in connection with the Prophet Joseph, saw and heard the Savior, as also Moses, Elias and Elijah the Prophet, who committed unto them the keys necessary for the furtherance of the work of the great latter-day dispensation. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 110.)

Sept. 3, 1837, at a conference held in Kirtland, Elder Cowdery was appointed assistant Counselor to the First Presidency. Some time during that year he removed to Far West, Caldwell Co., Mo., where he acted as clerk of the High Council and Church Recorder. He was also a member of a committee appointed to select locations for the gathering of the Saints.

On Wednesday April 11, 1838, Elder Seymour Brunson preferred the following charges against Oliver Cowdery before the High Council of Far West:

"1st. For persecuting the brethren by urging on vexatious lawsuits against them, and thus distressing the innocent. 2nd. For seeking to destroy the character of President Joseph Smith, jun., by falsely insinuating that he was guilty of adultery, etc. 3rd. For treating the Church with contempt by not attending meeting. 4th. For virtually denying the faith by declaring that he would not be governed by any ecclesiastical authority or revelations whatever, in his temporal affairs. 5th. For selling his lands in Jackson County, contrary to the revelations. 6th. For writing and sending an insulting letter to President Thomas B. Marsh, while on the High Council, attending to the duties of his office as President of the Council, and by insulting the High Council with the contents of said letter. 7th. For leaving his calling, in which God had appointed him by revelation, for the sake of filthy lucre, and turning to the practice of law. 8th. For disgracing the Church by being connected in the bogus business, as common report says. 9th. For dishonestly retaining notes,after they have been paid; and, finally, for leaving or forsaking the cause of God, and returning to the beggarly elements of the world, and neglecting his high and holy calling, according to his profession."

The following day (April 12th) the Bishop of Far West and High Council examined his case. "The 1st, 2nd, 3rd, 7th, 8th and 9th charges were sustained. The 4th and 5th charges were rejected, and the 6th was withdrawn. Consequently he (Oliver Cowdery) was considered no longer a member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.

After his excommunication, Oliver Cowdery engaged in law business and practiced for some years as a lawyer in Michigan, but he never denied the truth of the Book of Mormon. On the contrary, he seems to have used every opportunity he had to bear testimony of its divine origin. While practicing law in Michigan, a gentleman, on a certain occasion, addressed him as follows, "Mr. Cowdery, I see your name attached to this book. If you believe it to be true, why are you in Michigan?" The gentleman then read the names of the Three Witnesses and asked, "Mr. Cowdery, do you believe this book!" "No, sir," was the reply. "Very well," continued the gentleman, "but your name is attached to it, and you declare here (pointing to the book) that you saw an angel, and also the plates, from which the book purports to be translated; and now you say you don't believe it. Which time did you tell the truth?"

Oliver Cowdery replied with emphasis, "My name is attached to that book, and what I there have said is true. I did see this; I know I saw it, and faith has nothing to do with it, as a perfect knowledge has swallowed up the faith which I had in the work, knowing, as I do, that it is true."

At a special conference held at Kanesville, Iowa, Oct. 21, 1848, and presided over by Apostle Orson Hyde, Oliver Cowdery was present and made the following remarks:

"Friends and Brethren,—My name is Cowdery, Oliver Cowdery. In the early history of this Church I stood indentified with her, and one in her councils. True it is that the gifts and callings of God are without repentance; not because I was better than the rest of mankind was I called; but, to fulfill the purposes of God, He called me to a high and holy calling.

"I wrote, with my own pen, the entire Book of Mormon (save a few pages) as it fell from the lips of the Prophet Joseph Smith, as he translated it by the gift and power of God, by the means of the Urim and Thummim, or, as it is called by that book, 'holy interpreters.' I beheld with my eyes, and handled with my hands, the gold plates from which it was transcribed. I also saw with my eyes and handled with my hands the 'holy interpreters.' That book is true. Sidney Rigdon did not write it; Mr. Spaulding did not write it; I wrote it myself as it fell from the lips of the Prophet. It contains the Everlasting Gospel, and came forth to the children of men in fulfilment of the revelations of John, where he says he saw an angel come with the Everlasting Gospel to preach to every nation, kindred, tongue and people. It contains principles of salvation; and if you, my hearers, will walk by its light and obey its precepts, you will be saved with an everlasting salvation in the kingdom of God on high. Brother Hyde has just said that it is very important that we keep and walk in the true channel, in order to avoid the sand-bars. This is true. The channel is here. The holy Priesthood is here.

"I was present with Joseph when an holy angel from God came down from heaven and conferred on us, or restored, the lesser or Aaronic Priesthood, and said to us, at the same time, that it should remain upon the earth while the earth stands.

"I was also present with Joseph when the higher or Melchisedek Priesthood was conferred by holy angels from on high. This Priesthood we then conferred on each other, by the will and commandment of God. This Priesthood, as was then declared, is also to remain upon the earth until the last remnant of time. This holy Priesthood, or authority, we then conferred upon many, and is just as good and valid as though God had done it in person.

"I laid my hands upon that man—yes, I laid my right hand upon his head (pointing to Brother Hyde), and I conferred upon him this Priesthood, and he holds that Priesthood now. He was also called through me, by the prayer of faith, an Apostle of the Lord Jesus Christ."

In the early part of November following Elder Hyde called a High Council in the Log Tabernacle, to consider the case of Oliver Cowdery; having been cut off by the voice of a High Council, it was thought that, if he was restored, he should be restored by the voice of a similar body. Before this body Brother Cowdery said:

"Brethren, for a number of years I have been separated from you. I now desire to come back. I wish to come humbly and to be one in your midst. I seek no station. only wish to be identified with you. I am out of the Church. I am not a member of the Church, but I wish to become a member of it. I wish to come in at the door. I know the door. I have not come here to seek precedence. I come humbly and throw myself upon the decisions of this body, knowing, as I do, that its decisions are right, and should be obeyed."

Brother George W. Harris, President of the Council, moved that Brother Cowdery be received. Considerable discussion took place in relation to a certain letter which, it was alleged, Brother Cowdery had written to David Whitmer. Brother Cowdery again rose and said:

"If there be any person that has aught against me, let him declare it. My coming back and humbly asking to become a mem ber through the door, covers the whole ground. I acknowledge this authority."

Brother Hyde moved that Brother Oliver Cowdery be received into the Church by baptism, and that all old things be dropped and forgotten, which was seconded and carried unanimously. Soon afterwards he was re-baptized.

Elder Phineas H. Young, who was present at the death of Oliver Cowdery, at Richmond, Missouri, March 3, 1850, says, "His last moments were spent in bearing testimony of the truth of the Gospel revealed through Joseph Smith, and the power of the holy Priesthood which he had received through his administrations."

Elder S. W. Richards relates the following:

"The arrival of Oliver Cowdery and his family at Council Bluffs from the east in the winter of 1848-49 was an interesting event in the history of the Church. With his family, he was on his way to the body of the Church located in Utah, but as some time must elapse before emigrant trains could venture upon the plains, he determined to visit his wife's friends, the Whitmers, in Missouri.

"While making that journey, a severe snow storm made it convenient for his family to spend several days with Elder Samuel W. Richards and family, who were temporarily residing in upper Missouri, awaiting the opening of the emigration season. That favorable opportunity was made the most of to discuss all matters of interest connected with the early history of the Church, with which Elder Cowdery was personally acquainted and Elder Richards was not.

"His relation of events was of no ordinary character, maintaining unequivocally all those written testimonies he had furnished to theChurch and world in earlier days. Moroni, Peter, James and John, and other heavenly messengers, who had ministered to him in connection with the Prophet Joseph Smith, were familiarly but sacredly spoken of, and all seemed fresh upon the memory as though but events of yesterday. His language was considerate, precise and forcible—entirely free from lightness or frivolity—such as might be expected from one who had been schooled with angels and taught by Prophets; more of the heavenly than the earthly.

"His only ambition seemed to be to give himself and the remainder of his life to the Church; declared he was ready and willing, if desired, to go to the nations of the earth and bear his testimony of that which God and angels had revealed—a testimony in his personal experience of many things which no other living person could bear. His hopes were buoyant that such might be his future lot as cast with the Church, in the body of which he declared the Priesthood and its authority were and must continue to be. An overruling Providence saw fit to order otherwise. Soon after arriving among his relatives in Missouri, he was taken sick and died,in full faith and fellowship of the latter-day work, desiring the world might know that his testimony was of God." (Contributor, Vol. 5, page 446.)

His half-sister, Lucy P. Young, a widow of the late Phineas H. Young, relates that Oliver Cowdery married a Miss Whitmer (a sister of the Whitmer brothers) in Missouri in 1833; and that just before breathing his last, he asked his attendants to raise him up in bed, that he might talk to the family and his friends, who were present. He then told them to live according to the teachings contained in the Book of Mormon, and promised them, if they would do this, that they would meet him in heaven. He then said, "Lay me down and let me fall asleep."

A few moments later he died without a struggle.

David Whitmer testified to Apostles Orson Pratt and Jos. F. Smith in 1878, as follows:

"Oliver died the happiest man I ever saw. After shaking hands with the family and kissing his wife and daughter, he said, 'Now I lay me down for the last time; I am going to my Savior;' and he died immediately, with a smile on his face." (See Mill. Star, Vol. 40, page 774.)

In an article published in the Mill. Star, Vol. 48, page 420, Elder Edward Stevenson gives the following testimony in relation to Oliver Cowdery:

"I have often heard him bear a faithful testimony to the restoration of the Gospel by the visitation of an angel, in whose presence he stood in company with the Prophet Joseph Smith and David Whitmer. He testified that he beheld the plates, the leaves being turned over by the angel, whose voice he heard, and that they were commanded as witnesses to bear a faithful testimony to the world of the vision that they were favored to behold, and that the translation from the plates in the Book of Mormon was accepted of the Lord, and that it should go forth to the world, and no power on earth should stop its progress. Although for a time Oliver Cowdery absented himself from the body of the Church, I never have known a time when he faltered or was recreant to the trust so sacredly entrusted to him by an angel from heaven."

DAVID WHITMER

Was born at a small trading post, near Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, Jan. 7, 1805. While yet an infant his father, who served his country through the revolutionary war, removed with his family to western New York and settled on a farm in Ontario County, near Watkin's Glen —at a point midway between the northern extremities of Lake Cayuga and Seneca, two miles from Waterloo, seven from Geneva, and twenty-five from Palmyra — where David lived until the year 1831. The father, who was a hard-working, God-fearing man, was a strict Presbyterian and brought his children up with rigid sectarian discipline. Besides a daughter who married Oliver Cowdery, there were five sons—Peter, Jacob, John, David and Christian—who helped their father on his farm until they had arrived at the age of manhood. The following is David Whitmer's own statement to a reporter of the Kansas City Journal; published June 5, 1881:

"I first heard of what is now termed Mormonism, in the year 1828. I made a business trip to Palmyra, N. Y., and while there stopped with one Oliver Cowdery. A great many people in the neighborhood were talking about the finding of certain golden plates by one Joseph Smith, jun., a young man of the neighborhood. Cowdery and I, as well as many others, talked about the matter, but at that time I paid but little attention to it, supposing it to be only the idle gossip of the neighborhood. Mr. Cowdery said he was acquainted with the Smith family, and he believed there must be some truth in the story of the plates, and that he intended to investigate the matter. I had conversation with several young men, who said that Joseph Smith had certainly golden plates, and that before he had attained them he had promised to share with them, but had not done so, and they were very much incensed with him. Said I, 'How do you know that Joe Smith has the plates?' They replied, 'We saw the plates in the hill that he took them out of, just as he described it to us before he had obtained them.' These parties were so positive in their statements that

I began to believe there must be some foundation for the stories then in circulation all over that part of the country. I had never seen any of the Smith family up to that time, and I began to enquire of the people in regard to them, and learned that one night during the year 1823, Joseph Smith, jun., had a vision, and an angel of God appeared to him and told him where certain plates were to be found, and pointed out the spot to him, and that shortly afterward he went to that place and found the plates, which were still in his possession. After thinking over the matter for a long time, and talking with Cowdery, who also gave me a history of the finding of the plates, I went home, and after several months, Cowdery told me he was going to Harmony, Penn., whither Joseph Smith had gone with the plates, on account of the persecutions of his neighbors, and see him about the matter. He did go, and on his way he stopped at my father's house and told me that as soon as he found out anything, either truth or untruth, he would let me know. After he got there he became acquainted with Jos. Smith, and shortly after wrote to me, telling me that he was convinced that Smith had the records.and that he (Smith) had told him that it was the will of heaven that he (Cowdery) should be his scribe to assist in the translation of the plates. He went on and Joseph translated from the plates, and he wrote it down. Shortly after this, Mr. Cowdery wrote me another letter, in which he gave me a few lines of what they had translated, and he assured me that he knew of a certainty that he had a record of a people that inhabited this continent, and that the plates they were translating from gave a complete history of these people. When Cowdery wrote me these things, and told me that he had revealed knowledge concerning the truth of them, I showed these letters to my parents, and brothers and sisters. Soon after I received another letter from Cowdery, telling me to come down into Pennsylvania, and bring him and Joseph to my father's house, giving as a reason therefor that they had received a commandment from God to that effect. I went down to Harmony and found everything just as they had written me. The next day after I got there they packed up the plates and we proceeded on our journey to my father's house, where we arrived in due time, and the day after we commenced upon the translation of the remainder of the plates. I, as well as all of my father's family, Smith's wife, Oliver Cowdery and Martin Harris, were present during the translation. The translation was by Smith, and the manner as follows:

"He had two small stones of a chocolate color, nearly egg shape, and perfectly smooth, but not transparent, called interpreters, which were given him with the plates. He did not use the plates in the translation, but would hold the interpreters to his eyes and cover his face with a hat, excluding all light, and before his eyes would appear what seemed to be parchment, on which would appear the characters of the plates in a line at the top, and immediately below would appear the translation, in English, which Smith would read to his scribe, who wrote it down exactly as it fell from his lips. The scribe would then read the sentence written, and if any mistake had been made, the characters would remain visible to Smith until corrected, when they faded from sight to be replaced by another line. The translation at my father's occupied about one month, that is from June 1 to July 1, 1829." (See Mill. Star, Vol. 43, page 421, etc.)

From the History of Joseph Smith we make the following extract:

"Shortly after commencing to translate, I became acquainted with Mr. Peter Whitmer, of Fayette, Seneca Co., N. Y., and also with some of his family. In the beginning of the month of June (1829), his son David Whitmer came to the place, (Harmony) where we were residing, and brought with him a two-horse wagon, for the purpose of having us (Joseph Smith and his wife and Oliver Cowdery) accompany him to his father's place, and there remain until we should finish the work. He proposed that we should have our board free of charge, and the assistance of one of his brothers to write for me, as also his own assistance when convenient.

"Having much need of such timely aid in an undertaking so arduous, and being informed that the people of the neighborhood were anxiously awaiting the opportunity to enquire into these things, we accepted the invitation and accompanied Mr. Whitmer to his father's house, and there resided until the translation was finished and the copyright secured. Upon our arrival, we found Mr. Whitmer's family very anxious concerning the work, and very friendly towards ourselves. They continued so, boarded and lodged us according to proposal, and John Whitmer, in particular, assisted us very much in writing during the remainder of the work."

In the meantime David, John and Peter Whitmer, jun., became the Prophet's zealous friends and assistants in the work, and being anxious to know their respective duties, and having desired with much earnestness that Joseph should enquire of the Lord concerning them, Joseph did so, through the means of the Urim and Thummim, and obtained for them in succession three revelations. (See Doc. & Cov., Sec. 14, 15 and 16.)

In June, 1829, David Whitmer was baptized by Joseph Smith, in Seneca Lake, and was soon afterward privileged to behold the plates of the Book of Mormon as one of the Three Witnesses.

After the organization of the Church with six members, of which David was one, he commenced to preach and accompanied the Prophet on several of his missionary trips to Colesville and other places. He also baptized quite a number of those who joined the Church at that early day.

After the Prophet had moved back to Harmony, Hiram Page, one of the Eight Witnesses, got in possession of a stone, by which he received certain revelations that conflicted with the order of the Church. The Whitmer family, Oliver Cowdery and others believed in these spurious revelations, for which the Lord, through the Prophet, reprimanded David Whitmer and instructed him not to give "heed to those whom He had not appointed." (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 30,)

Joseph Smith succeeded in setting matters right after his return to Fayette in August, 1830, and from that time until his removal to Ohio in the beginning of 1831, Joseph Smith resided with the Whitmer family, which during the same year removed to Jackson County, Missouri.

David Whitmer, who had married Julia A. Jolly, in 1830, located on the Big Blue River, at a point three miles east of Westport, and two years later shared in the persecutions heaped upon the Saints in that locality. In the fall of 1833 he was finally driven out of the county by the mob, together with the rest of the Saints. Next he located in Clay County, where he, July 3, 1834, was appointed President of the High Council, organized there by the Prophet. For nearly four years after this he acted as one of the leading Elders of the Church in Missouri, and after the location at Far West, in Caldwell Co., he was sustained as President of the Saints there; but falling into transgression, he was rejected as such, in a general conference held in Far West, Feb. 5, 1838, and finally, April 13, 1838, he was excommunicated from the Church by the High Council, at Far West, the following charges having been sustained against him:

"1st. For not observing the Word of Wisdom. 2nd. For unchristianlike conduct in neglecting to attend meetings, in uniting with and possessing the same spirit as the dissenters. 3rd. In writing letters to the dissenters in Kirtland, unfavorable to the cause, aud to the character of Joseph Smith, jun. 4th. In neglecting the duties of his calling, and separating himself from the Church, while he had a name among us. 5th. For signing himself President of the Church of Christ, after he had been cut off from the Presidency, in an insulting letter to the High Council."

Shortly after his excommunication David Whitmer left Far West and removed to Clay County, and in the latter part of 1838 located in Richmond, Ray Co., where he has resided ever since.

We introduce the following from a report of Apostles Orson Pratt and Joseph F. Smith:

"On Saturday morning, Sept. 7, (1878), we met Mr. David Whitmer, (at Richmond, Ray Co., Mo.), the last remaining one of the Three Witnesses of the Book of Mormon. He is a good-sized man, 73 years of age last January, and well preserved. He is close shaven, his hair perfectly white, and rather thin; he has a large head and a very pleasant, manly countenance that one would readily perceive to be an index to a conscientious, honest heart. He seemed wonderfully pleased, as well as surprised, at seeing Elder Orson Pratt, and said he would not have known him as he had grown so fat and stout; he remembered him as a slender, bashful, timid boy. After a few moments conversation he excused himself, saying he would return again to see us. This meeting was in the bar-room of the hotel. When he called again he was in company with Col. Childs, a middle aged man, and a resident of the place. By invitation we accompanied them to Mr. Whitmer's office, where we were introduced to Mr. David J. Whitmer (eldest son of David), Mr. George Schweich (grandson of the old gentleman), Mr. John C. Whitmer (son of Jacob Whitmer), Col. James W. Black, of Richmond, and several others. A couple of hours were very pleasantly passed in conversation, principally on Utah matters, when we parted for dinner, agreeing to meet Mr. Whitmer again at his office, at 4.30 p. m.

"Agreeable to appointment we met Mr. Whitmer and his friends, at his office, but as the place was too public for private conversation and as it seemed impossible to obtain a private personal interview with David Whitmer, by himself, we invited him and such of his friends as he saw proper to fetch along to our room in the hotel. Mr. Whitmer apologized for not inviting us to his house, as it was 'wash day,' and he and his wife were 'worn out' with the extra labor, exposure, etc., etc., consequent on rebuilding since the cyclone. He accepted our invitation to our room and brought with him James R. B. Vancleave, a fine looking, intelligent, young newspaper man, of Chicago, George Schweich, John C. Whitmer, W. W. Warner and another person whose name we did not learn. In the presence of these the following, in substance, as noticed in Brother Joseph F. Smith's journal, is the account of the interview: * * *

"Elder O. Pratt to David Whitmer. Do you remember what time you saw the plates?

"D. Whitmer. It was in June, 1829, the latter part of the month, and the eight witnesses saw them, I think, the next day or the day after (i. e. one or two days after). Joseph showed them the plates himself, but the angel showed us (the Three Witnesses) the plates, as I suppose to fulfill the words of the book itself. Martin Harris was not with us at this time; he obtained a view of them afterwards (the same day). Joseph, Oliver and myself were together when I saw them. We not only saw the plates of the Book of Mormon, but also the brass plates, the plates of the Book of Ether, the plates containing the records of the wickedness and secret combinations of the people of the world down to the time of their being engraved, and many other plates. The fact is, it was just as though Joseph, Oliver and I were sitting just here on a log, when we were overshadowed by a light. It was not like the light of the sun, nor like that of a fire, but more glorious and beautiful. It extended away round us, I cannot tell how far, but in the midst of this light about as far off as he sits (pointing to John C. Whitmer, sitting a few feet from him , there appeared, as it were, a table with many records or plates upon it, besides the plates of the Book of Mormon, also the sword of Laban, the directors (i. e., the ball which Lehi had) and the interpreters. I saw them just as plain as I see this bed (striking the bed beside him with his hand), and I heard the voice of the Lord, as distinctly as I ever heard anything in my life, declaring that the records of the plates of the Book of Mormon were translated by the gift and power of God.

"Elder O. Pratt. Did you see the angel at this time?

"D. Whitmer. Yes; he stood before us. Our testimony as recorded in the Book of Mormon is strictly and absolutely true, just as it is there written. Before I knew Joseph, I had heard about him and the plates from persons who declared they knew he had them, and swore they would get them from him. When Oliver Cowdery went to Pennsylvania, he promised to write me what he should learn about these matters, which he did. He wrote me that Joseph had told him his (Oliver's secret thoughts, and all he had meditated about going to see him, which no man on earth knew, as he supposed, but himself, and so he stopped to write for Joseph. Soon after this, Joseph sent for me (D. Whitmer) to come to Harmony to get him and Oliver and bring them to my father's house. I did not know what to do, I was pressed with my work. I had some 20 acres to plow, so I concluded I would finish plowing and then go. I got up one morning to go to work as usual, and on going to the field, found between five and seven acres of my ground had been plowed during the night. I don't know who did it; but it was done just as I would have done it myself, and the plow was left standing in the furrow. This enabled me to start sooner. When I arrived at Harmony, Joseph and Oliver were coming toward me, and met me some distance from the house. Oliver told me that Joseph had informed him when I started from home, where I had stopped the first night, how I read the sign at the tavern, where I stopped the next night, etc., and that I would be there that day before dinner, and this was why they had come out to meet me; all of which was exactly as Joseph had told Oliver, at which I was greatly astonished. When I was returning to Fayette, with Joseph and Oliver, all of us riding in the wagon, Oliver and I on an old-fashioned wooden spring seat and Joseph behind us—when traveling along in a clear open place, a very pleasant, nice-looking old man suddenly appeared by the side of our wagon and saluted us with, 'good morning, it is very warm,' at the same time wiping his face or forehead with his hand. We returned the salutation, and, by a sign from Joseph, I invited him to ride if he was going our way. But he said very pleasantly, 'No, I am going to Cumorah.' This name was something new to me, I did not know what Cumorah meant. We all gazed at him and at each other, and as I looked around enquiringly of Joseph, the old man instantly disappeared, so that I did not see him again.

"Joseph F. Smith. Did you notice his appearance?

"D. Whitmer. I should think I did. He was, I should think, about five feet eight or nine inches tall and heavy set, about such a man as James Vancleave there, but heavier; his face was as large; he was dressed in a suit of brown woolen clothes, his hair and beard were white, like Brother Pratt's, but his beard was not so heavy. I also remember that he had on his back a sort of knapsack with something in, shaped like a book. It was the messenger who had the plates, who had taken them from Joseph just prior to our starting from Harmony. Soon after our arrival home, I saw something which led me to the belief that the plates were placed or concealed in my father's barn. I frankly asked Joseph if my supposition was right, and he told me it was. Sometime after this, my mother was going to milk the cows, when she was met out near the yard by the same old man, (judging by her description of him), who said to her: 'You have been very faithful and diligent in your labors, but you are tired because of the increase of your toil; it is proper, therefore, that you should receive a witness that your faith may be strengthened.'' Thereupon he showed her the plates. My father and mother had a large family of their own, the addition to it, therefore, of Joseph, his wife Emma and Oliver very greatly increased the toil and anxiety of my mother. And although she had never complained she had sometimes felt that her labor was too much, or at least she was perhaps beginning to feel so. This circumstance, however, completely removed all such feelings and nerved her up for her increased responsibilities. * * *

"Elder O. Pratt. Have you in your possession the original manuscript of the Book of Mormon?

"D. Whitmer. I have; they are in O. Cowdery's handwriting. He placed them in my care at his death, and charged me to preserve them as long as I lived; they are safe and well preserved.

"J. F. Smith. What will be done with them at your death?

"D. Whitmer. I will leave them to my nephew, David Whitmer, son of my brother Jacob, and my namesake.

"O. Pratt. Would you not part with them to a purchaser?

"D. Whitmer. No. Oliver charged me to keep them, and Joseph said my fathers's house should keep the records. I consider these things sacred, and would not part with nor barter them for money.

"J. F. Smith. We would not offer you money in the light of bartering for the manuscript, but we would like to see them preserved in some manner where they would be safe from casualties and from the caprices of men, in some institution that will not die as man does.

"D. Whitmer. That is all right. While camping around here in a tent, all my effects exposed to the weather, everything in the trunk where the manuscripts were kept became mouldy, etc., but they were preserved,not even being discolored. (We supposed his camping in a tent, etc., had reference to his circumstances after the cyclone, in June last.) The room in which the manuscripts were kept, was the only part of the house which was not demolished, and even the ceiling of that room was but little-impaired.

'Do you think,' said Phil. Page, a son of Hiram Page, one of the Eight Witnesses, 'that the Almighty cannot take care of his own!'

"Next day (Sunday Sept. 8th) Mr. Whitmer invited us to his house, where, in the presence of David Whitmer, Esq., (son of Jacob), Philander Page, J. R. B. Vancleave, David J. Whitmer (son of David the Witness), George Schweich (grandson of David), Colonel Childs and others, David Whitmer brought out the manuscripts of the Book of Mormon. We examined them closely and those who knew the handwriting pronounced the whole of them, excepting comparatively a few pages, to be in the handwriting of Oliver Cowdery. It was thought that these few pages were in the handwriting of Emma Smith and John and Christian Whitmer.

"We found that the names of the Eleven Witnesses were, however, subscribed in the handwriting of Oliver Cowdery. When the question was asked Mr. Whitmer if he and the other witnesses did or did not sign the testimonies themselves, Mr. Whitmer replied that each signed his own name. 'Then where are the original signatures?' D. Whitmer 'I don't know, I suppose Oliver copied them, but this I know is an exact copy.' * * *

"Joseph F. Smith suggested that perhaps there were two copies of the manuscripts, but Mr. Whitmer replied that, according to the best of his knowledge, there never was but the one copy. Herein, of course, he is evidently uninformed.

"Elder O. Pratt again felt closely after the subject of procuring the manuscripts,but we found that nothing would move him on this point. The whole Whitmer family are deeply impressed with the sacredness of this relic. And so thoroughly imbued are they with the idea and faith that it is under the immediate protection of the Almighty, that in their estimation, not only are the manuscripts themselves safe from all possible contingencies, but that they are a source of protection to the place or house in which they may be kept, and, it may be to those who have possession of them. Another reason why they cling to this relic is that David Whitmer has reorganized the 'Church of Christ' with six Elders and two priests, after the pattern of the first organization,the two priests, as we suppose, representing Joseph and Oliver as holding the Aaronic Priesthood from the hand of John the Baptist. David and John Whitmer were two of these six Elders, four others, viz. John C. Whitmer, W. W. Warren, Philander Page and John Short, having been ordained by David and John. And as the recent death of John has diminished the number to five Elders it would be interesting to know if, according to their strict construction, the vacancy can be filled. Their creed is to preach nothing but the Bible and the Book of Mormon."

The following was published in the Richmond (Mo.) Conservator of March 25, 1881:

"Unto all Nations, Kindreds, Tongues and People, unto whom these presents shall come:

"It having been represented by one John Murphy, of Polo, Caldwell County, Missouri, that I, in a conversation with him last summer, denied my testimony as one of the Three Witnesses of the Book of Mormon.

"To the end, therefore, that he may understand me now, if he did not then; and that the world may know the truth, I wish now, standing as it were, in the very sunset of life, and in the fear of God, once for all to make this public statement:

"That I have never at any time denied that testimony or any part thereof, which has so long since been published with that book, as one of the Three Witnesses. Those who know me best well know that I have always adhered to that testimony. And that no man may be misled or doubt my present views in regard to the same, I do again affirm the truth of all my statements as then made and published.

"'He that hath an ear to hear, let him hear;' it was no delusion; what is written is written, and he that readeth let him understand. * * *

"'And if any man doubt, should he not carefully and honestly read and understand the same before presuming to sit in judgment and condemning the light, which shineth in darkness, and showeth the way of eternal life as pointed out by the unerring hand of God?'

"In the Spirit of Christ, who hath said: 'Follow thou me, for I am the life, the light and the way,' I submit this statement to the world; God in whom I trust being my judge as to the sincerity of my motives and the faith and hope that is in me of eternal life.

"My sincere desire is that the world may be benefited by this plain and simple statement of the truth.

"And all the honor to the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, which is one God. Amen! DAVID WHITMER, SEN.

The Conservator made the following editorial comments on the 'notice.'

"Elsewhere we publish a letter from David Whitmer, sen., an old and well known citizen of Ray, as well as an endorsement of his standing as a man, signed by a number of the leading citizens of this community, in reply to some unwarranted aspersions made upon him.

"There is no doubt that Mr. Whitmer, who was one of the Three Witnesses of the authenticity of the gold plates, from which he asserts that Joe Smith translated the Book of Mormon (a fac simile of the characters he now has in his possession with the original records), is firmly convinced of its divine origin, and while he makes no efforts to obtrude his views or belief, he simply wants the world to know that so far as he is concerned there is no 'variableness or shadow of turning.' Having resided here for near a half of a century, it is with no little pride that he points to his past record, with the consciousness that he has done nothing derogatory to his character as a citizen and a believer in the son of Mary to warrant such an attack on him, come from what source it may, and now, with the lilies of seventy-five winters crowning him like an aureole, and his pilgrimage on earth well nigh ended, he reiterates his former statements and will leave futurity to solve the problem that he was but a passing witness of its fulfilment."

Elder Edward Stevenson in a letter dated Feb. 16, 1886, and addressed to Pres. D. H. Wells, writes:

"After my visit to Independence I took a run down to Lexington Junction, 42 miles from Kansas City, and up the Lexington Railroad five miles to Richmond, Ray County, Mo., and called on David Whitmer, desiring to see once more the only surviving witness of the visitation of the angel who commanded him with others to bear record of the truth of the coming forth of the Book of Mormon and this Gospel dispensation of the nineteenth century. Eight years ago I visited him, and 52 years ago I heard him bear his testimony, as also Oliver Cowdery and Martin Harris, when I was only a boy 14 years of age, and I am a witness that each time their testimony has been by the power of God, that thrills through the whole system like a two-edged sword. David Whitmer is now just past 81 years of age, and only by a hair's breadth has escaped from a death bed. He is very feeble, his frame weighing less then one hundred pounds. In this his last testimony he said to me, 'As sure as the sun shines and I live, just so sure did the angel appear unto me and Joseph Smith, and I heard his voice, and did see the angel standing before us, and on a table were the plates, the sword of Laban, and the ball or compass.' Although so weak and feeble, yet he fired up, so that after a time I was necessarily obliged to check him and let him rest, while in turn I talked to him."

MARTIN HARRIS,

Was born May 18, 1783, in Easttown, Saratoga Co., New York, and moved with his father's family in his ninth year to the town of Palmyra, Wayne Co. In the fall of 1827 he made the acquaintance of the Prophet Joseph Smith, who at that time was severely persecuted by his enemies, he having received from the angel Moroni the holy plates, from which the Book of Mormon afterwards was translated. Martin Harris made Joseph a present of fifty dollars, which enabled the latter to remove from Manchester, N. Y., to Pennsylvania.

In February, 1828, Martin Harris visited Joseph Smith at his temporary home in Harmony, Penn. The latter had copied some of the ancient characters from the plates and translated them, which he gave to Martin Harris, who made a visit to New York City and showed the characters with their translation to the celebrated Prof. Anthon, skilled in ancient and modern languages. The learned professor, after examination, spoke favorably of the characters and of the translation and proffered his assistance; but on learning from Mr. Harris that the book was given to Joseph Smith by an angel and that a part of the book was sealed, etc., he sarcastically remarked that 'he could not read a sealed book,' and then demanded back a certificate, which he had given to Mr. Harris, testifying to the correctness of the translation. After getting it back he tore it to pieces. Mr. Harris then went to Dr. Mitchell, another man of learning, who sanctioned what Professor Anthon had said respecting both the characters and the translation.

Martin Harris having returned from his tour to New York City and reported the incidents of his journey to the Prophet, went home to Palmyra, arranged his affairs and returned again to Joseph in Pennsylvania about the 12th of April, 1828. Immediately after his arrival he commenced to write for the Prophet, thus becoming his first scribe. Joseph translated from the plates and Martin Harris wrote after his dictation, which work they continued until the 14th of June following, by which time 116 pages of manuscript were written on foolscap paper. The Prophet writes:

"Some time after Mr. Harris had begun to write for me, he began to teaze me to give him liberty to carry the writings home and show them; and desired of me that I would inquire of the Lord, through the Urim and Thummim, if he might not do so. I did inquire, and the answer was, that he must not. However, he was not satisfied with this answer, and desired that I should inquire again. I did so, and the answer was as before. Still he could not be contented, but insisted that I should inquire once more. After much solicitation I again inquired of the Lord, and permission was granted him to have the writings on certain conditions, which were, that he show them only to his brother Preserved Harris, his own wife, his father and his mother, and a Mrs. Cobb, a sister to his wife. In accordance with this last answer, I required of him that he should bind himself in a covenant to me in the most solemn manner, that he would not do otherwise than he had been directed. He did so. He bound himself as I required of him, took the writings, and went his way.

"Notwithstanding, however, the great restrictions which he had been laid under, and the solemnity of the covenant which he had made with me, he did shew them to others, and by stratagem they got them away from him, and they never have been recovered nor obtained back again unto this day."

For these doings Martin Harris was severely censured and called a "wicked man" in a revelation given through the Prophet shortly afterwards (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 3); and the Lord would not permit Joseph Smith to translate that part of the record again, because of the cunning and evil designs of wicked men. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 10.)

After the Prophet's removal to Fayette in the summer of 1829, Martin Harris again visited him and was permitted to be one of the Three Witnesses. Subsequently he furnished $3,000 towards the expenses of printing the first edition of the book.

He was baptized shortly after the organization of the Church, and in June, 1831, was called by revelation to accompany the Prophet Joseph and other Elders to Missouri. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 52.) He started on this journey on the 19th of June, and when Jackson County, Mo., two months later, was designated by the mouth of the Lord as a gathering place for the Saints--as the land upon which the new Jerusalem should be built, and where a full consecration of all properties should be required and the holy United Order of God established—Martin Harris was the first one called of God by name to set an example before the Church in laying his money before the Bishop. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 58, Verse 35.)

He was a member of the first High Council of the Church, which was organized in Kirtland, Ohio, Feb. 17, 1834, and in 1835 he assisted in electing, ordaining and instructing the twelve Elders, who were called to constitute the first quorum of Twelve Apostles in this dispensation.

As long as the Saints remained in Kirtland, he continued active and assisted in the public labors of the Church, but when the Saints vacated that place and removed to Missouri Martin Harris remained in Ohio. This gave rise to many conjectures that he had apostatized. But notwithstanding his long absence from the head-quarters of the Church, he never faltered nor swerved in the least degree from the great testimony given in the Book of Mormon. It is true that he went to England in 1846, while under the influence of the apostate James J. Strang, ostensibly for the purpose of opposing the Elders laboring there, but he returned to America without doing any harm to anybody, except, perhaps, to himself. (Mill. Star, Vol. 8, pages 124 and 128.)

After residing for many years in Kirtland, Ohio, he finally migrated to Utah, arriving in Salt Lake City Aug. 30, 1870, in care of Elder Edward Stevenson. He located in Smithfield, Cache Co., and later in Clarkston, where he died July 10, 1875, being nearly ninety-three years of age.

A few hours before his death, when prostrated with great weakness, Bishop Simon Smith came into his room; Martin Harris stretched forth his hands to salute him and said, "Bishop, I am going." The Bishop told him that he had something of importance to tell him in relation to the Book of Mormon, which was to be published in the Spanish language, by the request of Indians in Central America. Upon hearing this, Martin Harris brightened up, his pulsation improved, and, although very weak, he began to talk as he formerly had done previous to his sickness. He conversed for about two hours, and it seemed that the mere mention of the Book of Mormon put new life into him.

His son Martin Harris, jun., in a letter addressed to Pres. Geo. A. Smith and dated Clarkston, July 9, 1875, says:

"He (Martin Harris) was taken sick a week ago yesterday, with some kind of a stroke, or life became so weak and exhausted, that he has no use in his limbs. He cannot move, only by our aid. * * * He has continued to talk about and testify to the truth of the Book of Mormon, and was in his happiest mood when he could get somebody to listen to his testimony; if he felt dull and weary at times, and some one would come in and open up a conversation and give him an opportunity of talking, he would immediately revive and feel like a young man for a little while. We begin to think that he has borne his last testimony. The last audible words he has spoken were something about the Three Witnesses of the Book of Mormon, but we could not understand what it was."

At his funeral every respect that could be paid to him was manifested by the people. In dressing him, a Book of Mormon was put in his right hand and the book of Doctrine and Covenants in his left hand. On the head board of his grave was placed his name, date and place of his birth and death, with the words, "One of the witnesses of the Book of Mormon." Also their testimony.

From a letter of Elder Edward Stevenson, dated Salt Lake City, Nov. 30, 1881, and published in the Mill. Star, Vol. 44, page 78, etc., we make the following interesting extracts in relation to Martin Harris:

"While I was living in Michigan, then a Territory, in 1833, near the town of Pontiac, Oakland Co., Martin Harris came there, and in a meeting, where I was present, bore testimony of the appearance of an angel exhibiting the golden plates, and commanding him to bear a testimony of these things to all people whenever opportunity was afforded him to do so; and I can say that his testimony had great effect in that vicinity. Martin had a sister living in our neighborhood. About this tim

Oliver Cowdery, another of the Three Witnesses, also, in company with Joseph Smith, the Prophet, bore the same testimony, and further, Joseph, the Prophet, promised those who with honest hearts obeyed the Gospel should receive the Holy Ghost, and signs would follow them.

"As a proof of their testimony, several of that branch of the Church enjoyed various gifts; one, Elijah Fordham, who recently died in this Territory, spoke in tongues, and as two French travelers were passing they heard him speaking and said to a boy outside the house, where they were, that he was speaking in French, bearing testimony to the Gospel, he having no knowledge of that language. Martin often bore his testimony while in that neighborhood.

"In the year 1869 I was appointed on a mission to the United States. Having visited several of the Eastern States, I called at Kirtland, Ohio, to see the first Temple that was built by our people in this generation. While there, I again met Martin Harris, soon after coming out of the Temple. He took from under his arm a copy of the Book of Mormon, the first edition, I believe, and bore a faithful testimony, just the same as that I heard him bear 36 years previous. He said that it was his duty to continue to lift up his voice as he had been commanded to do in defence of the book that he held in his hand, and offered to prove from the Bible that just such a book was to come forth out of the ground, and that, too, in a day when there were no Prophets on the earth, and that he was daily bearing testimony to many who visited the Temple.

"After patiently hearing him, I felt a degree of compassion for him, and in turn bore my testimony to him, as I had received it through obedience to the Gospel, and that the work was still onward, and the words of Isaiah, second chapter, were being fulfilled, that 'the house of the Lord' was in the tops of the mountains, and that under the leadership of President Young all nations were gathering to Zion to learn of God's ways and to walk in his paths, and that the worst wish that we had, was for him to also prepare himself and go up and be a partaker of the blessings of the House of the Lord. My testimony impressed him. A Mr. Bond, who held the keys of the Temple, and who had been present at the dedication, and then a faithful Latter-day Saint, said to me he felt as though he would have been far better off if he had kept with the Latter-day Saints, and that if I would preach in the Temple, he would open the doors to me. I promised to do so at some future time.

"After my arrival in Utah in 1870, I was inspired to write to Martin Harris, and soon received a reply, that the Spirit of God, for the first time prompted him to go to Utah. Several letters were afterwards exchanged. Pres. Brigham Young, having read the letters, through Pres. Geo. A. Smith requested me to get up a subscription and emigrate Martin to Utah, he subscribing twenty-five dollars for that purpose. Having raised the subscription to about two hundred dollars, I took the railroad cars for Ohio, on the 19th of July, 1870, and on the 10th of August, filled my appointment, preaching twice in the Kirtland Temple, finding Martin Harris elated with his prospective journey.

"A very singular incident occurred at this time. While Martin was visiting his friends, bidding them farewell, his pathway crossed a large pasture, in which he became bewildered. Dizzy, faint and staggering through the blackberry vines that are so abundant in that vicinity, his clothes torn, bloody and faint, he lay down under a tree to die. After a time he revived, called on the Lord, and finally at 12 o'clock midnight found his friend, and in his fearful condition was cared for and soon regained his strength. He related this incident as a snare of the adversary to hinder him from going to Salt Lake City. Although in his 88th year he possessed remarkable vigor and health, having recently worked in the garden, and dug potatoes by the day for some of his neighbors.

"After visiting New York and calling to visit the sacred spot from where the plates of the Book of Mormon were taken, I found there an aged gentleman, 74 years old, who knew Martin Harris, and said that he was known in that neighborhood as an honest farmer, having owned a good farm three miles from that place. He farther said he well remembered the time when the Mormons used to gather at Mormon Hill, as he termed it, where it was said the plates came from.

"Aug. 19, 1870, in company with Martin Harris, I left Kirtland for Utah, and on the 21st he was with me in Chicago, and at the American Hotel bore testimony to a large number of people, of the visitation of the angel, etc. * * *

"While in Des Moines, the capitol of Iowa, Brother Harris had opportunity of bearing testimony to many, and at a special meeting held in a branch of our Church (Brother Jas. M. Ballinger, President) Martin Harris bore testimony as to viewing the plates, the angel's visit, and visiting Professor Anthon.

"On the following day I baptized a sister to Pres. Ballinger, in the Des Moines River. The branch here contributed a new suit of clothes to Brother Harris, for which he felt to bless them. On the 29th of August we arrived in Ogden, and the following day in Salt Lake City. Two members of the Des Moines branch of the Church accompanied us to Utah."

On Sunday, Sept. 4, 1870, Martin Harris addressed a congregation of Saints in Salt Lake City. He related an incident which occurred during the time that he wrote that portion of the translation of the Book of Mormon which he was favored to write direct from the mouth of the Prophet Joseph Smith, and said that the Prophet possessed a seer stone, by which he was enabled to translate as well as from the Urim and Thummim, and for convenience he then used the seer stone. Martin explained the translation as follows: By aid of the seer stone, sentences would appear and were read by the Prophet and written by Martin, and when finished he would say, "Written," and if correctly written, that sentence would disappear and another appear in its place; but if not written correctly it remained until corrected, so that the translation was just as it was engraven on the plates, precisely in the language then used. Martin said that after continued translation they would become weary, and would go down to the river and exercise by throwing stones out on the river, etc. While so doing, on one occasion, Martin Harris found a stone very much resembling the one used for translating, and on resuming their labor of translation, he put in place the stone that he had found. He said that the Prophet remained silent, unusually and intently gazing in darkness, no traces of the usual sentences appearing. Much surprised, Joseph exclamed, "Martin! What is the matter! All is as dark as Egypt!" Martin's countenance betrayed him, and the Prophet asked Martin why he had done so. Martin said, to stop the mouths of fools, who had told him that the Prophet had learned those sentences and was merely repeating them, etc.

Martin said further that the seer stones differed in appearance entirely from the Urim and Thummim obtained with the plates, which were two clear stones set in two rims, very much resembling spectacles, only they were larger. Martin said, there were not many pages translated while he wrote, after which Oliver Cowdery and others did the writing.

In an article written by Elder Edward Stevenson and published in the Mill. Star, Vol. 48, pages 367 and 389, the following additional particulars are given:

"Many interesting incidents were related by Martin on our journey (from Ohio to Utah in 1870), one of which I (Stevenson) will relate. He said that on one occasion several of his old acquaintances made an effort to get him tipsy by treating him to some wine. When they thought he was in a good mood for talk, they put the following question very carefully to him: 'Well, now, Martin, we want you to be frank and candid with us in regard to this story of your seeing an angel and the golden plates of the Book of Mormon that is so much talked about. We have always taken you to be an honest, good farmer and neighbor of ours, but could not believe that you ever did see an angel. Now, Martin, do you really believe that you did see an angel when you were awake?' 'No,' said Martin, 'I do not believe it.' The anticipation of the delighted crowd at this exclamation may be imagined. But soon a different feeling prevailed, when Martin Harris, true to his trust, said, 'Gentlemen, what I have said is true, from the fact that my belief is swallowed up in knowledge; for I want to say to you that as the Lord lives I do know that I stood with the Prophet Joseph Smith in the presence of the angel, and it was in the brightness of day.' Martin Harris related this circumstance to me substantially as I give it, adding that, although he drank wine with them as friends, he always believed in temperance and sobriety.

"While on our journey, and more particularly at the Des Moines River, at the baptism of the woman spoken of, I took occasion to teach Brother Martin the necessity of his being rebaptized. At first he did not seem to agree with the idea, but I referred him to the scriptural words, 'Repent and do the first works,' having lost the first love, etc. (Rev., 2, 5.) Finally, he said if it was right, the Lord would manifest it to him by His spirit, and He did do so, for Martin, soon after his arrival in Salt Lake City, came to my house and said the spirit of the Lord had made it manifest to him, not only for himself personally, but also that he should be baptized for his dead, for he had seen his father seeking his aid. He saw his father at the foot of a ladder, striving to get up to him, and he went down to him taking him by the hand and helped him up. The baptismal font was prepared, and by arrangement I led Martin Harris down into the water and rebaptized him. Five of the Apostles were present, viz., John Taylor, Wilford Woodruff, Orson Pratt, Geo. A. Smith and Joseph F. Smith; also J. D. T. McAllister and others. After baptism, Orson Pratt confirmed him, being joined with the rest of the brethren, by the laying on of hands; after which he was baptized for some of his dead friends, and to add to the interest of the occasion, Martin's sister also was baptized for their female friends. * * * I wish to add that Brother Harris having been away from the Church so many years did not understand more than the first principles taught in the infantile days of the Church, which accounts for his not being posted in the doctrine of the Gospel being preached to the spirits who are departed, which was afterwards taught by Joseph Smith, the Prophet. * * *

"The economy of Martin Harris was particularly illustrated on the occasion of our visit to the Fifteenth Ward of Salt Lake City. The meeting was crowded, as usual, with those anxious to see him and to hear his constant, undeviating testimony. Sister S. M. Kimball, of the Fifteenth Ward, eminent in the Relief Societies, on their behalf offered to have a new set of artificial teeth made for Brother Harris, to which he replied, 'No, sisters, I thank you for your kindness, but I shall not live long. Take the money and give it to the poor.' This calls to my mind a little incident or two that he related to me while we were on our journey from Ohio to Utah. He said that Joseph Smith, the Prophet, was very poor, and had to work by the day for his support, and he (Harris) often gave him work on his farm, and that they had hoed corn together many a day, Brother Harris paying him fifty cents per day. Joseph, he said, was good to work and jovial and they often wrestled together in sport, but the Prophet was devoted and attentive to his prayers.

"Brother Martin Harris gave Jo-Joseph $50 on one occasion to help translate the Book of Mormon. This action on the part of Martin Harris, so displeased his wife that she threatened to leave him. Martin said that he knew this to be the work of God, and that he should keep the commandments of the Lord, whatever the results might be. His wife, subsequently, partially separated from him, which he patiently endured for the Gospel's sake. * * *

"At an evening visit of some of my friends at my residence in Salt Lake City, to see and hear Brother Harris relate his experience (which always delighted him), Brother James T. Woods, who is now present while I am writing this article, reminds me that himself and G. D. Keaton were present on that occasion, and asked him to explain the manner in which the plates, containing the characters of the Book of Mormon, were exhibited to the witnesses. Brother Harris said that the angel stood on the opposite side of the table on which were the plates, the interpreters, etc., and took the plates in his hand and turned them over. To more fully illustrate this to them, Brother Martin took up a book and turned the leaves over one by one. The angel declared that the Book of Mormon was correctly translated by the power of God and not of man, and that it contained the fullness of the Gospel of Jesus Christ to the Nephites, who were a branch of the lost sheep of the House of Israel, and had come from the land of Jerusalem to America. The witnesses were required to bear their testimony of these things, and of this open vision to all people, and he (Harris) testified, not only to those present, but to all the world, that these things were true, and before God whom he expected to meet in the day of Judgment he lied not. Brother Woods testifies that he was present at the time above mentioned, and to him it was marvelous to see the zeal that was manifested by Martin Harris, and the spirit of the Lord that accompanied his words.

"That Martin Harris was very zealous, somewhat enthusiastic, and what some would term egotistical, is no doubt the case; but the Lord has shown this generation that He can carry on His work independently of all men, only as they live closely and humbly before Him. I will give one or two instances of Martin's enthusiasm. When President Geo. A. Smith and others of us were being driven by John Henry Smith in a carriage to take a bath in the Warm Springs, near Salt Lake City, while passing over a high hill President Smith directed the curtains of the carriage to be raised, giving a magnificent view of the city below. The immense Tabernacle and the Temple—and in fact the beautiful city in full view—looked wonderful to Brother Harris, who seemed wrapped in admiration and exclaimed, 'Who would have thought that the Book of Mormon would have done all this?' On one occasion, while celebrating a baptism, several persons being in attendance, Brother Harris with joyful feelings said, 'Just see how the Book of Mormon is spreading.' Having been absent so long from the body of the Church and considering his great age, much charity was necessarily exercised in his behalf.

His abiding testimony, and his assistance with his property to publish the Book of Mormon, have earned a name for him that will endure while time shall last. Soon after he had received his endowments and performed some work for his dead, he retired to live with his son, Martin Harris, jun., at Smithfield, Cache Valley, where he was comfortably cared for in his declining old age. On the afternoon of his death he was bolstered up in his bed, where, with the Book of Mormon in his hand he bore his last testimony to those who were present."

PLURAL MARRIAGE.

As a number of apostates and other opponents of the truth are continually attempting to deny certain facts connected with the introduction of plural marriage among the Latter-day Saints by Joseph Smith, the Prophet, it has been deemed proper, in connection with our other historical labors, to compile and republish in the RECORD the following statements, testimonies, affidavits, etc., from truthful and reliable parties, who have been eye and ear witnesses to the circumstances and incidents of which they speak; and also to add new proofs and testimonies to those already made public. By way of introducing the subject we quote the following from a communication written by Pres. Jos. F. Smith and published in the Deseret News of May 20, 1886:

"The great and glorious principle of plural marriage was first revealed to Joseph Smith in 1831, but being forbidden to make it public, or to teach it as a doctrine of the Gospel, at that time, he confided the facts to only a very few of his intimate associates. Among them were Oliver Cowdery and Lyman E. Johnson, the latter confiding the fact to his traveling companion, Elder Orson Pratt, in the year 1832. (See Orson Pratt's testimony.) And this great principle remained concealed in the bosom of the Prophet Joseph Smith and the few to whom he revealed it, until he was commanded, about 1842, to instruct the leading members of the Priesthood, and those who were most faithful and intelligent, and best prepared to receive it, in relation thereto, at which time, and subsequently until his martyrdom, the subject, in connection with the great principles of baptism, redemption and sealings for the dead, became the great themes of his life, and, as the late Pres. Geo. A. Smith repeatedly said to me and others, 'The Prophet seemed irresistibly moved by the power of God to establish that principle, not only in theory, in the hearts and minds of his brethren, but in practice also!' he himself having led the way. While this doctrine was thus being taught by the Prophet to those whom he could trust—those who had faith, righteousness and integrity, to believe and accept it, with all its consequences (which are no trifling things), it remained an 'unwritten law' and commandment of the Almighty to the faithful only of His Saints, designed to be enlarged as intelligence and fidelity to the laws of God increased, until the 12th day of July, 1843, when a portion of the revelation was written in the manner, and (at that time) for the purpose set forth in the statement of Elder Clayton, now submitted to the world, and as indicated in the revelation itself, as follows: 'And now, as pertaining to this law, verily, verily I say unto you, I will reveal more unto you hereafter, therefore let this suffice for the present.' (Verse 66.)

"Let all the Latter-day Saints know that Joseph Smith, the martyred Prophet, is responsible to God and the world for this doctrine, and let every soul know that he and his brother Hyrum did practice the doctrine in their lifetime, and until their death, notwithstanding their seeming denials as published in the Times and Seasons, and which are so fervently relied upon as evidence against the fact by a certain class of anti-polygamists. Those denials can be explained, and have been, and while they are true in the sense, and for the purpose for which they were designed, they are not denials of plural or celestial marriage as taught by Joseph and Hyrum Smith and practiced at the time by both of them, and many others in prominent standing in the Church. These seeming denials themselves are specific proofs of the existence of the true coin, the counterfeit of which they denounced.

"Let every Saint know by unimpeachable testimony, as well as by the spirit of inspiration, to which each Saint is entitled, that God Almighty revealed this doctrine to Joseph the martyr, and that under God he was and is the founder, by precept and example, of the same in the Church.

"Praying God to bless this testimony to the comforting of the Saints and the confusion of their enemies, I have the heartfelt pleasure to remain eternally yours for the truth, 'if it wake the dead.'

JOSEPH F. SMITH."

Emma Bidamon, widow of Joseph Smith, the Prophet, died in Nauvoo, Ill., April 30, 1879. Shortly afterwards an article was published in the Saints' Advocate, a monthly periodical published by the reorganized Church, at Plano, Ill., under the heading "Last Testimony of Sister Emma," in which that lady is made responsible for a statement to the effect that Joseph Smith, the Prophet, never in his lifetime taught nor practiced the principle of plural marriage. This statement, given in the shape of a dialogue or colloquy, which was said to have taken place between Emma Bidamon and her son (Joseph), brought forth the following from the pen of Apostle Joseph F. Smith:

"SALT LAKE CITY, Oct. 17, 1879.

"Editor Deseret News:

"Dear Sir.—While I am aware of your disinclination to publish the many foolish fabrications of backsliders from the faith, and your general reticence on this subject, yet some statements contained in a paper lately forwarded me, being of no ordinary kind, demand the publication of certain facts which I have in my possession, which must be my apology for presenting this matter.

"No one can regret more than myself the necessity of presenting to the numerous readers of the News, certain facts relative to Joseph Smith (the Prophet) in connection with the revelation on celestial or plural marriage and the inauguration of that doctrine in the Church; and were it not for the cause of truth in which I and my children and the Church are deeply interested, and in which the whole world should feel vitally concerned, I would seek to avoid this unpleasant task.

"In reply to the foregoing, I will give you the sworn statements and affidavits of a few reliable persons—among whom are two of the wives of the Prophet Joseph Smith, which I think, will assert quite as strong claims for belief and present a much better appearance of veracity than the published dialogue between Joseph Smith and his mother, for this reason, if no other, these people, well known to this community, are mostly still living and can be cross-examined, while 'Sister Emma,' whose lips are sealed in death, is represented as denying facts which, it can be abundantly proven, were well known to her, and to many now living in these mountains, besides those whose affidavits and statements accompany this communication. It is but fair to note that these affidavits were given many years ago, in view of the denials then being made by the representatives of that faction known as the 'Reorganized Church,' and before 'Sister Emma,' it is hoped, ever dreamed of denying facts which no one knew better than she did herself, and as I have good reason to believe, from admissions made to me by Alexander H. Smith, in 1866, and subsequently by Joseph Smith himself, before even Joseph could muster the courage or dared to venture upon the hazardous and untenable ground his mother, now she is dead, is made to assume; which ground, if her memory of facts had failed, she should have assumed, herself, years ago. But to the proof.

"JOSEPH BATES NOBLE'S TESTIMONY.

"Territory of Utah, } ss.
County of Salt Lake. }

"Be it remembered, that on this twenty-sixth day of June, A. D. 1869, personally appeared before me, James Jack, a notary public in and for said county, Joseph Bates Noble, who was by me sworn in due form of law, and upon his oath saith, that in the fall of 1840, Joseph Smith taught him the principle of celestial or plural marriage, or a plurality of wives; and that the said Joseph Smith declared that he had received a revelation from God on the subject, and that the angel of the Lord had commanded him (Joseph Smith) to move forward in the said order of marriage; and further, that the said Joseph Smith requested him (Joseph B. Noble) to step forward and assist him in carrying out the said principle, saying, 'In revealing this to you, I have placed my life in your hands, therefore do not in an evil hour betray me to my enemies.'

"Subscribed and sworn to by the said Joseph B. Noble, the day and year first above written.

JOSEPH B. NOBLE.

[SEAL.] JAMES JACK,
Notary Public."

"Elder Noble is still living at Bountiful, Davis County, Utah, and can be examined again on this and other points connected with this subject, with which he is familiar. I will here further state that Elder Joseph B. Noble swears (the affidavit I have on hand) before a notary public, on June 6, 1869, that he did on April 5, 1841, seal to Joseph Smith, the Prophet, Miss Louisa Beaman, according to the revelation on plural marriage."

"BENJAMIN F. JOHNSON'S TESTIMONY.

"The following affidavit was sworn to before James Jack, a notary public, in Salt Lake City, March 4, 1870:

"On the first day of April, A. D. 1843, President Joseph Smith, Orson Hyde and William Clayton, and others, came from Nauvoo to my residence in Macedonia or Ramus, in Hancock County, Ill., and were joyfully welcomed by myself and family as our guests.

"On the following morning, Pres. Smith took me by the arm for a walk, leading the way to a secluded spot within an adjacent grove, where, to my great surprise, he commenced to open up to me the principle of plural or celestial marriage; but I was more astonished by his asking me for my sister Almera to be his wife. I sincerely believed him to be a Prophet of God, and I loved him as such and also for the many evidences of his kindness to me, yet such was the force of my education, and the scorn that I felt towards anything unvirtuous, that under the first impulse of my feelings, I looked him calmly, but firmly in the face and told him that 'I had always believed him to be a good man and wished to believe it still and would try to; and that I would take for him a message to my sister, and if the doctrine was true, all would be well, but if I should afterwards learn that it was offered to insult or prostitute my sister, I would take his life.' With a smile he replied, 'Benjamin, you will never see that day, but you shall live to know that it is true and rejoice in it.'

"He wished me to see my sister and talk to her. I told him I did not know what I could say to convince her. He replied, 'When you open your mouth you shall be able to comprehend, and you shall not want for evidence nor words.' He also told me that he would preach a sermon that day for me which I would understand, while the rest of the congregation would not comprehend his meaning. His subject was the ten talents, 'unto him that hath shall be given, and he shall have abundantly, but from him that hath not (or will not receive), shall be taken away that which he hath (or might have had).' Plainly giving me to understand that the talents represented wives and children, as the principle of enlargement throughout the great future to those who were heirs of salvation.

"I called my sister to private audience, and with fear and trembling and feelings I cannot express, commenced to open the subject to her, when, just as he had promised, the light of the Lord shone upon my understanding and my tongue was loosed, and I, at least, was convinced of the truth of what I was attempting to teach.

"My sister received my testimony, and in a short time afterwards consented to become the wife of President Smith.

"Subsequent to this I took her to the city of Nauvoo, where she was married, or sealed for time and eternity, to President Joseph Smith, by his brother Hyrum Smith, in the presence of myself and Louisa Beaman, who told me she had also been sealed or married to the Prophet Joseph. This was at the residence of my sister, the widow of Lyman R. Sherman, who also was a witness.

"After a short period, President Smith and company, viz., George Miller, Wm. Clayton, J. M. Smith, and Eliza and Emily Partridge (who were the wives of the Prophet) came again to Macedonia (Ramus), where he remained two days, lodging at my house with my sister as man and wife (and to my certain knowledge he occupied the same bed with her). This visit was on the 16th and 17th of May, 1843, returning to Nauvoo on the 18th.

"Again, on the 19th of October, the same year, President Smith made us another visit at Macedonia and remained till the 21st. He was accompanied by Wm. Clayton. At this time (Oct. 20th, 1843), he sealed my first wife to me for time and all eternity. * * *

"He also visited my mother at her residence in Macedonio and taught her in my hearing the doctrine of celestial marriage, declaring that an angel appeared unto him with a drawn sword, threatening to slay him if he did not proceed to fulfill the law that had been given to him. And counseled my mother to be sealed to his uncle, Father John Smith (father of Geo. A. Smith), to which she consented, and to my certain knowledge was subsequently sealed to him by the Prophet. * *

"After the death of the Prophet, I told President Brigham Young what he (Joseph Smith) had said to me relative to my taking Mary Ann Hale to wife. Pres. Young said it was right and authorized Father John Smith to seal her to me, which he did on the 14th of November, 1844.

"APOSTLE LORENZO SNOW'S TESTIMONY.

"The following affidavit was made before J. C. Wright, clerk of Box Elder County, Utah, Aug. 28, 1869:

"In the month of April, 1843, I returned from my European mission. A few days after my arrival at Nauvoo, when at President Joseph Smith's house, he said he wished to have some private talk with me, and requested me to walk out with him. It was toward evening, we walked a little distance and sat down on a large log that lay near the bank of the river; he there and then explained to me the doctrine of plurality of wives.

"He said that the Lord had revealed it unto him and commanded him to have women sealed to him as wives, that he foresaw the trouble that would follow and sought to turn away from the commandment, that an angel from heaven appeared before him with a drawn sword, threatening him with destruction unless he went forward and obeyed the commandment.

"He further said that my sister Eliza R. Snow had been sealed to him as his wife for time and eternity.

"He told me that the Lord would open the way, and I should have women sealed to me as wives. This conversation was prolonged, I think, one hour or more, in which he told me many important things.

"I solemnly declare before God and holy angels, and as I hope to come forth in the morning of the resurrection, that the above statement is true.

"Be it remembered that on this twenty-eighth day of August, A. D. 1869, personally appeared before me, James Jack, a notary public in and for said county, John Benbow, who was by me sworn in due form of law, and upon his oath said that in the spring or forepart of the summer of 1843, at his house, four miles from Nauvoo, County of Hancock, State of Illinois, President Joseph Smith taught him and his wife, Jane Benbow, the doctrine of celestial marriage, or plurality of wives, Hyrum Smith being present.

"And further, that Hannah Ells Smith, a wife of the Prophet, boarded at his house two months during the summer of the same

"I might continue to multiply those statements and testimonies both of the living and the dead until your paper could not contain them, but the foregoing is sufficient to prove that Joseph Smith did teach the doctrine of plural marriage several years before his death, and not only so, but that he did also practice what he taught. Further, the fact is established that Joseph Smith received the revelation on celestial or plural marriage, and the eternity of the marriage covenant, prior to July 12th, 1843, the time when a portion of said revelation was written. * * *

I was married to him on the 11th of May, 1843, by Elder James Adams. Emma was present. She gave her free and full consent. She had always, up to this time, been very kind to me and my sister Eliza, who was also married to the Prophet Joseph with Emma's consent. Emma, about this time, gave her husband two other wives—Maria and Sarah Lawrence.")

"One more statement will suffice for the present, although, if necessary, many more sworn statements of reliable individuals could be furnished upon the subject, besides the testimonies of scores of living witnesses in absolute denial of the alleged 'last testimony of Sister Emma.'

"LOVINA WALKER'S CERTIFICATE.

"I Lovina Walker (eldest daughter of Hyrum Smith), hereby certify, that while I was living with Aunt Emma Smith, in Fulton City, Fulton County, Illinois, in the year 1846, she told me that she, Emma Smith, was present and witnessed the marrying or sealing of Eliza Partridge, Emily Partridge, Maria Lawrence and Sarah Lawrence to her husband, Joseph Smith, and that she gave her consent thereto.

"Again, the foregoing is but a small part of the testimony that can be brought forward in relation to Sister Emma's knowledge of this principle. But is not this sufficient to convince any honest inquirer that the alleged 'Last testimony of Sister Emma,' is incorrect? That Joseph did, not only teach, but practice this doctrine, and that too, with the full knowledge and consent of his first wife, Emma Smith. Indeed, if there is anything wanting to establish this fact, the ladies (except Lovina Walker, who is now dead) whose testimonies are given above are still living, one in this city and the others in Fillmore, Millard Co., Utah, and can testify that Emma Smith (late Emma Bidamon) did herself teach them the principle, and with her own hand gave them to wife to her husband. Respectfully,

JOSEPH F. SMITH."

ELIZA R. SNOW'S TESTIMONY.

The following was also published in the Deseret News (weekly) of Oct. 22, 1879:

"Recently, to my great astonishment, I read an article headed 'Last Testimony of Sister Emma,' published in the Saints' Advocate, a pamphlet issued in Plano, Ill.

"In the article referred to, her son Joseph reports himself as interviewing his mother on the subject of polygamy, asking questions concerning his father. Did his father teach the principle? Did he practice or approve of it? Did his father have other wives than herself? To all of these and similar inquiries, Sister Emma is represented as answering in the negative, positively affirming that Joseph, the Prophet, had no other wife or wives than her; that he neither taught the principle of plurality of wives, publicly or privately.

"I once dearly loved 'Sister Emma,' and now, for me to believe that she, a once highly honored woman, should have sunk so low, even in her own estimation, as to deny what she knew to be true, seems a palpable absurdity. If what purports to be her 'last testimony' was really her testimony, she died with a libel on her lips—a libel against her husband—against his wives—against the truth, and a libel against God; and in publishing that libel, her son has fastened a stigma on the character of his mother, that can never be erased. It is a fact that Sister Emma, of her own free will and choice, gave her husband four wives, two of whom are now living, and ready to testify that she, not only gave them to her husband, but that she taught them the doctrine of plural marriage and urged them to accept it. And, if her son wished to degrade his mother in the estimation of her former associates, those familiar with the incidents of the period referred to, he could not do it more effectually than by proving her denial of any knowledge of polygamy (celestial marriage), and its practice by her husband. Even if her son ignored his mother's reputation for veracity, he better had waited until his father's wives were silent in death, for now they are here living witnesses of the divinity of plural marriage, as revealed by the Almighty, through Joseph Smith, who was commanded to introduce it by taking other wives.

"So far as Sister Emma personally is concerned, I would gladly have been silent and let her memory rest in peace, had not her misguided son, through a sinister policy, branded her name with gross wickedness—charging her with the denial of a sacred principle which she had heretofore not only acknowledged but had acted upon—a principle than which there is none more important comprised in the Gospel of the Son of God.

"It may be asked, Why defend plurality of wives, since the United States government forbids its practice? The action of the executors of this government can neither change nor annihilate a fundamental truth; and this nation, in preventing the practice of plural marriage, shoulders a heavier responsibility than any nation has ever assumed, with one exception—that of the ancient Jews. If the government can afford it, we can. The controversy is with God—not us. ELIZA R. SNOW.

A wife of Joseph Smith, the Prophet.

WILLIAM CLAYTON'S TESTIMONY.

The following statement was sworn to before John T. Caine, a notary public, in Salt Lake City, Feb. 16, 1874:

"Inasmuch as it may be interesting to future generations of the members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints to learn something of the first teachings of the principle of plural marriage by President Joseph Smith, the Prophet, Seer, Revelator and Translator of said Church, I will give a short relation of facts which occurred within my personal knowledge, and also matters related to me by President Joseph Smith.

"I was employed as a clerk in President Joseph Smith's office, under Elder Willard Richards, and commenced to labor in the office on the 10th day of February, 1842. I continued to labor with Elder Richards until he went east to fetch his wife to Nauvoo.

"After Elder Richards started east I was necessarily thrown constantly into the company of President Smith, having to attend to his public and private business, receiving and recording tithings and donations, attending to land and other matters of business. During this period I necessarily became well acquainted with Emma Smith, the wife of the Prophet Joseph, and also with the children—Julia M. (an adopted daughter), Joseph, Frederick and Alexander, very much of the business being transacted at the residence of the Prophet.

"On the 7th of October, 1842, in the presence of Bishop Newel K. Whitney and his wife Elizabeth Ann, President Joseph Smith appointed me Temple Recorder, and also his private clerk, placing all records, books, papers, etc., in my care, and requiring me to take charge of and preserve them, his closing words being, 'When I have any revelations to write, you are the one to write them.'

"During this period the Prophet Joseph frequently visited my house in my company, and became well acquainted with my wife Ruth, to whom I had been married five years. One day in the month of February, 1843, date not remembered, the Prophet invited me to walk with him. During our walk, he said he had learned that there was a sister back in England, to whom I was very much attached. I replied there was, but nothing further than an attachment such as a brother and sister in the Church might rightfully entertain for each other. He then said, 'Why don't you send for her?' I replied, 'In the first place, I have no authority to send for her, and if I had, I have not the means to pay expenses.' To this he answered, 'I give you authority to send for her, and I will furnish you with means,' which he did. This was the first time the Prophet Joseph talked with me on the subject of plural marriage. He informed me that the doctrine and principle was right in the sight of our Heavenly Father, and hat it was a doctrine which pertained to celestial order and glory. After giving me lengthy instructions and informations concerning the doctrine of celestial or plural marriage, he concluded his remarks by the words, 'It is your privilege to have all the wives you want.' After this introduction, our conversations on the subject of plural marriage were very frequent, and he appeared to take particular pains to inform and instruct me in respect to the principle. He also informed me that he had other wives living besides his first wife Emma, and in particular gave me to understand that Eliza R. Snow, Louisa Beman, Desdemona W. Fullmer and others were his lawful wives in the sight of Heaven.

"On the 27th of April, 1843, the Prophet Joseph Smith married to me Margaret Moon, for time and eternity, at the residence of Elder Heber C. Kimball: and on the 22nd of July, 1843, he married to me, according to the order of the Church, my first wife Ruth.

"On the 1st day of May, 1843, I officiated in the office of an Elder by marrying Lucy Walker to the Prophet Joseph Smith, at his own residence.

"During this period the Prophet Joseph took several other wives. Amongst the number I well remember Eliza Partridge, Emily Partridge, Sarah Ann Whitney, Helen Kimball and Flora Woodworth. These all, he acknowledged to me, were his lawful, wedded wives, according to the celestial order. His wife Emma was cognizant of the fact of some, if not all, of these being his wives, and she generally treated them very kindly.

"On the morning of the 12th of July, 1843, Joseph and Hyrum Smith came into the office in the upper story of the 'brick store,' on the bank of the Mississippi River. They were talking on the subject of plural marriage. Hyrum said to Joseph, 'If you will write the revelation on celestial marriage, I will take and read it to Emma, and I believe I can convince her of its truth, and you will hereafter have peace.' Joseph smiled and remarked, 'You do not know Emma as well as I do.' Hyrum repeated his opinion and further remarked, 'The doctrine is so plain, I can convince any reasonable man or woman of its truth, purity or heavenly origin,' or words to their effect. Joseph then said, 'Well, I will write the revelation and we will see.' He then requested me to get paper and prepare to write. Hyrum very urgently requested Joseph to write the revelation by means of the Urim and Thummim, but Joseph, in reply, said he did not need to, for he knew the revelation perfectly from beginning to end.

"Joseph and Hyrum then sat down and Joseph commenced to dictate the revelation on celestial marriage, and I wrote it, sentence by sentence, as he dictated. After the whole was written, Joseph asked me to read it through, slowly and carefully, which I did, and he pronounced it correct. He then remarked that there was much more that he could write, on the same subject, but what was writen was sufficient for the present.

"Hyrum then took the revelation to read to Emma. Joseph remained with me in the office until Hyrum returned. When he came back, Joseph asked him how he had succeeded. Hyrum replied that he had never received a more severe talking to in his life, that Emma was very bitter and full of resentment and anger.

"Joseph quietly remarked, 'I told you you did not know Emma as well as I did' Joseph then put the revelation in his pocket, and they both left the office.

"The revelation was read to several of the authorities during the day. Towards evening Bishop Newel K. Whitney asked Joseph If he had any objections to his taking a copy of the revelation; Joseph replied that he had not, and handed it to him. It was carefully copied the following day by Joseph C. Kingsbury. Two or three days after the revelation was written Joseph related to me and several others that Emma had so teased, and urgently entreated him for the privilege of destroying it, that he became so weary of her teasing, and to get rid of her annoyance, he told her she might destroy it and she had done so, but he had consented to her wish in this matter to pacify her, realizing that he knew the revelation perfectly, and could rewrite it at any time if necessary.

"The copy made by Joseph C. Kingsbury is a true and correct copy of the original in every respect. The copy was carefully preserved by Bishop Whitney, and but few knew of its existence until the temporary location of the Camps of Israel at Winter Quarters, on the Missouri River, in 1846.

"After the revelation on celestial marriage was written Joseph continued his instructions, privately, on the doctrine, to myself and others, and during the last year of his life we were scarcely ever together, alone, but he was talking on the subject, and explaining that doctrine and principles connected with it. He appeared to enjoy great liberty and freedom in his teachings, and also to find great relief in having a few to whom he could unbosom his feelings on that great and glorious subject.

"From him I learned that the doctrine of plural and celestial marriage is the most holy and important doctrine ever revealed to man on the earth, and that without obedience to that principle no man can ever attain to the fulness of exaltation in celestial glory.

JOSEPH C. KINGSBURY'S TESTIMONY.

The following statement was given under oath before Charles W. Stayner, a notary public, in Salt Lake City, May 22, 1886:

"In reference to the affidavit of Elder William Clayton, on the subject of the celestial order of patriarchal marriage, published in the Deseret Evening News of May 20th, 1886, and particularly to the statement made therein concerning myself, as having copied the original revelation written by Brother Clayton at the dictation of the Prophet Joseph, I will say that Bishop Newel K. Whitney handed me the revelation above referred to on either the day it was written or the day following, and stating that it was asked me to take a copy of it. I did so, and then read my copy of it to Bishop Whitney, who compared it with the original which he held in his hand while I read to him. When I had finished reading, Bishop Whitney pronounced the copy correct, and Hyrum Smith coming into the room at the time to fetch the original, Bishop Whitney handed it to him. I will also state that this copy, as also the original, are identically the same as that published in the present edition of the Book of Doctrine and Covenants.

"I will add that I also knew that the Prophet Joseph Smith had married other women besides his first wife—Emma: I was well aware of the fact of his having married Sarah Ann Whitney, the eldest daughter of Bishop Newel K. Whitney and Elizabeth Ann Whitney, his wife. And the Prophet Joseph told me personally that he had married other women, in accordance with the revealed will of God, and spoke concerning the principle as being a command of God for holy purposes.

THOMAS GROVER'S TESTIMONY.

"FARMINGTON, Davis Co., Utah,
Jan. 10, 1885.

"A. M. Musser:

"Your note is before me, and I answer with pleasure.

"Now, concerning the matter about which you ask information. I don't know of any member of that High Council living except myself. Leonard Soby may still be living.

He apostatized on the strength of that revelation.

"The High Council of Nauvoo was called together by the Prophet Joseph Smith, to know whether they would accept the revelation on celestial marriage or not.

"The Presidency of the Stake, Wm. Marks, Father Cowles and the late Apostle Charles C. Rich were there present. The following are the names of the High Council that were present, in their order, viz: Samuel Bent, William Huntington, Alpheus Cutler, Thos. Grover, Lewis D. Wilson, David Fullmer, Aaron Johnson, Newel Knight, Leonard Soby, James Allred, Henry G. Sherwood and, I think, Samuel H. Smith.

"Brother Hyrum was called upon to read the revelation. He did so, and after the reading said, 'Now, you that believe this revelation and go forth and obey the same shall be saved, and you that reject it shall be damned.'

"We saw this prediction verified in less than one week. Of the Presidency of the Stake, Wm. Marks and Father Cowles rejected the revelation; of the Council that were present Leonard Soby rejected it. From that time forward there was a very strong division in the High Council. These three men greatly diminished in spirit day after day, so that there was a great difference in the line of their conduct, which was perceivable to every member that kept the faith.

"From that time forward we often received instructions from the Prophet as to what was the will of the Lord and how to proceed.

"After this the Prophet's life was constantly in danger. Being one of his life guard, I watched his interests and safety up to the time of his death.

"Wm. Marks died in Illinois. C. C. Rich died in Paris, Bear Lake County, Idaho, in full faith. Samuel Bent died in Garden Grove, Iowa, in full faith. Wm. Huntington died in Pisgah, Iowa, in full faith. Alpheus Cutler apostatized, and died in Iowa. Lewis D. Wilson died at Ogden, in full faith. David Fullmer died in Salt Lake City, in full faith. Aaron Johnson died at Springville, in full faith. Newel Knight died at Ponca, Nebraska. Leonard Soby went with Sidney Rigdon from Nauvoo. James Allred died in Sanpete, in full faith. Henry G. Sherwood came here with the Pioneers and died in San Bernardino, Cal., out of the Church, I understand. Samuel H. Smith died at Nauvoo, in full faith.

"Territory of Utah, } ss.

"Be it remembered that on this fifteenth day of June, A. D. 1869, personally appeared before me, James Jack, a notary public in and for said county, David Fullmer, who was by me sworn in due form of law, and upon his oath saith, that on or about the twelfth day of Aug., A. D. 1843, while in meeting with the High Council (he being a member thereof), in Hyrum Smith's brick office, in the city of Nauvoo, County of Hancock, State of Illinois, Dunbar Wilson made enquiry in relation to the subject of a plurality of wives, as there were rumors about respecting it, and he was satisfied there was something in those remarks, and he wanted to know what it was, upon which Hyrum Smith stepped across the road to his residence, and soon returned bringing with him a copy of the revelation on celestial marriage, given to Joseph Smith, July 12th, A. D. 1843, and read the same to the High Council, and bore testimony to its truth. The said David Fullmer further saith that, to the best of his memory and belief, the following named persons were present: Wm. Marks, Austin A. Cowles, Samuel Bent, Geo. W. Harris, Dunbar Wilson, Wm. Huntington, Levi Jackman, Aaron Johnson, Thos. Grover, David Fullmer, Phinehas Richards, James Allred and Leonard Soby. And the said David Fullmer further saith that Wm. Marks, Austin A. Cowles and Leonard Soby were the only persons present who did not receive the testimony of Hyrum Smith, and that all the others did receive it from the teaching and testimony of the said Hyrum Smith. And further, that the copy of said revelation on celestial marriage, published in the Deseret News extra of September 14th, A. D. 1852, is a true copy of the same.

LEONARD SOBY'S TESTIMONY.

The following was published in the Ogden Herald, in January, 1886:

"Our readers will remember, that in the correspondence which passed between Elder Littlefield and Joseph Smith, jun., of the reorganized church, some time since, Mr. Smith challenged Elder Littlefield to give the names of parties who were present and heard the revelation on celestial marriage read before the High Council at Nauvoo. Among the names given by Elder Littlefield was that of Leonard Soby. The prophet of the reorganized church knew where Mr. Soby resided, and instructed a member of his church in high standing to draw up an affidavit, stating that Mr. Soby was not present at such meeting, and never heard the revelation read.

"The affidavit was drawn up under the instructions of Joseph Smith, jun., and Mr. Gurley, who was something of a lawyer, called on Mr. Soby at his home in Beverly, New Jersey, and requested him to sign it. The affidavit stated that Mr. Soby was present at the High Council meeting referred to, but did not hear the revelation read. When Mr. Gurley requested Mr. Soby to sign the document, Soby objected, saying he was present at the meeting, and did hear the revelation read, and could not sign an affidavit to the contrary. This considerably disconcerted his interlocutor, and Mr. Soby added: 'If you will draw up an affidavit setting forth that I was there and did hear the revelation read, I will sign it for you.' Mr. Gurley, however, did not want that kind of testimony, and retired rather crestfallen, but wiser, and has since apostatized from the reorganized church.

"Mr. Soby, quite recently, had business in the State of Pennsylvania, and while there related the occurrence to a gentleman named Samuel Harrison.

"Leonard Soby is about the only person now living who was present at the High Council meeting at which the revelation on celestial marriage was read. His home is at Beverly, New Jersey.'

We annex the following extracts from a communication written to the Deseret News by James S. Brooks, of San Bernardino, Cal., and dated March 26, 1886.

"I saw an account in January last, in the Ogden Herald, wherein Mr. Leonard Soby, of New Jersey, is made to testify that he was present at the High Council in Nauvoo, and that he heard the revelation upon celestial marriage there read; also that an affidavit had been represented to him by Mr. Gurley, dictated by Mr. Joseph Smith, the leader of the Josephite faction, which he, Mr. Soby, was requested to sign, stating that he was not present at that council, and did not hear the revelation read, which he refused to do, but offered to sign one to the contrary. Knowing that to be one of the props upon which the Josephites build their excuse for rejecting the revelation, I showed the article to one of their members in this place. He said: 'Mr. Gurley will say anything now that he has left our church.'

"I saw immediately that they were no more ready to accept that evidence than any other; indeed they do not want the truth; it is not facts that they are seeking after. In order to do away with that quibble I wrote to Mr. Soby myself, informing him of the statement of the interview between himself and Mr. Gurley, as published in the Ogden Herald, asking him if it was correct, and below is a copy of the letter I received from him. It is well to have such evidence on record, as Mr. Soby is now the only living witness that was present at the council, as I see by the Deseret News that Mr. Thomas Grover died last month, he too having left his testimony as to being present and hearing it read.

"LEONARD SOBY'S LETTER.

"James S. Brooks:

"DEAR SIR—Yours of 12th at hand, and would state the facts given in the Herald in regard to myself and Mr. Gurley are true. I was present at the High Council in Nauvoo when that revelation was read, and know it to be true, and I hope the Lord will bless you to see the truth as I do.

Respectfully, your humble servant,
LEONARD SOBY, (a witness)."

HOWARD CORAY'S TESTIMONY.

"Territory of Utah,

"As many false statements have been made in relation to the authorship of the revelation on celestial marriage, I deem it but justice to all lovers of truth for me to express what I know concerning this very important matter.

"On the 22nd day of July, A. D. 1843, Hyrum Smith, the martyred Patriarch, came in a carriage to my house in Nauvoo; he invited me and my wife to take a ride with him; accordingly, as soon as we could make ourselves ready, we got into the carriage and he set off in the direction of Carthage. Having gone a short distance, he observed to us that his brother, Joseph Smith, the Prophet, had received a revelation on marriage, that was not for the public yet, which he would rehearse to us, as he had taken pains to commit it to memory. He then commenced rehearsing the revelation on celestial marriage, not stopping till he had gone quite through with the matter. After which he reviewed that part pertaining to plurality of wives, dwelling at some length upon the same in order that we might clearly understand the principle. And on the same day (July 22nd, 1843) he sealed my wife, formerly Martha Jane Knowlton, to me; and when I heard the revelation on celestial marriage read on the stand in Salt Lake City in 1852, I recognized it, as the same as that repeated to me by Brother Hyrum Smith. Not long after this I was present when Brother David Fullmer and wife were sealed by Brother Hyrum Smith, the martyred Patriarch, according to the law of celestial marriage. And, besides the foregoing, there was quite enough came within the compass of my observation to have fully satisfied my mind that plural marriage was practiced in the city of Nauvoo.

MERCY R. THOMPSON'S TESTIMONY.

"SALT LAKE CITY, Jan. 31, 1886.

"A. M. Musser:

"DEAR BROTHER—Having noticed in the Deseret News an enquiry for testimony concerning the revelation on plural marriage, and having read the testimony of Brother Grover, it came to my mind that perhaps it would be right for me to add my testimony to his on the subject of Brother Hyrum reading it to the High Council. I well remember the circumstance. I remember he told me he had read it to the brethren in his office. He put it into my hands and left it with me for several days. I had been sealed to him by Brother Joseph a few weeks previously, and was well acquainted with almost every member of the High Council, and know Brother Grover's testimony to be correct. Now if this testimony would be of any use to such as are weak in the faith or tempted to doubt, I should be very thankful. Please make use of this in any way you think best, as well as the copy of the letter addressed to Joseph Smith, at Lamoni. Your Sister in the Gospel. MERCY R. THOMPSON."

"SALT LAKE CITY, Sept. 5, 1883.

"Mr. Joseph Smith, Lamoni, Ill.:

"DEAR SIR—After having asked my Father in heaven to aid me, I sit down to write a few lines as dictated by the Holy Spirit.

"After reading the correspondence between you and L. O. Littlefield I concluded it was the duty of some one to bear a testimony which could not be disputed. Finding from your letters to Littlefield that no one of your father's friends had performed this duty while you were here, now I will begin at once and tell you my experience.

"My beloved husband, R. B. Thompson, your father's private secretary to the end of his mortal life, died August 27th, 1841, (I presume you will remember him.) Nearly two years after his death your father told me that my husband had appeared to him several times, telling him that he did not wish me to live such a lonely life, and wished him to request your uncle Hyrum to have me sealed to him for time. Hyrum communicated this to his wife (my sister) who, by request, opened the subject to me, when everything within me rose in opposition to such a step, but when your father called and explained the subject to me, I dared not refuse to obey the counsel, lest peradventure I should be found fighting against God; and especially when he told me the last time my husband appeared to him he came with such power that it made him tremble. He then enquired of the Lord what he should do; the answer was, 'Go and do as my servant hath required.' He then took an opportunity of communicating this to your uncle Hyrum who told me that the Holy Spirit rested upon him from the crown of his head to the soles of his feet. The time was appointed, with the consent of all parties, and your father sealed me to your uncle Hyrum for time, in my sister's room, with a covenant to deliver me up in the morning of the resurrection to Robert Blaskel Thompson, with whatever offspring should be the result of that union, at the same time counseling your uncle to build a room for me and move me over as soon as convenient, which he did, and I remained there as a wife the same as my sister to the day of his death. All this I am ready to testify to in the presence of God, angels and men. * * *

MERCY R. THOMPSON."

LUCY W. KIMBALL'S TESTIMONY.

"When the Prophet Joseph Smith first mentioned the principle of plural marriage to me I became very indignant, and told him emphatically that I did not wish him ever to mention it to me again, as my feelings and education revolted against any thing of such a nature. He counseled me, however, to pray to the Lord for light and understanding in relation thereto, and promised me if I would do so sincerely, I should receive a testimony of the correctness of the principle. At length I concluded to follow this advice, and the consequence was that the Prophet's promise unto me was fulfilled to the very letter. Before praying I felt gloomy and downcast; in fact, I was so intirely given up to dispair that I felt tired of life; but after I had poured out my heart's contents before God, I at once became calm and composed; a feeling of happiness took possession of me, and at the same time I received a powerful and irresistible testimony of the truth of plural marriage, which testimony has abided with me ever since. Shortly afterwards I consented to become the Prophet's wife, and was married to him May 1, 1843, Elder William Clayton officiating. I am also able to testify that Emma Smith, the Prophet's first wife, gave her consent to the marriage of at least four other girls to her husband, and that she was well aware that he associated with them as wives within the meaning of all that word implies. This is proven by the fact that she herself, on several occasions, kept guard at the door to prevent disinterested persons from intruding, when these ladies were in the house.

LUCY W. KIMBALL."

ORSON PRATT'S TESTIMONY.

"At a meeting held in Plano, Illinois, Sept. 12, 1878, Apostle Orson Pratt explained the circumstances connected with the coming forth of the revelation on plural marriage. He refuted the statement and belief of those present that Brigham Young was the author of that revelation; showed that Joseph Smith, the Prophet, had not only commenced the practice of that principle himself, and further taught it to others, before President Young and the Twelve had returned from their missions in Europe, in 1841, but that Joseph actually received revelation upon that principle as early as 1831. He said, 'Lyman Johnson, who was very familiar with Joseph at this early date, Joseph living at his father's house, and who was also very intimate with me, we having traveled on several missions together, told me himself that Joseph had made known to him as early as 1831, that plural marriage was a correct principle. Joseph declared to Lyman that God had revealed it to him, but that the time had not come to teach or practice it in the Church, but that the time would come.' To this statement Elder Pratt bore his testimony. He cited several instances of Joseph having had wives sealed to him, one at least as early as April 5, 1841, which was some time prior to the return of the Twelve from England. Referred to his own trial in regard to this matter in Nauvoo, and said it was because he got his information from a wicked source, from those disaffected, but as soon as he learned the truth he was satisfied."

LYMAN O. LITTLEFIELD'S TESTIMONY.

"The doctrine of celestial marriage, I have the best of reasons for believing, was understood and believed by him (Joseph Smith, the Prophet) away back in the days when he lived in Kirtland, when he and the Saints, in their poverty, were toiling to erect that sacred edifice (the Kirtland Temple), wherein you (referring to Joseph Smith, the son of the Prophet) now falsify him, seeking, by your unsupported declarations, to nullify his most sacred doctrines. Even there, as I believe, he was instructed of the Lord respecting the sacred ordinance of plural marriage; but he was not required to reveal it to the Church until some time during the residence of the Saints at Nauvoo, where he received a revelation from the Lord setting forth in detail the results to be obtained by keeping inviolate all the laws connected with this sacred condition of things. And in consequence of the prejudices of the Saints and the tide of persecution which he well knew he would have to encounter from the outside world, wherein his life would be endangered, he delayed, as long as possible, to make this principle known, except to a few of the most faithful and humble of the Saints."

For further information the reader is referred to Elder L.O. Littlefield's correspondance with Joseph Smith, of the reorganized church, published in the Mill. Star, Vol. 45, pages 385, 443, 561, etc.

ALLEN J. STOUT'S TESTIMONY.

"At a meeting held at Rockville, Washington Co., Utah, Dec. 23, 1885, in commemoration of the Prophet Joseph Smith's birthday, Allen J. Stout, sen., testified, that while acting as one of the Prophet's body guard in the Nauvoo Mansion, only a single door separating him from the family, he listened to a conversation which took place between Joseph and Emma Smith, on the much vaunted subject of plural marriage. This impulsive woman from moments of passionate denunciation would subside into tearful repentance and acknowledge that her violent opposition to that principle was instigated by the power of darkness; that Satan was doing his utmost to destroy her, etc. And solemnly came the Prophet's inspired warning 'Yes, and he will accomplish your overthrow, if you do not heed my counsel.'" (From a letter published in the Deseret Evening News of Jan. 20, 1885.)

BISHOP S. A. WOOLLEY'S TESTIMONY.

"In September, 1843, at Nauvoo, Ill., I was taken very sick, so much so that most of my folks thought I could not recover. During the time of my illness the Prophet Joseph and Patriarch Hyrum Smith came and administered to me frequently. Father Joseph Smith, in a blessing previously given me, had made me a certain promise in regard to living, in which I had the most implicit confidence; and when I heard friends say (although so far gone that I did not recognize any one) that I would never get well, I would whisper 'Yes, I will, Father Smith promised that I should live to see the coming of the Son of Man.' Brother Hyrum said, because of my faith in that blessing, I would not die at that time. The house, in which we lived, was a two-story one, and on the east side was built a store, from which a door opened into the sitting room. During my sickness I occupied one of the up-stair rooms.

One afternoon in the month of October, A. D. 1843, I think on a Tuesday, about 2 o'clock (I cannot explain just how I knew it was 2 o'clock, but I knew it), I found myself in the sitting room down stairs, and walking to the door leading into the store, I saw my brother Edwin D. putting up the shutters of the store as though it was night. I turned around, saw Mary, his wife, putting down the blinds of the windows in the sitting room. I stood and looked and wondered what was to be done. I saw two or three other persons there; and presently some others, including Patriarch Hyrum Smith, came in. The fireplace was in the north end of the room, and Hyrum sat down at the east end of the grate with his face turned to the northwest. Presently I saw him take a paper out of his coat pocket, and I walked up to his left hand side, looked over his shoulder, and, as he opened the paper, I read 'A Revelation on Eternal Marriage and Plurality of Wives,' etc. He then commenced to read what is now known as the revelation on plural marriage. I also read it myself as fast as he did. He stopped and explained as he went along. There was a sister present by the name of German, who, when he had read to a certain point, went to the southwest window, raised the curtain, looked out, then turned around and said, 'Brother Hyrum, don't read any more, I am full up to here,' drawing her hand across her throat. It was there told me by the same power that informed me it was 2 o'clock, that that revelation was of God, and that no man could or would receive a fulness of celestial glory and eternal life, except he obeyed that law, and had more than one living wife at the same time. From this time I commenced to get well, and did so very speedily. In the course of a few days I was down in the sitting room, and one day, as we sat by the fire, my sister-in-law (Mary) and Sister German, who boarded there, were taking about that principle allegorically. I remarked, 'Mary, thee need not be afraid to talk right out about that principle, for I know more about it than thee does.' 'What principle?' said she. 'Why, that principle about a man having more wives than one,' I replied. She looked with amazement and said, 'What does thee mean?' (We were raised Quakers.) 'I mean,' said I, 'that I stood right there (pointing to the place) when Brother Hyrum read that revelation the other day.' 'What revelation?' said she (seeming very incredulous). 'Why, the one on plural marriage.' I answered. My brother Edwin D. testified in a public meeting in Manti, Sanpete Co., a number of years ago, that the revelation was read by Bro. Hyrum just as I said, but he (Edwin D.) did not see me there, and he could not relate it as accurately as I have done. Were I to go back on every other principle of what the world call 'Mormonism,' I would have to acknowledge that the principle of plural marriage is of God. I, like Paul of old, whether in the body or out, saw and heard things which were unlawful to utter at that time, for I understood that I was not to tell anyone, or to talk to anyone about it, except those who already knew about it."

APOSTLE ERASTUS SNOW'S TESTIMONY:

"The Prophet Joseph Smith first taught me the doctrine of celestial marriage, including a plurality of wives, in Nauvoo, Ill., in April, 1843. He also told me of those women he had taken to wives. My wife's sister, Louisa Beman, was his first plural wife, she being sealed to him by my brother-in-law, Joseph B. Noble, April 5, 1841. She was the daughter of Alva and Sarah Burtt Beman. The Prophet Joseph also gave me the privilege of taking another wife, which I did in March, 1844, the Patriarch Hyrum Smith officiating under the Prophet's direction."

SARAH M. KIMBALL'S TESTIMONY.

"Early in the year 1842, Joseph Smith taught me the principle of marriage for eternity, and the doctrine of plural marriage. He said that in teaching this he realized that he jeopardized his life; but God had revealed it to him many years before as a privilege with blessings, now God had revealed it again and instructed him to teach it with commandment, as the Church could travel (progress) no further without the introduction of this principle. I asked him to teach it to some one else. He looked at me reprovingly, and said, 'Will you tell me who to teach it to? God required me to teach it to you, and leave you with the responsibility of believing or disbelieving.' He said, 'I will not cease to pray for you, and if you will seek unto God in prayer, you will not be led into temptation.'"

ADDITIONAL TESTIMONY.

"At a quarterly Stake conference held at Centreville, Davis Co., Utah, June 11, 1883, Elder Arthur Stayner read an affidavit made by Elder Thomas Grover. The substance of the document was that the affiant was a member of the High Council of the Church, that in 1843 Hyrum Smith, the Patriarch, appeared at the meeting of that body and presented the revelation on celestial marriage, at the same time declaring it to be from God.

"After the reading of this paper Elder Grover made a statement to the effect that Hyrum there and then asserted that those brethren who received the revelation should be blessed and preserved, while those who rejected it would go down. Nine members of the Council accepted and three took a stand against it. Those three subsequently apostatized, were excommunicated from the Church and are all now dead (except one).

"Elder Joseph B. Noble next addressed the conference. He stated that the Prophet Joseph told him that the doctrine of celestial marriage was revealed to him while he was engaged on the work of translation of the Scriptures, but when the communication was first made the Lord stated that the time for the practice of that principle had not arrived. Subsequently, he stated, the angel of the Lord appeared to him and informed him that the time had fully come. Elder Noble sealed his wife's sister to Joseph, that being the first plural marriage consummated. The Prophet gave the form of the ceremony, Elder Noble repeating the words after him. Elder Noble bore testimony to the purity of character of his sister-in-law, who was a woman of irreproachable morality, who entered into the plural marriage relation on a deep-seated conviction that the doctrine was from God.

"President Taylor spoke briefly, stating that he was present at a meeting of the leading authorities of the Church in Nauvoo, at which the subject of the revelation on celestial marriage was laid before them and unanimously received as from God. Joseph declared that unless it was received the Church could progress no further. Soon after he met the Prophet Joseph, who, addressing the speaker, said the time had come when he must embrace the doctrine of plural marriage.

"President George Q. Cannon delivered a thrillingly powerful discourse on the subject of plural marriage, showing that while those who had entered into that relation properly had, as a rule, been greatly blessed, men who had tampered with the other sex outside of the 'marriage relation,' had wilted and gone down in every instance. Those who had embraced the doctrine were the leading men of the Church, possessing the Holy Spirit to a much more than ordinary degree. The speaker showed how the Lord had not confined His blessing to any class, or special families, but men of humble origin had been selected as his instruments to forward his purposes. It would yet transpire, he said, that God would take men out of the humbler walks of life and of them make Apostles and Prophets, who would perform mighty works in His name. The discourse was reported in full."

We could produce hundreds of other testimonies of a similar nature to these given above, were it necessary, but what we have already given must be deemed fully sufficient to prove, beyond a shadow of doubt, that Joseph Smith, the Prophet, did teach and practice the principle of plural marriage in his lifetime. Summing up the information received from the parties already mentioned and from other sources, we find that the following named ladies, besides a few others, about whom we have been unable to get all the necessary information, were sealed to the Prophet Joseph Smith during the last three years of his life. MISCELLANEOUS.

FROST, (OLIVE GREY,) daughter of Aaron Frost and Susan Grey, was born in the town of Bethel, Oxford Co., Maine, July 24, 1816. She possessed a happy and genial disposition, and gained many friends, whose friendship grew stronger as time advanced and they learned to appreciate her good qualities. When quite young she was religiously inclined, and would often retire to some private place, with a chosen companion, to pour out her soul in secret prayer to that Being, who rewards openly, and frequently she incurred ridicule thereby from those who were less sober minded. When about eighteen years of age she and her particular friend, Miss Louisa Foster, learned the tailoress trade, and they went together from place to place, among their acquaintances, to work at this business, thereby being able to lighten the labors of the busy housewives. While engaged at this work in the neighboring town of Dixfield, Elder Duncan Mc-

Arthur visited that place and preached the Gospel as taught by the Latter-day Saints, in such plainness that her willing mind, already prepared by earnest prayer, soon comprehended its vast importance, and she received it joyfully. She was baptized by Elder McArthur, and she always looked upon him with reverence as her "father in the Gospel." She endured much opposition on account of the new religion she had embraced, but she never faltered, and upon her return home, she and Sister Lucy Smith, who had also joined the Church, found great strength and consolation in retiring to the grove to pray, even when the weather was so severe that they had to take a quilt or blanket to protect them from the cold. Unity of faith was now added to the tie of friendship. Their prayers took new form, for they now had something more tangible to ask for and a more perfect Being to address God had respect unto their integrity and petitions, and led them in the way of salvation and life eternal. Sister Olive continued thus, working at her trade and contending for her religion until the fall of 1840, when, at the earnest solicitation of her sister Mary Ann and brother-in-law Parley P. Pratt, she accompanied them to England, where she remained two years. She willingly forsook father and mother, brothers and sisters, and braved the dangers of the great deep, to aid in spreading the Gospel in a foreign land. These two sisters were the first missionary woman of this dispensation to cross the sea in the interest of this Church. They were fifteen weeks on the sea going and coming. Sister Olive was not afflicted with seasickness, and was therefore enabled to devote herself to her sick sister, and the care of the family. Her health, however, was never robust, and often while in England, if she walked a long distance to and from meeting, she would spit blood. She made many warm friends among the Saints on the British Isles. On the return voyage the measles broke out among the passengers, and after going on board the steamer on the Mississippi River, Sister Olive was stricken with this desease. She was very sick the rest of the journey up to Chester, Ill., where she tarried with the family of her sister through the winter. In the spring she continued her journey to Nauvoo, where she arrived April 12, 1843. In the following summer her heart was gladdened by the arrival of her father and mother and two sisters, this making six of the family who had embraced the newly revealed Gospel. She joined the first organization of the Female Relief Society at Nauvoo, and took great interest in it. She was very zealous in soliciting aid for and in visiting those who were needy and in distress. Her heart was always tender towards suffering of every kind, and it gave her unbounded joy and satisfaction to be able to alleviate it. She seemed to realize and appreciate the magnitude of the great and important mission allotted to woman in the perfect plan of this Gospel dispensation, and she desired to do her part in the good work. She freely accorded to man the title of king, and joyfully accepted the place of queen by his side, for it was at this time that the principle of plurality of wives was taught to her. She never opposed it, and, as in the case of baptism, soon accepted it to be her creed, in practice as well as theory. She was married for time and all eternity to Joseph Smith, some time previous to his death and martyrdom. After the death of the Prophet she was sealed to Pres. Brigham Young for time. Sister Olive died at Nauvoo, Ill., Oct. 6, 1845, after two weeks' suffering with the chills and fever and pneumonia. She died, as she had lived, in full faith of the Gospel of Christ, and awaits the glorious resurrection day. MARY ANN PRATT.

FULLMER, (DESDEMONA WADSWORTH,) daughter of Peter Fullmer and Susannah Zefers, and sister of the late David Fullmer, was born in Huntington, Luzerne County, Penn., Oct. 6, 1809. She embraced the Gospel about the close of the year 1836, in Richland County, Ohio, being baptized by Elder John P. Greene. Soon afterwards she removed to Kirtland, Ohio, and from that time forward shared in the persecutions to which the Church was subjected in Ohio, Missouri and Illinois. She was living with her brother David, near Haun's Mill, Mo., at the time when the massacre of the Saints occurred at that place, and she and other members of the family were under the necessity of secreting themselves in the woods to escape the mob. She was among the first to enter into the order of celestial marriage, being married to the Prophet Joseph Smith in Nauvoo in 1842. She remained at Nauvoo until the final expulsion of the Saints. In 1848 she came to Utah and located in Salt Lake City. For many years she resided in the Sixth Ward, where she died Feb. 9, 1886, in the 77th year of her life. She was a quiet, unassuming, faithful woman, and was greatly respected by all who had the pleasure of her acquaintance.

JOHNSON, (ALMERA WOODWARD,) daughter of Ezekiel Johnson and Julia Hills, was born at Westford, Chittenden Co., Vermont, Oct. 21, 1812, and raised principally at Pomfret, near Fredonia, Chautauqua Co., New York. She joined the Church in 1832 and moved to Kirtland, Ohio, in 1833. From that time she shared in the persecutions raging against the Saints until 1840, when she removed to Nauvoo, where she was married to the Prophet Joseph Smith in August, 1843. The ceremony was performed by Elder William Clayton at the house of Almera's sister, Mrs. Delcena D. Sherman. Patriarch Hyrum Smith was present and remarked at the time to Sister Almera, "The Lord has revealed the principle of plural marriage to me, and I know for myself that it is true. I will have you for a sister, and you shall be blest." After the Prophet was killed, and when the Church was leaving Nauvoo, Sister Almera married Reuben Barton, and removed to Council Bluffs, Iowa, where she buried five girls. In 1861 she came to Utah with her brother Joseph E. Johnson. Previous to this her husband had apostatized; and he never came to the valleys. She lived a short time in Salt Lake City, then resided three years in Utah County, since which she has lived in Iron County, principally in Parowan, which is her present home.

KIMBALL, (Lucy Walker,) daughter of John Walker and Lydia Holmes, was born at Peacham, Caledonia Co., Vermont, April 30, 1826, and was baptized by Elder Abraham Palmer, at Ogdensburgh, N. Y., while in her ninth year. In 1838 she removed with her parents and the Ogdensburgh branch of the Church to Missouri, passing through Kirtland, Ohio, which had just been evacuated by most of the Saints. Before crossing the line into Caldwell County, Mo., the little company of Saints fromOgdensburgh,traveling in seven wagons, was surrounded by a mob, consisting of about forty men with painted faces, who searched the wagons thoroughly, took away all the arms and ammunition which they could find, and ordered some of the women and children out into the snow, among whom was Lucy's mother, a frail and delicate woman. All this happened on a cold and unpleasant day, early in the morning. The company then traveled on until they reached a point within five miles of Haun's Mills, where they formed a camp. Brother Walker then proceeded to the Mills to counsel with President Joseph Young and some other brethren who were stopping there temporarily. This was on Oct. 30, 1838, the memorable day on which the massacre took place. During the shooting Bro. Walker was wounded in the arm, and subsequently suffered considerable from the effects thereof. Immediately after the massacre a young man came running across the prairie to the little camp of immigrants and told them what had happened at the Mills, adding that the mob would soon also attack them. Upon hearing this some of the women picked up their babes and tried to wade through the deep snow, towards the neighboring woods, but after suffering almost beyond description from cold and exposure they were obliged to return to the wagons and trust in God for protection. The next morning early a young officer, with a pleasant, open face, came riding into the camp and told the travelers that the mob was coming down to destroy them, but if they would consent to follow him, he would lead them to a place of safety. At first they were not inclined to believe him, but finally concluded to follow him and risk the consequences. The young man, who appeared not to be in sympathy with the mob, then led the little company on a back trail to a secluded place, where they scattered and found temporary shelter among the settlers. In a couple of weeks, Bro. Walker, who had been reported killed, rejoined his family, and the following spring most of the little party continued their journey until they reached Quincy, Ill. In the spring of 1840 the Walker family removed to Nauvoo, where they became intimately acquainted with Pres. Joseph Smith and lived in his family for a number of years. On May 1, 1843, Sister Lucy was married to the Prophet as a plural wife. After the martyrdom of Joseph and Hyrum Smith she lived with her eldest brother, William, and in 1846 left Nauvoo to come west. After spending two winters at Winter Quarters she arrived in Great Salt Lake Valley in 1848, in the company of Heber C. Kimball, to whom she was married in 1845, and subsequently had nine children by him. She resided in Salt Lake City until 1868, when she accompanied her husband to Provo. Soon afterwards Pres. Kimball died, but she remained in Utah County for several years, where she took an active part in the Provo Fourth Ward Female Relief Society, filling also many important positions of trust. She now resides with her youngest daughter in the Ninth Ward, Salt Lake City.

LYMAN, (Eliza M. Partridge,) eldest daughter of Bishop Edward Partridge and Lydia Clisbee, was born at Painesville, Geauga (now Lake) Co., Ohio, April 20, 1820. She became a member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints in 1831, which action changed the prospects of her whole life. From having been in easy circumstances before, her subsequent life was to be one of privation and self-sacrifice. Becoming identified with the Saints in her youth, she was early imbued with a love for the principles of the Gospel and a reverence for truth and honesty. Having to suffer the privations incident to the persecutions endured by the Saints in Missouri and Illinois, she was deprived of those advantages of education generally considered necessary to qualify a young woman to appear to advantage in company; at the same time her inherent qualities of modesty and good sense, coupled with a studious disposition, enabled her to surmount obstacles and gain sufficient book learning to become a teacher, and she was able to appear to advantage in the best society. With no ostentation she was generally self-possessed under all circumstances. Although filling honorable positions in connection with the benevolent institutions among the Saints, her life labor was most appreciated by her intimate friends and relatives. She was one of the first to receive the doctrine of celestial marriage being taught that principle by the Prophet Joseph Smith, to whom she was married as a plural wife, March 8, 1843, by Apostle Heber C. Kimball. About two months later, on May 11, 1843, the marriage ceremony was repeated in the presence of Emma Smith, the Prophet's first wife, Elder James Adams officiating. In those days it required considerable self-sacrifice as well as faith to enter into that order. After the death of the Prophet, Sister Eliza was married to Apostle Amasa M. Lyman, by whom she had five children; three of them survived her. Her son Platte D. Lyman was born in a wagon on the Platte River, near Fort Laramie, while journeying to the valleys of the mountains; the parents having been driven out by mob violence with the rest of the Saints from Nauvoo. She accompanied her son Platte D. Lyman to San Juan, where he was sent to take charge of a company of settlers, having to make a road through an almost impassable country in the winter time. The suffering and anxiety consequent upon that journey, and the residence in the San Juan country (where her son Joseph A. was shot in the knee by a horse thief and lay helpless between life and death for about a year, being surrounded by Indians, Utes on the one side, and Navajos on the other), no doubt served to break down a constitution by no means robust. Upon the release of her son from the Presidency of the San Juan Stake, she returned to her old home in Oak City, Millard Co., Utah, where she appeared to feel unusually contented. Although enjoying the society of the Saints and always rejoicing in the principles of the Gospel, her lot in life was not an easy one; but it was one of self-sacrifice almost from infancy, and she was never happier than when ministering to the comfort of others. She died at Oak City, March 2, 1886.

NOBLE, (JOSEPH BATES,) a son of Ezekiel Noble and Theodotia Bates, was born in Egremont, Berkshire Co., Mass., Jan. 14, 1810. When he was about five years old his parents removed to Penfield, Monroe Co., N. Y. From 1827 to 1834 he was engaged in the flouring mill business, and with the means earned he rendered his parents considerable assistance, they being poor and having a large family of children. Notwithstanding the many religious revival meetings held in the neighborhood at that time, he never connected himself with any of the sects, as he held different views to those entertained by the majority of the people. Especially did the absence of the gifts and blessings of the Gospel, as manifested among the early Christians, cause him serious reflections. Some time in the spring of 1832 Elders Brigham and Joseph Young and Heber C. Kimball came to Avon, Livingston Co., N. Y., where the Noble family resided at that time, and commenced preaching the fulness of the Gospel. At their first meeting at that place, which was held in a private house, the spirit of God was poured out in a great measure, and Elder B. Young spoke in tongues. After listening to the first sermon, young Noble was convinced of its truth. A few weeks later he was baptized by Elder Young. In the summer of 1833 he traveled about two hundred miles to Kirtland, Ohio, to visit Joseph Smith. He met the Prophet going out to work in the hay field, and in order to receive instructions from his inspired lips Bro. Noble labored together with him in the field six days out of the nine he remained in Kirtland. During his stay there Elder Brigham Young came in from Canada; five or six very interesting meetings were held, in which the gift of tongues and prophecy was enjoyed by several of the brethren present, and much instruction was given by the Prophet. In the beginning of July Bro. Noble returned home, traveling with Elder Brigham Young part of the way. Early in 1834 a call was made upon the young men of the Church in the East to accompany the Prophet to Missouri for the purpose of assisting the Saints, who had been driven out of Jackson County, to return to their homes, Bro. Noble was among the two hundred who responded to this call. He accordingly bid farewell to his father's family and all his acquaintances (notwithstanding the earnest solicitation of his friends, who tried to persuade him to remain at the mill, where his labors were much needed) and started on his journey May 1, 1834. Traveling by stage and steamer he arrived in Kirtland on the 6th to find that the Prophet with a number of the brethren had already started for Missouri the day previous. Bro. Noble immediately hired Father John Johnson to take him to Wooster, Wayne Co., where he fell in with other brethren with whom he continued the journey and finally overtook the main company of Zion's Camp, with which he then traveled to Clay County, Mo. When the cholera broke out in the camp, Bro. Noble was appointed to take care of four of the sufferers. He remained with them in a small room until they were all dead, after which he accompanied Elders Brigham Young and Heber C. Kimball to Liberty, about two miles from the camp. There he was violently seized with the dreadful malady himself. For 48 hours he suffered the most severe pains with vomiting and purging, while a burning fever in the bowels and distressing cramps, such as are peculiar to cholera, threatened him with momentary death. His voice also failed and his hearing nearly left him. While laying in this painful condition, Elders Brigham and Joseph Young, Heber C. Kimball, Orson Hyde, Peter Whitmer and some two or three others came in and administered to him. While they were praying for him he was blessed with a glorious vision, in which he, among other things, saw the holy city (the New Jerusalem), and while gazing upon its glory and admiring its beauty, he heard a voice saying, "Behold, the blessed abode of the Saints." The power of God rested upon him in a most marvelous manner; he was almost instantly healed from his sickness, and while the brethren were yet with him he arose and dressed himself. Two days later he started on his return trip to Ohio, in company with Lyman E. and Luke S. Johnson, Sylvester Smith, Zebedee Coltrin, Zerubbabel Snow and others. They arrived in Kirtland about the 1st of August. A few days later Elder Noble continued his journey to his home in New York State, where he married Miss Mary Adeline Beman, Sept. 11, 1837. He had been engaged to this lady for two years previous. She was the daughter of Alva Beman, a well-to-do farmer, who lived a short distance from the Noble family residence. This Alva Beman was well acquainted with Joseph Smith before the coming forth of the Book of Mormon, and on one occasion he assisted the young Prophet in hiding the plates from a mob, who were trying to get them in their possession. Mr. Beman was permitted to handle the plates wrapped in a thin cloth covering, but did not see them. A few days after his marriage, Bro. Noble returned to Ohio with his young wife, where they commenced housekeeping. During the winter of 1834-35 he attended the Elders' school in Kirtland, while he was engaged as miller in the neighboring village of Willoughby. In the beginning of 1835, when the first quorum of Seventies was organized in Kirtland, he was ordained a member thereof. Some time afterwards he was called to go on a mission, but was released in order to attend the Hebrew School, taught by a Mr. Seixas, at Kirtland. He was present at the dedication of the Kirtland Temple in 1836 and witnessed some of the glorious manifestations of the power of God in that building, where he also received his washings and anointings. After this he performed a mission to southern Ohio, and in 1838 removed to Caldwell Co., Mo., traveling thither with a small company of Saints from Canada. He located temporarily at Far West after the persecutions against the Saints there had commenced, and took an active part in the defense of the town until he, in connection with his brethren, was compelled to deliver up his arms to the commanders of the mob militia. He visited Joseph Smith and fellow-prisoners in Liberty jail several times, and was among the number of visitors present when the attempt to break jail was made in February, 1839. Previous to this Elder Noble had been very active in removing the Saints from Adam-ondi-Ahman to Far West, and in the spring of 1839 left Missouri agreeable to the exterminating order of Gov. L. W. Boggs. After a short stay in Quincy, Ill., he assisted to remove Hyrum Smith and family and others to Commerce, after which he located with his own family at Montrose, Iowa, where he was set apart to act as a Counselor to Bishop Elias Smith. While living in one of the old military barracks at Montrose, he was taken sick and brought near the point of death from the effects of chills and fever. Nearly all the Saints located on the river bottom at that time were suffering from severe sickness because of the unhealthfulness of the locality. After having administered to the Saints on the Nauvoo side, the Prophet Joseph and several other brethren came to pay the sick in Montrose a visit. Finding Elder Noble in a dying condition, the Prophet, immediately after entering the hut, took him by the hand and said, "Brother Noble, you have been acquainted with me too long to lie here thus prostrated," and raising his voice he rebuked the disease, saying, "In the name of Jesus Christ arise and walk." Bro. Noble immediately leaped out of bed, but in attempting to dress he fainted. When he again regained consciousness he found the Prophet standing by his side, who, after a few moments said, "Bro. Noble, why didst thou doubt." He then rebuked the disease a second time, and Elder Noble was healed in an instant. Agreeable to the wish of the Prophet, Elder Noble removed to Nauvoo in 1841. There he was ordained a High Priest and appointed to act as a Bishop of the Nauvoo Fifth Ward. He continued to act in this capacity until the exodus in 1846. Previous to this the Prophet had taught him the principle of plural marriage, Brother Noble being one of those trusted men in whom Joseph placed the utmost confidence. On various occasions he assisted Joseph to cross the Mississippi River when his enemies were on the alert to kidnap or arrest him. A young, intelligent woman by the name of Louisa Beman, a sister of Elder Noble's wife, was at that time living in the family. To her the Prophet paid his attentions with a view of yeilding obedience to the principle of plural marriage. The girl, after being convinced that the principle was true, consented to become the Prophet's wife, and on April 5, 1841, she was married to him, Elder Noble officiating. Brother Noble also obeyed this higher law on April 5, 1843, when Sarah B. Alley was sealed to him for time and all eternity, the Prophet himself officiating. The first issue of this marriage was George Omner Noble (now an Elder in the Church), who was born in Nauvoo Feb. 2, 1844. He is supposed to have been the first polygamous child born in this dispensation. Subsequently Elder Noble married other women, and he is now the father of 33 children by six different wives. Elder Noble has also figured prominently as a military man. While living in Iowa he was duly commissioned (July 29, 1841) second lieutnant in a company of mounted dragoons of the Iowa militia, and subsequently (April 27, 1843) he was commissioned by Governor Thomas Ford as quartermaster sergeant in the second cohort of the Nauvoo Legion. He was also one of the Prophet's body guard and was with the company who escorted the Prophet in his journey towards Carthage, June 24, 1844. While the company was returning to Nauvoo after the State arms, having met Capt. Dunn, Elder Noble turned aside from his companions and rode into a ravine or hollow which led towards Nauvoo and was several miles long. A few moments later the Prophet and his brother Hyrum also came riding into the ravine, and Joseph, seeing Elder Noble, invited him to come and ride with them. He did so, and while the three were traveling towards the city together, the Prophet asked Hyrum, "What signifies the Holy Ghost in relation to the outcome of this difficulty?" Hyrum, in a very sober and thoughtful manner, replied, "If they kill us, it will be all right." This was the first intimation that Elder Noble had of the possibility of the Prophet being slain, and the mere thought of such a thing caused him to weep like a child, for he loved Brother Joseph as he loved his own life. Joseph did not reply at once to Hyrum's significant remarks, but rode on in silence and apparently in deep meditation. At length he brightened up and spoke with his usual characteristic emphasis, "If they kill me, they will kill an innocent man, and my blood be upon them." Having reached the Temple in advance of the company, and while riding down the hill towards the Mansion, the Prophet instructed Elder Noble to inform Capt. Dunn, on his arrival, that the State arms would be delivered to him at the Masonic Hall, where they were stored away. To deliver this message Elder Noble parted with the Prophet for the last time, as he, being unwell, did not accompany the party to Carthage in the evening. When the exodus commenced in 1846 Elder Noble assisted the authorities of the Church to move across the river, and a few weeks later he, with his family, also bid farewell to the "beloved city of the Saints," and started for the unknown West. He journeyed to the Missouri River, in charge of a small company of exiles, and after the location of Winter Quarters, he was appointed Bishop of one of the principal wards, continuing to act in that capacity until the spring of 1847, when he followed the Pioneers to G. S. L. Valley as captain of the first Fifty in Jed. M. Grant's Hundred. On the journey one of his wives gave birth to a daughter. That same fall he built three houses in the North Fort, over which he was called to preside as Bishop. When G. S. L. City was divided into 19 wards in February, 1849, he was appointed first Counselor to Bishop Edward Hunter of the Thirteenth Ward, continuing to act in that capacity until the entire Bishopric of the ward was changed. In 1862 Elder Noble removed to Bountiful, Davis Co., where he previously had been engaged in farming, he being one of the first who claimed land in that section of the country, as early as 1848. When the Davis Stake of Zion was organized in 1877, he was chosen as a member of the High Council of the Stake, in which capacity he is still acting. In 1872 he performed a mission to the United States, laboring principally in the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Michigan and Iowa. In 1886 he visited his relatives in New Mexico and Arizona. Ever since he has been engaged in home missionary labor, traveling in nearly all parts of the Territory. He has filled nearly all local positions of honor and trust within the gifts of the people, and is to-day highly respected as one of the faithful and tried veterans of the Church.

YOUNG, (EMILY DOW PARTRIDGE,) daughter of Edward Partridge and Lydia Clisbee, was born in Painesville, Geauga (now Lake) Co., Ohio., Feb. 28, 1824. She wrote the following on her 63rd birthday, Feb. 28, 1887, in Salt Lake City: "My parents joined the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints when I was about seven years old. Soon after my father removed with his family to Independence, Jackson Co., Missouri, where I was baptized by Elder John Corrill, when about eight years of age. I was with the Saints in their persecutions in Jackson, Clay and Caldwell Counties, Mo. After being driven from Far West, in 1839, we went to Illinois. We stayed a short time in Quincy and later in Pittsfield, Pike Co., Ill., and when Commerce, in Hancock County, was selected as a gathering place for the Saints, we removed thither and found temporary shelter in a tent. We suffered much with sickness at that then unhealthy place, and there also my father died, May 27, 1840. Our family were in the depths of poverty. My sister Eliza and I, having now arrived at an age in which we might earn our own living and perhaps contribute something to help our mother and the smaller children, were considering what we had better do, when the Prophet Joseph and his wife Emma offered us a home in their family, and they treated us with great kindness. We had been there about a year when the principle of plural marriage was made known to us, and I was married to Joseph Smith on the 4th of March, 1843, Elder Heber C. Kimball performing the ceremony. My sister Eliza was also married to Joseph a few days later. This was done without the knowledge of Emma Smith. Two months afterwards she consented to give her husband two wives, provided he would give her the privilege of choosing them. She accordingly chose my sister Eliza and myself, and to save family trouble Brother Joseph thought it best to have another ceremony performed. Accordingly on the 11th of May, 1843, we were sealed to Joseph Smith a second time, in Emma's presence, she giving her free and full consent thereto. From that very hour, however, Emma was our bitter enemy. We remained in the family several months after this, but things went from bad to worse until we were obliged to leave the house and find another home. Emma desired us to leave the city, but after considering the matter over, we decided to remain with our friends. After the Prophet Joseph's death I was married to Pres. Brigham Young, according to the laws of proxy. I received my blessings in the Nauvoo Temple, and in 1846, in the middle of February, I left Nauvoo, crossing the Mississippi River, and was again a wanderer without home or shelter, with a wilderness full of Indians and wild beasts before me, and cruel and heartless beings behind me. The day after crossing the river I might have been seen sitting on a log in a blinding snow-storm, with a three-months-old babe in my arms. I will not attempt to describe my feelings at that time, but cold and hungry I surely was, and the prospect looked rather dismal. At this time I was almost 22 years old. My childhood had been spent amidst mobs and mobbings, until they almost seemed as a matter of course, for this was the fourth time I had been driven by mobs. After a tedious journey of nearly three years, of which I spent one winter at Mount Pisgah, Iowa, and another at Winter Quarters, I arrived in the Great Salt Lake Valley in the fall of 1848. I have often seen the dark clouds gather over our people, and as many times have I witnessed the hand of God in dispelling dangers, and in sustaining and delivering the Saints, even in their darkest and most distressing hours. And although at this time (1887) the dark clouds are gathering over us once more, and our enemies are exerting their energies to the utmost for our destruction, yet I do know that the Lord is our God, and that he in his own time will deliver his people from the yoke of oppression and tyranny. I do know that this is God's work, and that this Gospel is true; God will bear off His Kingdom, let what will oppose. I am the mother of seven children, by President Young, two sons and five daughters. The eldest, a son, and the youngest, a daughter, are dead. The rest are married and have children of their own. My children's names are a follows: Edward P., Emily Augusta, Caroline, Joseph Don C. Meriam, Josephine and Lura. I have 27 grand children." (See her authobiography in the Woman's Exponent, Vols. 13 and 14.)

THE TWELVE APOSTLES.

BRIGHAM YOUNG, (JUNIOR),

A son of President Brigham Young and Mary Ann Angell, was born in Kirtland, Geauga Co., Ohio, Dec. 18, 1836; removed with his parents to Missouri and afterwards to Illinois in the midst of persecution, and was baptized by his father in the Mississippi River, at Nauvoo, Ill., in 1844, when about eight years old. When the exodus from Nauvoo took place, in 1846, he accompanied his father's family into the wilderness, arriving in G. S. L. Valley in September, 1848. His early years in the valley were spent in herding stock, going into canyons and performing considerable hard manual labor. He was also one of the "minute men" who spent much of his time on guard, watching and fighting hostile Indians, and participated in several dangerous expeditions to the mountains. Nov. 15, 1855, he married Catherine Curtis Spencer, a daughter of the late Orson Spencer, and about sixteen months later (early in 1857) he yeilded obedience to the principle of plural marriage by marrying Jane Carrington, a daughter of Albert Carrington. During the Echo Canyon war he did excellent service as a scout, and when out reconnoitring in the mountains he often suffered untold hardships. He was also one of a relief party sent back to meet a hand-cart company of emigrants, on which trip he was attacked by inflammatory rheumatism, which came near killing him, and from the effects of which he suffered many years afterwards.

At the April Conference, 1861, he was called to act as a member of the High Council of the Salt Lake Stake of Zion, and in the spring of 1862 he accompanied Delegate Bernhisel to the States. Having arrived in New York, he received a letter from his father, who wished him to go on a mission to Europe. He complied with this call, sailed for England and arrived in Liverpool July 26, 1862. He labored principally in London, in connection with Elder Wm. C. Staines, and visited Scandinavia and other parts of Europe; returned home in 1863, sailing from Liverpool Sept. 1st of that year

In 1864 he was called on another mission to Europe for the purpose of assisting Pres. Daniel H. Wells in the Presidency of the European Mission. Accompanied by his wife

Catherine, he left his mountain home in April of that year and arrived in Liverpool, England, July 25th. He located at 42 Islington, and in August, 1865, succeeded Daniel H. Wells in the Presidency of the Mission. While acting in that capacity, he traveled extensively in the British Isles, and also made several trips to the Continent, visiting France, Switzerland, Germany, Denmark, Sweden, Norway, Russia and other countries. Agreeable to a request of his father to return to Utah on a visit, he sailed from Liverpool Sept. 19, 1865, with the steamship City of Paris, leaving Apostle Orson Pratt in charge of the mission. In crossing the Atlantic a fearful storm came up. Part of the ship's rigging was blown away, one man was washed overboard, and the vessel came near going to the bottom. Elder Young and a sister who emigrated to Utah were the only Latter-day Saints on board. While the storm was raging a big burly Irishman, a sort of a religious crank, ascribed the cause of the storm to the fact that there was a Jonah on board in the shape of a "Mormon" Elder. He made a terrible fuss and insisted that Elder Young should be thrown overboard, in order to save the ship from destruction. At last the captain had to interfere and compel the Irishman to hold his peace. After a hazardous journey Elder Young arrived in G. S. L. City Oct. 25th.

The following spring he returned to England to bring his family home. He arrived in Liverpool March 20, 1867, resumed the Presidency of the Mission, visited the world's exhibition, at Paris, France, and finally, leaving the affairs of the Mission in charge of Apostle Franklin D. Richards, embarked, with his family, on board the Cunard steamer Scotia and sailed from Liverpool June 29, 1867; they arrived safely home in the fall. On this mission of Elder Young and wife to Europe two children (Mabel A. and Joseph A.) were born to them.

In 1868, when Pres. B. Young took the big grading contract from the Union Pacific Railway Company, Elder Young and his brother John W. acted as Agents for their father in letting out jobs to sub-contractors. Until the disorganization of the Nauvoo Legion, in 1870, Elder Young also held prominent positions as a military man, and did valuable service at the annual drills of the Territorial militia.

Having previously been ordained to the Apostleship, he was set apart as one of the Twelve Apostles in Salt Lake City, Oct. 9, 1868. From that time until the present he has been chiefly engaged in labors pertaining to that high and holy calling. After the death of Apostle Ezra T. Benson, he was called by his father to take charge of the affairs of the Church in Cache Valley, for which purpose he located at Logan. He presided there until 1877, when the Cache Stake of Zion was organized.

At the General Conference held in Salt Lake City in April, 1873, he was chosen as one of the assistant five Counselors to Pres. Brigham Young, and acted in that capacity until his father's death, necessarily spending considerable of his time in St. George, or southern Utah.

After the death of Pres. Young he was appointed one of administrators of the estate, in the settlement of which he showed a just and amicable disposition, for which he won the respect and confidence of the Saints generally. On July 12, 1879, for refusing to deliver certain Church property into the hands of Receiver W. S. McCornick, he was adjudged guilty of contempt of court, by Judge Boreman, in the Third District Court, and arrested, in connection with John Taylor, Geo. Q. Cannon and Albert Carrington. On the following Aug. 4th he, together with Elders Cannon and Carrington, was confined in the Utah Penitentiary for not complying with the court's order of exorbant bail. After more than three week's confinement, the order of Judge Boreman was reversed by the Utah Supreme Court, and the prisoners were released Aug. 28, 1879.

In 1881 Elder Young went on a visit to Arizona, taking his wife Catherine along. They remained one year and returned to Utah in time for Elder Young to wait upon his sick mother during her last moments. She died in Salt Lake City June 27, 1882.

Elder Young has served several terms in the Utah Legislature, made several trips to the East in the interest of the Church, and occupied numerous other positions of honor and trust. Of late years he has traveled extensively in Utah, Arizona, New Mexico, Colorado, Old Mexico, etc., visiting the various Stakes of Zion and assisting his brethren of the Twelve in the many duties and responsibilities resting upon that quorum. While visiting the Yaqui Indians, in Mexico, he was attacked with yellow fever, which brought him near the point of death. He was healed by the power of God. He is now in exile on account of religious persecutions raging against the Saints.

ALBERT CARRINGTON.

A member of the quorum of Twelve Apostles from 1870 to 1885, was born in Royalton, Windsor Co., Vermont, Jan. 8, 1813. He graduated at Dartmouth College in the class of 1833, and for two or three years subsequently taught school and studied law in Pennsylvania. From that State he removed to Wisconsin, where he engaged in lead mining until 1844. In 1841 he joined the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, in Wiota, Wis., and on the abandonment of his business in 1844 gathered to Nauvoo. This was at the very crisis of the troubles then occurring there, and just previous to the martyrdom of the Prophet. He was with the Saints in their exodus, crossing the Mississippi River with his family, Feb. 9, 1846, thus being one of the first to start for the Rocky Mountains. From the camp on Sugar Creek he went to Council Bluffs and was the following year a member of the Pioneers, who went to the G. S. L. Valley. He returned with Pres. Brigham Young to gather the main body of the Saints, and journeyed to the mountains with them in 1848.

At the organization of the wards of G. S. L. City, in February, 1849, Elder Carrington was chosen as second Counselor to Bishop Heywood of Ward No. 17, which position he held for about six years. When the Provisional State of Deseret was organized, he was elected assessor and collector. He also acted as the first clerk of the High Council in the Salt Lake Stake of Zion. After the organization of Utah Territory he was repeatedly elected a member of the council until 1868, when he was sent to England to preside over the European Mission. After his return to Utah in 1870 he was (July 3, 1870) ordained one of the Twelve Apostles, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Ezra T. Benson. Since then he has presided three times over the European Mission, namely 1871–73, 1875–77 and 1880–82.

From April, 1873, until President Young's death he acted as assistant Counselor to the President of the Church, and for more than twenty years he was Pres. Brigham Young's secretary, and having been appointed one of the administrators of Pres. Young's estate, he labored in that capacity, after the President's death, until all the business connected with the estate was settled and the many difficulties adjusted. For refusing to comply with Judge Boreman's unjust demands, he was imprisoned in the Utah Penitentiary from the 4th to the 28th of August, 1879, together with Geo. Q. Cannon and Brigham Young, jun.

Some years' ago he fell into transgression, which, when it came to light, resulted in his excommunication from the Church for lewd and lascivious conduct and adultery on the 7th of November, 1885. This action was taken by the quorum of the Apostles, after a thorough examination of his case.

MOSES THATCHER,

The sixth of the eight sons of Hezekiah Thatcher and Alley Kitchen, was born in Sangamon County, Ill., Feb. 2, 1842. Pending the final expulsion of the Saints from Nauvoo, and while his father was constantly engaged in defending his leading brethren from the encroachments of persecuting and despoiling bands of unscrupulous men, the earliest reflections of the boy were rudely awakened by mobs repeatedly threatening to burn the house from over the head of his defenseless mother, who, with her younger children, was kept in constant dread, during those troublous times when many fled by the light of their burning dwellings. The gloomy thoughts naturally attending such sad scenes could not fail to profoundly impress the sensitive mind of the boy. But relief was found, even at the tender age of four years, in contemplating the goodness of God, as in contrast with the wickedness of man. Thus, early religious impressions were made in the heart of the child who, from a distance, watched the sunlight play on the spire of the Nauvoo Temple and thought the brightness emanated from God's holy angels. His memory faintly grasps the misery, sickness and death that hung like a cloud over the wandering camps of an expelled people. But the hot sands that blistered his feet when walking the sun-scorched plains, while lolling cattle hauled their heavy loads towards the setting sun, as they wearily followed the trail of the Pioneers, are still remembered. The snows and frosts of the winter of 1847–48 and the hunger that gnawed for a whole year as he herded sheep and digged roots are not forgotten; nor are other early valley scenes, wherein Indians caught the bleating lambs of his flock with their rawhide ropes and enforced an exchange of their cricket-pies for the boy's corn-cakes.

The first feast held in the "Old Fort" was not only deeply impressed upon his mind by the thought that all, for at least one meal, would have enough to eat, but vividly so by the death of a playmate who was crushed that day by a log rolling down the sheds of a saw pit. During that season, "roasting-ears" were by the boys esteemed a luxury, whose quantity seemed never to equal the quality. With other members of his father's family, Moses was taken to California in the spring of 1849, reaching what is now Sacramento City in June of that year. It was then only a village of rude huts and tents.

Going to the mining regions near Auburn, he became quite a capitalist, frequently receiving from travelers from one to five dollars for riding a horse to water. His father kept an eating house on the Auburn road, and silver dollars sewn up in gunny sacks and thrust under beds, unproteeted from thieves, save by the walls of a canvas house, were common sights to him in those times, when "Judge Lynch" tried, convicted and hanged the robber, all in one day. No safes, vaults and iron boxes were needed when pork and beans were worth a dollar a pound and the forfeiture of life was the price for stealing. Having followed close on the heels of the Pioneers, he attended his first school when eleven years of age. Being large for his years and awkward, his bashfulness and the knowledge that boys much younger than he were educationally far in advance of him, became sources of daily annoyance and humiliation, but did not discourage him. Seeking learning earnestly he made rapid advancement and quickly laid a foundation for a good common school education. When not at school his experience as a practical miner consisted chiefly in extracting moss and gold from the crevices of rocks along the banks of the American River, into which the floods had made deposits. His implements consisted of a butcher-knife and a milk pan. With the former he extraeted the moss-bound gold and with the latter he washed away foreign substances, while the cows in his charge grazed near by. The reward frequently amounted to several dollars per day.

During evenings he had often listened with wrapt attention to religious discussions between traveling ministers of various sects and his mother. His father being a man of few words, seldom engaged in extended conversations on religious or other subjects; but the boy used to marvel at the ease with which his mother confused and silenced professed teachers, who frequently demonstrated their utter ignorance of the holy Scriptures, with which his mother was so familiar.

The Elders on their way to missions often called upon and received aid from the father of Moses, who, when they held meetings, attended with delight; for the principles of the Gospel sounded like sweet music to him, and often, when they portrayed the truth by the power of God, the spirit bore testimony, and he felt that he had known that before. Thus, the divine Gospel message falling on his ears sunk into his heart, not as something new, but as something beautiful, priceless, eternal and known before. When, therefore, Elders Henry G. Boyle, David M. Stewart and William H. Shearman came with authority to baptize as well as preach, he embraced the truth, being baptized in the Rio Puta, Yolo County, Cal., Dec. 29, 1856, by Elder Boyle, who also confirmed him the evening of the same day, and on March 23rd following ordained him an Elder.

One month later he was called to fill a mission and became the companion of Elder Boyle. He was then fifteen years of age—a beardless boy. To undertake to preach to many who knew him as a rider of wild horses and the lassooer of wilder calves, was a task for which he felt himself wholly unqualified and the very thought of attempting it made him ill. In a small meeting of Saints he had tried, by request, to express gratitude for the restoration of the Gospel; and while he felt that if he did not praise God, the very stones must, yet when he attempted to speak, not a word could he utter. His two elder brothers having been assigned to missions in another part of the State, and his father, mother and other brothers and sisters having arranged to gather to Zion, his feelings were indescribable. A sense of loneliness and of dread seemed to unnerve and utterly prostrate him. It was to the boy an hour of supreme trial, one in which it seemed to him his heart would fail, and yet, in that hour of weakness, he was taught reliance on the Lord, who was able to make the weak strong for His glory and for the salvation of men.

Moses had plead with Elder Boyle not to call him to preach or pray in public, saying that if he could be excused from that, he would be Brother Boyle's obedient and willing servant, blacking his boots, waiting on him, caring for his horse and in every possible manner rendering himself useful to his friend. For several weeks his appeals were regarded mercifully, when, having attended a Methodist meeting, the Saints and especially the characters of the Prophets, Joseph Smith and Brigham Young, were cruelly and unmercifully vilified by the minister, one Reverend Blythe. Being the only one of the faith present, Moses was profoundly moved and in humble, earnest inward prayer besought the Lord to manifest to him his duty and give him strength to perform it. In answer he was impressed to reply. Securing permission to speak, the spirit of God came upon him powerfully, and, without the least hesitation or manifestation of timidity, he disproved many of the assertions of the "reverend" vilifier and confounded and put him to shame; so much so, that swelling with wrath and high sounding words, Blythe exclaimed, with a sneer, that he was grieved and astonished that one so young and apparently good, should admit himself to be a "Mormon." Whereupon Moses replied: "I am not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ, for it is the power of God unto salvation to all who believe." And further said he, "Christ declared that those who believed on him should do the works He did and greater works, because He went to the Father. Now our Reverend friend has declared that such works are done away, being no longer neeessary, and that all who claim to do them or any part of them are impostors; does it not follow, therefore, that he is no believer in Christ? Judge ye between the Lord and this Reverend gentleman claiming in His name to be a teacher. The sheep knowing the voice of their shepherd will not follow strangers seeking to lead them estray." Thus, did the Almighty with the weak confound the mighty, vindicate truth and unmistakably demonstrate that, however inadequate the instrument, He was able to make truth triumph over error. Thereafter Moses made the Lord the "rock of his refuge" and, as the boy-missionary, preached as earnestly, as fearlessly and as effectively as at any time since. Wrapt in the spirit he sometimes spoke for an hour, often correctly quoting Scripture he had never read, the words and sentences as he declared, appearing before his spiritual eyes were read, as from an open book. The first mission was terminated by the "call home" pending the approach to Utah of the U. S.

army. John B., Aaron D. and Moses Thatcher, using means left by their father, fitted up teams and wagons, provided themselves with arms and ammunition, and started from Yolo County Oct. 14, 1857, for Salt Lake City, via the coast route to San Bernardino, thence across the deserts; the season being too far advanced to undertake the journey via the Carson and Humboldt routes. The party reached Salt Lake City, Jan. 1, 1858. Joseph W. Thatcher, the eldest brother of Moses, had been sent on a mission to aid in establishing a settlement on Salmon River. John B., Aaron D. and Geo. W. Thatcher joined the Utah Militia and served in Echo and other parts of the Territory, while Moses, not yet sixteen years of age, went to school, and, after the establishment of Camp Floyd, became a member of the special police force of Salt Lake City and did service as night street guard. He went south in the move as far as Payson; accompanied his father and others to Cache Valley in the winter of 1860 and assisted in locating canal and mill sites and labored during the spring and summer of that year in getting out timber for the Union Mills.

During the winter of 1860–61 he attended the University of Deseret, Prof. Orson Pratt, jun., and James Cobb, being his instructors. In April, 1861, he was married to Miss Lettie Farr by her uncle Lorin Farr and was sealed to her by President Brigham Young, in the autumn of the same year. He had been previously ordained a Seventy by President B. Young and was attached to the second quorum.

He located in Cache Valley shortly after his marriage, built the first frame house in Logan and was given a mission by Bishop Peter Maughan to herd cattle on the Promontory during the winter of 1861–62. He was one of the "minute men" under Captain Thomas E. Ricks and for several years held himself ready day and night to protect the lives and property of citizens. In the discharge of that duty he frequently guarded horses all night, and assisted in apprehending some Indians who had killed several brethren at Smithfield. When the county was organized into Cache Military District he was elected captain of fifty cavalry men, was promoted subsequently and served on the staff of Col. T. E. Ricks and later on that of Gen. Hyde.

He became second salesman in the firm of U. S. Ransohoff & Co., at Salt Lake City. Having made himself familiar with the details of a general mercantile business, he returned to Logan and engaged in that line with his father.

During the winter of 1865–66 Bishop Peter Maughan called him on a mission to Salt Lake City to acquire the art of telegraphy; but in the spring of the latter year President Young notified him of his wish, that he should fill a mission to Europe For that mission President Young personally blest and set him apart. He left home in April, 1866, and returned August 1868. During his absense on that mission he presided first over the Cheltenham then over the Birmingham Conference. Owing to exposure his health was considerably impaired; but his work was successful. On his return he again entered the mercantile field, his father and he forming the firm of "Thatcher & Son." Their business, with the counsel of Apostle Ezra T.

Benson and Bishop Maughan, was consolidated with that of Wm. H. Shearman, and the Logan Co-operative Institution was incorporated, he becoming its general manager. Later the Logan Institution became a branch of the parent Z. C. M. I. of Salt Lake City, and he was its superintendent until 1879. Upon the organization of the Utah Northern Railroad Company, in August, 1870, he was chosen a director and secretary and subsequently became superintendent as well.

Immediately on his return from his British mission he was elected Superintendent of the Cache Valley Sunday Schools, continuing in that calling until April, 1877. He served Cache and Rich Counties ten years in the Territorial Legislative Council and was an active member of the Constitutional Convention of 1872, and became one of the delegates authorized to present the state constitution to Congress, praying that honorable body to pass an enabling act admitting the Territory of Utah into the Union as a State.

When President Young organized the Cache Valley Stake of Zion, May 21,1877,he nominated Elder Thatcher for the Presidency. Being unanimously sustained, Pres. Young set him apart and blessed him for that calling and office. He held that position until April, 1879, when he was called to fill the vacancy in the Quorum of Twelve Apostles, occasioned by the death of Elder Orson Hyde. He was ordained to the Apostleship April 9, 1879, by Pres. John Taylor. During his business experience he organized the Cache Valley Board of Trade and successfully protected the interests of the people, directed the extension of the Utah and Northern Railway, northward from Franklin, Idaho, under its just and equitable co-operative provisions and was largely instrumental in forming Zion's Central Board of Trade, of which Elder John Taylor was President. The latter was organized with the view of harmonizing the business interests of the Territory, advancing the manufacturing, mercantile and agricultural pursuits of the citizens and enhancing their general prosperity by placing as far as possible, without the intervention of "middle men," the products of the country in the hands of consumers, and by securing for home consumption imported goods direct from the manufacturers.

Zion's Central Board of Trade was designed to be the hub and the Stake Boards the spokes of a wheel, that in the future must become a positive protective necessity. Selfish and conflicting interests have largely retarded its progress and jealousy has temporarily blocked its way, but when the clouds of persecution shall have passed away, the future progress of the Territory or State, will demand the revival of a system of trade calculated to unite the people as thoroughly in temporal as in spiritual matters; and to place the avenues of traffic in the hands of the many instead of in the hands of the few. During the latter part of 1878 and the beginning of 1879 Pres. John Taylor called and authorized Moses Thatcher to organize Stake Boards of Trade in the southern counties of the Territory and to explain to the officers and members thereof the objects had in view. The work was promptly and thoroughly accomplished.

Letters having been received by Pres. Taylor from a Dr. Rhodacanaty residing in the City of Mexico, enquiring about the principles of the Gospel, some of the Church publications were sent him as early as the autumn of 1878, and through these some fifteen or twenty Mexican citizens had come to believe the truths of the Gospel, as far as they were informed respecting them. Considering this matter the Council of Apostles called Elder Thatcher to proceed to Mexico and open the door of salvation to that nation. In company with Elder James Z. Stewart, who joined him at Chicago, and Milton G. Trejo, who joined him at New Orleans, he proceeded to the national capital, leaving Utah Oct. 26, 1879, and, taking steamer at New Orleans, crossed the Gulf of Mexico and reached Vera Cruz (City of the True Cross) Nov. 14th, of the same year. As fellow-voyagers he had, besides the Elders named, Baron Grenidl, Belgian Minister to Mexico, his secretary Count Chastel and Gwyn Foster, nephew of U. S. Minister Foster. The party reached the City of Mexico on the evening of Saturday Nov. 16th, and, being entire strangers put up at the principal hotel, "The Iturbide." They spent the following Sunday in viewing the cathedral, rebuilt by Cortez on the ruins of the great Aztec temple, and afterwards remodeled and finished A. D. 1631. They also spent a few hours at the "Zocolo," a beautiful public garden fronting the cathedral, and enjoyed the sweet strains of an excellent military brass band. The day was as pleasant and mild as any May day in Utah.

During the afternoon Dr. Platino C. Rhodacanaty, a Greek on the side of his father, but of Mexican decent from his mother, called and greeted them warmly. He was found to be a cultured and well educated gentleman. During the past few months he had published a monthly periodical called Voz del Desierto, advocating the principles of the Gospel.

On the evening of Tuesday following, Elder Thatcher, on the invitation of Mrs. Foster, attended Minister Foster's reception in company with Mr. Amos W. Butler, a young ornithologist from Evansville, Indiana, and met there Minister Foster, Major Clark, editor of the Two Republics, Messrs. Holden and McClay from New York, the secretary of the Minister from Germany, and a number of others—ladies and gentlemen. On invitation of Mrs. Foster he visited, the next day, the private department of the national museum, and in company with herself and guests examined with much interest a fine twenty-fold maguey map, the most valuable of any of the kind extant. It exhibits the migrations of the Aztecs from the regions of the north to Mexico. Some of its hieroglyphic writings resemble those found in the Pearl of Great Price. Other maps showing the City of Mexico before the conquest A. D. 1520, and pictures exhibiting the landing of the Spaniards at Vera Cruz in 1519, as executed by native artists at the time, were found of historical interest, as they had been spread before Montezuma previous to the fall of his empire. In the art gallery a scene of the Valley of Mexico with Popocatepetl in the distance attracted attention as a gem of art costing the government of Mexico two thousand dollars. Elders Stewart and Trejo having visited and preached to a number of people, some believed. In the baths of the garden of Olives, located near the fatal causeway "Noche Treste"(Melancholy night), so called because of the disaster to Cortez and his army on July 1, 1520, Elder Thatcher baptized Platino C. Rhodacanaty and Silviano Artiago, the latter a pure Aztec and, therefore. a descendant of Joseph. Six other male members were added to the Church by baptism, two days later. At the meeting for confirmation, the objects of the Mexican mission were fully explained by him. At that meeting Elder Thatcher earnestly invoked blessings upon Porferio Diaz, President of the Mexican Republic, upon all constituting the legislative and judicial and administrative departments of the government and upon all the inhabitants of the land, to the end that the honest and good throughout Mexico, Central and South America might hear the Gospel of Christ and receive the tidings of great joy. Three Elders were ordained and a branch organized at that meeting. Elder Rhodacanaty was authorized to preside over it. By the close of the year sixteen persons had been baptized, the Voice of Warning had been partially translated into the Spanish language, and several articles written and published in the newspapers of the capital, defending the faith and practices of the Saints. During January the Spanish translation of the "Voice of Warning" was completed and the manuscripts placed in the hands of the printer.

On the 3rd of that month, while enjoying the grateful shades of the cypress groves of Chapultepec, Elder Thatcher wrote his "Tribute to the Memory of Montezuma" as published in Vol. I, p. 145, of the Contributor and which was subsequently dedicated to his friend, the honorable and learned Ygnacio M. Altamirano of pure Aztec blood, and then one of the judges of the Supreme Court of the Republic, an author of eminence, one of the greatest orators of the age, and in many respects a remarkable man.

The New York Sun having published an article respecting Elder Thatcher's mission to Mexico, numerous papers of the capital made extracts therefrom and comments thereon, mostly favorable. But the Two Republics under the headings, "Yankee Diplomacy," "Fillibusterism," and "The Spread of Mormonism," attacked violently the "Mormon" people generally. Through El Tribuna Elder Thatcher replied refuting the slanderous stricture of the Two Republics. Thereafter that paper handled the "Mormon" question more carefully. In the Sunday issue of Jan. 11th, El Monitor Republican, one of the most powerful and influential journals published in Mexico, appeared a ridiculously, scurrilous editorial article about the Saints. It greatly incensed Elder Trejo, who had imagined that those speaking his native tongue would never stoop to vilify the "Mormons," as others had done in the United States and Europe. His hopeful dream having been dispelled, he was exceedingly anxious to hunt up and punish the "Juvenal" editorial author of the defamatory article, but was restrained by counsel given in the interest of patience and moderation. The publication led William Pritchard, an intelligent and educated English gentleman, a newspaper correspondent and magazine author of merit, to seek the acquaintance of the missionaries from Utah.

And through his aid, Elders Thatcher and Trejo became acquainted with the wealthy proprietor of El Monitor Republicano, Signor Vicente Garcia Torres, who wrote for his paper over the nom de plume "Fancrido," while his son used that of "Alcestes," and "Juvenal" proved to be one Senor Enrigre Chavara, who, after a long interview with the Elders, published in the following Sunday's issue an article retracting the scurrilous assertions of the former one and giving an excellent account of the sobriety, honesty, industry and morality of the "Mormons" generally; and Elder Trejo admitted that the result would be more favorable to the cause than any physical chastisement given by him to the writer could possibly have produced. Through favorable and unfavorable newspaper comments and strictures, the replies and retractions, the interests of the "Mormon" mission were greatly forwarded, and the Elders made numerous acquaintances and friends of eminent men, through whom they extended their influence to government officials.

General Alan G. Greenwood of Roanoke, Virginia, who fought in the war of the rebellion on the side of the South, secured interviews for Elder Thtatcher with Senor Sarate, minister of foreign affairs, M. Fernandez Leal, minister of Fomento (public works and of colonization), and Senor Don Carlos Pacheco, minister of war. They found Minister Sarate, a gentleman of about forty years of age, affable, polite and exceedingly graceful, a fine conversasationalist, speaking with a slight French intonation, well informed on general topics as upon national governmental affairs. In sympathy with the expressed views of Elder Thatcher, respecting the Mexicans and their ancestors, he spoke feelingly about the high degree of civilization among the Indians of Mexico previous to the Spanish conquest. In Minister Leal the Elders met a man of some fifty years, of commanding presence, strong character, marked features with large Roman nose, grey eyes and bald head, manners cordial, conversation frank. He had visited Utah and greatly admired the pluck of her enterprising and prosperous communities, regarded the "Mormons" as the most successful colonizers in the world; and as such said that Mexico would gladly welcome any of them choosing to make homes in the Republic.

Minister Don Carlos Pacheco, the hero of Pueblo, lost a leg and arm while assaulting that city, during the French Intervention. He is a man of indomitable courage, hard to read, nervous temperament and abrupt manners, his half closed eyes seem to see everything. Direct and pointed himself, he requires only the "key words," brooking no detailed explanations; familiar with the history of others, he knows the needs of his own country. War has made of him a physical wreck, yet he is a power in the land and next to Diaz is the leading government official. He was frank and cordial to Elder Thatcher, to whom he granted the interview while scores of army officers were waiting, and conferred upon him distinguished honor by freely and voluntarily tendering him letters of introduction and recommendation to the Executives of the various States of the Union, in the event of his desire to visit them. Later Elder Thatcher had an extended interview with Senor Ignacio Mariscal, minister of justice, many years the accredited representative of the Mexican government at Washington, D. C., and at the Court of St. James, now Mexican minister of foreign affairs. He it was who so successfully conducted, in behalf of Mexico, the "Cutting affair." He is the ablest statesman and diplomat of the nation without doubt. A brainy man of brilliant attainments and a perfect gentleman, the master of several languages. He is familiar with the history of the Saints from the beginning. The organ of the government officially noticed all these interviews. Through Mr. Pritchard Elder Thatcher became acquainted with Emelio Biebuyck, a Belgian gentleman of influence in Mexico and familiar with Utah affairs, having been thrice in the Teritory—the first time when Col. Steptoe was at Salt Sake City. He was personally acquainted with Pres. Young, having enjoyed several pleasant interviews with him. His influence (which was considerable) over the Mexican press was largely due to the connection of his father with the Press Association of Europe. He was a warm advocate of "Mormon" colonization in Mexico, and having a colonization contract with the Mexican government, conceding free public lands in any State of the Union, eighty dollars subsidy for adults, and forty dollars each for children, twenty years exemption from military duty and from taxation; free entry from tariff duty on teams, wagons, agricultural implements, building materials and provisions, pending the establishment of the colony and numerous other subventive privileges; he was desirous to endorse the contract to the "Mormon" people with the approval of the government officials. "With the 'Mormons' in Mexico," said Mr. Biebuyck, "will come stable government and consequent peace and prosperity and, therefore, success to my business, and that is all I ask." Having thoroughly reflected upon and prayed about this matter, and feeling strongly impressed that the success of the mission must ultimately largely depend on "Mormon" colonization in Mexico and the careful, judicious gathering thereto of native Saints for care and instruction, it was finally determined that Elder Thatcher should return and, meeting Mr. Biebuyck on a given date, lay the whole matter, with all its bearings, before Pres. Taylor and the Council of Apostles and abide their decision.

Having arranged payment for publishing the Voice of Warnings he joined with Elders Stewart and Trejo in dedicating the land of Mexico to the end that the Gospel might spread among her people. They besought the Lord to rid the nation of revolutionary elements and the disposition to shed blood, to break the shackles from the bodies and minds of the poor Lamanites, that they might be free in the law of Christ. And that, as the coming of the Spanish conqueror foreshadowed their bondage, so might the Gospel forshadow their deliverance; that as the first overcame them with the sword, so might the proclamation of divine truth subdue and soften their hearts. To this end blessings upon the state and governmental officials and people were besought, that intrigues, plottings and rebellions might cease, and peace and prosperity reign instead thereof.

This accomplished, Elder Thatcher, receiving many expressions of friendship and confidence, leading men assuring him that "Mormon" colonists would be welcome in the Republic, left for Utah Feb. 4, 1880, leaving Elder Stewart in charge of the mission. Reaching Salt Lake City on the 22nd of the same month, he reported to Pres. Taylor,and having on the same day fully explained the causes leading to his return, his action was endorsed by unanimous vote of the Quorum of Apostles.

Ten days later Mr. Biebuyck arrived and explained in detail the nature and advantage of his valuable concessions as embodied in his contract with the Mexican government. These being discussed and carefully considered and taken under advisement, the Council finally reached the conclusion that the colonization of Latter-day Saints in Mexico at that time, even under the generous concessions of the contract mentioned, would be premature. Mr. Biebuyck's offer was therefore rejected. He was disappointed and a few days later departed for San Francisco, thence to New York and Europe. During his stay in Salt Lake City, he was a part of the time the guest of Pres. Taylor, who was much pleased with his frank manners, unassuming deportment and general understanding of men and things. So also were the other members of the Quorum of Apostles who became acquainted with him.

During the summer of 1880 Elder Thatcher visited Chicago and New York on important business matters involving interests of the Church, of the people of Cache Valley and of himself. During that trip he went to Virginia and visited relatives there. Returning to Utah he went in company with Apostle C. C. Rich, Wm. B. Preston, Lorin Farr, his brother Joseph W. Thatcher and others, to Salt River Valley,in Wyoming,where a few families of the Saints had settled. The supervision of settlement in that county having by vote of the Apostles been placed in the care of Elders Rich and Thatcher, the object of their trip was to organize those already settled in the valley. That was accomplished and the name of the valley was changed by vote from Salt River to Star Valley. It had been blest and dedicated to the Lord for the Saints on August 29, 1878, by Apostle Brigham Young, Moses Thatcher and William B.Preston, Elder Young offering the prayer. It is the finest and most beautiful valley in all the mountains, and is now rapidly filling up with Saints.

Having assisted in the organization of the Quorum of the First Presidency of the Church in October, 1880, Elder Thatcher, accompanied by Elder Feramorz L. Young, who had been called on a mission to Mexico, again left Utah, Nov. 17th, and reached the Mexican capital on the evening of Dec. 5, 1880. On the 10th of the same month he presented to the Mexican Geographical Society, for its library, the following Church works in full gilt morocco: Book of Mormon, Doctrine and Covenants, Pearl of Great Price, Key to Theology, Voice of Warning, Spencer's Letters, Hymn Book, Bound Book of Pamphlets, My First Mission, Catechism and String of Pearls. On the 18th he presented a similar set to the National Museum Library and received handsome acknowledgments from the officials of those library organizations. The Voice of Warning in Spanish had been extensively circulated, and 4,000 copies of Elder John Nicholson's "Means of Escape" had been translated, published and mostly distributed. During February, 1881, El Abogado Christiano, the monthly illustrated organ of the Methodists north, and Evangelista Mexicano, organ of the same sect south, published articles against the Saints. They were promptly replied to through the daily papers. During February and January Elder Thatcher also wrote a 32-page pamphlet entitled "Divine Origin of the Book of Mormon," which was translated into the Spanish and published. He also wrote a series on the same subject for publication in the Contributor, drawing evidence principally from historical works—mainly from the early Spanish historians and from Lord Kingsburne's "Mexican Antiquities." During March, Elder Thatcher wrote "Mormon Polygamy and Christian Monogamy Compared;" treating the subject from a biblical, hygienic, physiological and moral standpoint. It was published in the Spanish language and subsequently appeared in serial form in the Contributor. Quite a number had been added to the Church since the new year, and a branch was organized at Ozumba, at the base of Popocatepetl, 40 miles from the capital. On April 6, 1881, conference—the first Latter-day Saint gathering of the kind in Mexico—was held on that mountain about seventeen thousand feet above sea level. It required a day and a half of great exertion to reach the point, but all were richly repaid. "The rich may find the Lord in temples, but the poor can find Him on the mountains." Elder Thatcher also published several thousand copies of Elder Stewart's "Coming of the Messiah" and widely distributed them. During the summer the Elders continued to add new members to the Church; on one occasion Elder Thatcher baptized eight persons. Success created some animosity and jealousy, and as a result a plot was formed to test the divinity of the Elders' calling and discipleship by means of poison. One party agreed to furnish the poison, the other was to place it in the water from which the Elders drank. The heart of the latter failing him, he came to Elder Thatcher and confessed the whole thing.

Elder Thatcher was released from this mission in August, notice being received by telegraphic message on the 6th of that month. Sixty-one persons had been baptized. Accompanied by Elder Feramorz L. Young, he left the City of Mexico for home, via Vera Cruz, Havana and New York. Elder Young was ill, it was thought with malarial fever, but the disease developing into typhoid pneumonia, he died on the night of Sept. 27th, between Havana and the coast of Florida. There being insufficient ice on board the steamer to preserve the body, the weather being extremely oppressive, and no means of embalming, necessity compelled his burial at sea, which was done on the following day at 1 p. m., within about twenty miles of the coast of Florida, in Lat. 27, Long. 29. The care and subsequent death of this young missionary companion, and his burial at sea far from his mother, relatives and friends, was a trial under which Elder Thatcher's physical and mental powers encountered a test that greatly impaired his health and depressed his spirits. He reached home Oct. 8th, bringing with him Fernanda Lara, a young Mexican convert.

While in the Council of the Legislative Assembly and pending the passage of the Edmunds Bill, Elder Thatcher was called to Chicago, New York and Washington, D. C., being accompanied by Elder John Henry Smith. They carried with them numerously signed petitions askingCongress to pass no further proscriptive laws against Utah's people before sending a commission of investigation. They reached Washington Feb. 23, 1882; returned and attended the April Conference of the Church. At the following October Conference Elder Thatcher was called, in connection with Elder Erastus Snow, to explore in Mexico with the view of finding and purchasing some place suitable for a settlement of our people in that republic. They explored the head-waters of the Rio San Pedro and examined the San Bernidun Ranch on one of the tributaries of the Bivispa and Yagine Rivers in Sonora. Elder Snow, owing to illness, having returned home early in January, Elder Thatcher took a small company and a guide and explored the Santa Cruz, Cocosperu and Magdalina Valleys. He expected to cross into Mexico at La Noria, near San Raphial, but finding no Mexican custom-house there, he had to go out of the way, nearly one hundred miles, to Nogales. The guide was greatly annoyed by reason thereof and desired the company to go in without the necessary official permit, but his wishes were not complied with. Later the party learned that fifteen Mexican citizens had been killed by Apaches on the road; as near as could be calculated, at the point where the company would have been about the hour of the same day when the killing was done. Elder Thatcher returned to Utah in February, 1883, and in July following went on a mission to the northern Indians, having for missionary companions Elders Wm. B. Preston, Junius F. Wells, Bishop Gruwell, Amos Wright, James Brown (Indian), Moses Thatcher, jun., and Oscar Gruwell. They traveled via Beaver Canon, the Yellowstone National Park, down the Yellowstone River and across the Stillwater and Rosebud Rivers, visiting the Crow Indians at the latter place, delivering to some of the chiefs the message of peace and advising obedienc eand industry. They crossed the country mainly on an Indian trail to the Wind River, Washakie Agency, where council was held and similar advice given to the leading men. The party returned in September, having traveled some twelve hundred and fifty miles.

In December, 1883, Elder Thatcher was called to assist Delegate Caine at Washington, D. C., by soliciting the influence of personal friends and through them that of influential parties. He left home Jan. 4th, and returned early in April, 1884. In October of the same year he filled another mission to the Shoshones, who were disposed to be turbulent, sent presents and word, urging Washakie and his people to be at peace and not war. The advice was observed.

In January, 1885, he accompanied Pres. Taylor and party to Arizona and Mexico, and again explored on the Magdalina River in Sonora. He was appointed chairman of an exploringand purchasingcommittee of lands in Mexico, Pres. A. F. MacDonald, Christopher Layton, Jesse N. Smith and Lot Smith being the other members of the committee. He reached home Jan. 27th., assisted in gathering funds, and. ten days later, started again for Mexico, going into Chihuahua, reached Ascension, on the Rio Casas Grandes Feb. 20th, found several families of Saints there from Arizona, who, having received the impression that a purchase had been made in Chihuahua, came there by reason of the violent persecutions of courts, then prevailing in Arizona. He went to San Jose on the Mexican Central Railway, thence to El Paso, Texas. In company with Elder MacDonald, Anton Andersen, and Mr. Glenn(surveyor), explored the upper Rio Janas, in the Sierra Madres, and visited the strong holds of the Apache chiefs, "Victoria" and "Ju" and saw their fortifications and caves, in which they felt and were secure. They ascended "Cook's Peak" and saw the Rio Virdie Valleys and Corrales Basin since purchased. Elder Thatcher made himself familiar with Mexican land matters and gained knowledge respecting property for sale; located Saints on leased lands and returned.

Under the influence of Americans at the City of Chihuahua the governor of the State issued, in April, an order of expulsion against the Saints on the Rio Casas Grandes. Through the efforts of Elders Teasdale and MacDonald the executive was appealed to and finally consented to have the matter referred to the national officials at the capital. Elders Brigham Young and Thatcher being called to confer with those officials on the subject, reached the national capital May 11, 1885. They had interviews with Minister Mariscal of foreign affairs, Carlos Pacheco of Forento, minister of the interior and colonization, and with Pres. Proferio Diaz. The order of the governor of Chihuahua was revoked. When under pressure of enemies he subsequently reaffirmed it, he was removed.

Elder Thatcher reached home in June, and in July, 1886, was again called into Mexico to assist Elder Erastus Snow, who had been given charge of the settlement of our colony there, and to help in adjusting titles of purchases already made and to purchase other lands. This work was promptly seen to, Elder Thatcher again visiting the national capital in October, and while there, in company with Elder Snow, arrangements were made that resulted in the purchase of Corrales Basin, including Hop and Strawberry Valleys, comprising nearly 75,000 acres of timber, grazing and agricultural lands. The young colony needing machinery, Elder Thatcher visited St. David and the Gila settlements in January, 1887, and securing some assistance went to St. Louis and purchased a 25 horse-power engine, boiler and saw mill, shingle mill, sash mill and a combined planer and moulder,all of which are in operation and which, with cattle and necessary wagons, tools, etc., cost some $6,000. Since the first of the present year, the Saints have built a road costing nearly $2,000, and the Juarez town canal, 3½ miles long, costing about the same amount.

On the 1st of January, 1887, Elder Thatcher dedicated the Juarez townsite on the request of Apostle Snow. He has since explored somewhat extensively in the Sierra Madre Mountains and is still actively engaged, wherever directed, in the work of the Lord. For a number of years he has acted as Pres. W. Woodruff's assistant in the superintendency of the Young Men's Mutual Improvement Associations, and has also been an earnest writer for the Contributor.

THE TWELVE APOSTLES.

FRANCIS MARION LYMAN,

The eldest son of Amasa Masou Lyman and Louisa Maria Tanner, was born Jan. 12, 1840, near the town of McComb, McDonough Co., Illinois. His grand-parents were: paternal, Roswell* Lyman and Martha Mason; maternal, John Tanner and Lydia Stewart. His parents, being homeless, spent the winter with an old friend, Justus Morse, where Francis Marion was born. In the spring the family removed to Iowa on the halfbreed tract, where a cabin was built. In the spring of 1841 they moved into Nauvoo, in the winter of 1842 to Shockequon in Henderson County, and in 1843 to the town of Alquina, Fayette Co., Indiana. After the martyrdom of the Prophet Joseph and Patriarch Hyrum Smith in 1844, they moved back to Nauvoo.

In January, 1846, Francis M. with his sisters Mathilda and Ruth Adelia were taken into the Nauvoo Temple and were sealed to their parents in that holy house by President Brigham Young and Heber C. Kimball. In the following June he left Nauvoo for the west with his mother and three other children under the care of his grandfather John Tanner, his father having gone on ahead in the Pioneer corps. Francis M. remained in Winter Quarters, on the west bank of the Missouri River, till the spring of 1848. This year, when he was eight years of age, he was baptized and confirmed by his father, in the Elk Horn on the first day of July. He also drove a team of one yoke of cattle to a wagon, in which several members of his father's family rode from the Missouri River to Great Salt Lake Valley, where they arrived Oct. 19, 1848.

In 1851 he went to southern California with the family and was a "full hand" in driving loose stock all the way, to the San Bernardino Ranch, which was purchased by Amasa M. Lyman, C. C. Rich and their companions for a temporary home and outfitting point for the gathering Saints. He was given some chances in school at Winter Quarters, in Great Salt Lake City and in South Cottonwood, (Salt Lake Co.), but most of his school days were spent in the Cajon Pass under a large Sycamore tree, with James H. Rollins as teacher, and in San Bernardino, Cal.

In the fall of 1852 he went to Great Salt Lake City in company with his father and Elders C. C. Rich, John Murdock, Taylor Crosby and many others, where he spent the winter in school, and returned to San Bernardino in the spring of 1853, after witnessing the laying of the corner stones of the Salt Lake Temple in April. He was generally employed in the care and handling of cattle and horses and in freighting. He crossed the deserts between Utah and California sixteen times, and also spent about a year and a half at the joiners trade with Thomas W. Whittaker. At the time of the reformation in 1856 in San Bernardino he was rebaptized. At the same time he was ordained an Elder under the hands of his father.

In the spring of 1857, in company with his father, Elder C. C. Rich and others he went to Great Salt Lake City intending to go to England on a mission, but the coming of the army of the United States against the Saints caused a change in the programme. All misssionaries were called home, and also the Saints from San Bernardino. Instead of going to Europe, Brother Lyman's mission was changed to return to San Bernardino to close up business and move his father's family home to Utah. He returned early in October and entered fully into moving the people from that lovely place.

On the 18th of November, 1857, he received to wife Miss Rhoda Ann Taylor at the hands of President Wm. J. Cox. During the following winter he made two trips across the deserts in moving his own and his father's family.

At Cedar City, in 1858, an exploring party was organized by his father composed of the following brethren: Amasa M. Lyman, Robert Clift, Ira Hatch, Freeman E. Tanner, John D. Holliday, David H. Holliday, Henry G. Boyle, Walter E. Dodge, Wm. S. Warren, M. L. Shepherd, E. C. Mathews, E. T. Mills, F. T. Perris, Henry Jennings, Taylor Crosby, Nounon Taylor, Harvey Clark, Wm. H. Shearman and F. M. Lyman. Shearman was the able secretary and historian of the company. They started from Cedar City March 31st, crossed the great southern desert and went down the Colorado River as far as the Beal and Bishop Crossing and returned to Cedar City May 7th.

In the fall of 1859 Francis M. moved to Farmington, in Davis County, intending to take care of the farm while his father would be gone to England on a mission. Jan. 7, 1860, in Farmington, he was ordained a Seventy in the 40th quorum by Elder John S. Gleason. On the 9th he was chosen by Bishop John W. Hess as President of the Young Mens Literary Association of Farmington, which office he held during the winter.

That winter witnessed the beginning of his very active public life, which has continued ever since. Early next spring he was called on a mission to England, and he moved his family, consisting of a wife and one child, to Beaver, where he built a log room, the first he ever owned, in which he left them. He started from Great Salt Lake City May 1, 1860, for England, literally without purse or scrip, to preach the Gospel, in company with Elders Amasa M. Lyman, C. C. Rich and many others. On the way to New York, in company with Elder Reuben A. McBride, he visited Kirtland and the Temple, through which they were kindly shown by Martin Harris. With his father he also paid a visit to his grandmother, Martha, who was then the wife of Isaiah Emerson, and many more of the relatives on the Mason side of the family, in the States of New Hampshire, Vermont and Massachusetts. He sailed from New York, July 14th, on the steamship Edinburgh, in company with Elders Amasa M. Lyman, C. C. Rich, John Brown, James S. Brown, Jos. F. Smith, S. H. B. Smith, W. H. Dame, Jos. C. Rich, Reuben A. McBride, David M. Stuart, S. L. Adams and John Tobin, and arrived in Liverpool July 27th.

July 30th Elder F. M. Lyman was appointed to labor as a traveling Elder in the London Conference with Elder John Brown, under the Presidency of John Cook and went to his field of labor that day. On new year's day, 1862, he was appointed to preside over the Essex Conference, where he labored until April 30th, when he was released to return home.

He sailed from Liverpool May 13, 1862, on the William Tapscott, with a company of over eight hundred Saints, as second Counselor to Pres. Wm. Gibson. Elder John Clark was his first Counselor. They arrived in New York June 25th after a tedious passage of 42 days. Elders Clark and Lyman had to take entire charge of the company two weeks out from New York because of Pres. Gibson's incompetency. They at once took stock of all the companies' supplies and found it necessary to put all on half rations of water, flour, potatoes, pork, and in fact everything except junk and sea biscuit.

At New York Elder Lyman was put in sole charge of the company by Horace S. Eldredge and O. E. Bates and arrived in Florence in the beginning of July. He was busy on the camp ground of the Saints in Florence till August 15th, when he started for home in company with Elders Amasa M. Lyman, C. C. Rich, Joseph W. Young, Capt. Wm. H. Hooper and others, and arrived in Great Salt Lake City Sept. 16th and at his home in Beaver Oct. 16th. Under instructions from Pres. B. Young in March, 1863, he removed to Fillmore, which was destined to be his fixed home for more than fourteen years. From that time until June, 1877, he was very intimately connected with all principal political, Church and business matters of Millard County.

March 23, 1866, he was appointed U. S. assistant assessor of internal revenue for District No. 6, of the collection district of the Territory of Utah by Hugh McCulluck, secretary of the treasury. He served under the following assessors: Col. J. C. Little, A. L. Chetlain, John E. Smith, R. V. Morris and Dr. John P. Taggart. This same year (1866) he joined his father and built what is now known in Fillmore as the O. K. Flouring Mill. He engaged largely in the flour and grain trade as well as in other business enterprises.

In September, 1867, he was commissioned by Gov. Durkee as lieut.-colonel of the first regiment of militia in the Parowan Military District. In 1869 he was elected a member of the House of Representatives of the general assembly of the state of Deseret for Millard County. He subsequently represented Millard County in the Territorial Legislature in the 17th, 18th, 22nd and 23rd sessions, and Tooele County in the 24th and 25th sessions. During the last session (1882) he was speaker of the House. At the organization of the Millard Stake of Zion, March 9, 1869, he was chosen a member of the High Council, and was ordained a High Priest and set apart as a High Councilor, March 13th, by Pres. Thomas Callister. He also held the offices of prosecuting attorney and superintendent of common schools for Millard County, and was for many years the county clerk and recorder. He was secretary and treasurer of most of the county co-operative companies, and did nearly all the business connected with the entering of lands in that county, including homesteading, pre-empting and entering of townsites, in conjunction with Judge Edward Partridge and Mayor Jos. V. Robison.

Oct. 4, 1869, in Salt Lake City, he received to wife Miss Clara Caroline Callister, under the hands of Pres. D. H. Wells. On the 6th of October, 1873, he was called on his second mission to England; on the 16th he left his home and on the 20th left Salt Lake City, in company with R. V. Morris and thirteen other Elders. He sailed from New York Nov. 1st on the steamship Oceanic, of the White Star Line, being one of eighteen Elders, and landed in Liverpool Nov. 12th. On the following day Elder Lyman was appointed to succeed Elder John I. Hart in the presidency of the Nottingham Conference. He went to his field of labor on the 15th.

While on this mission he made a tour to Wales and Scotland. He also visited the Isle of Man, accompanied by Elder Lafayette Holbrook. On May 19. 1875, in company with Pres. Jos. F. Smith and Elders John Henry Smith, E. H. Freeman and Milton H. Hardy, he started from London on a visit to Denmark, Germany, Switzerland and France, from which they returned to London June 12th.

June 13th Elder Lyman was selected to succeed Elder Robert I. Burton in the presidency of the London Conference. On this mission the following named brethren were associated with him as traveling Elders, A. B. Taylor, J. F. Wells, John Squires, G. L. Farrell, W. A. C. Bryan and A. D. Young, in Nottingham, and Wm. L. Binder, H. C. Fowler and David K. Udall, in London.

Sept. 9, 1875, he was released to return home and sailed from Liverpool September 15th, together with Pres. Joseph F. Smith and a company of three hundred Saints, including fourteen returning missionaries, in charge of Elder R. V. Morris with other Elders assisting him, on the steamship Wyoming of the Guion Line. Elders Lyman and Smith landed in New York September 26th and took train that same day for Salt Lake City, where they arrived Oct. 1st. The emigrants landed on the 27th.

Elder Lyman reached his home in Fillmore Oct. 11th.

In April, 1877, he attended the dedication of the St. George Temple, traveling thither in company with Elders Edward Partridge, Nephi Pratt and Christian Anderson.

At the organization of the Tooele Stake of Zion, in Tooele City, June 24, 1877, he was sustained as President of that Stake, with Elders Jas. Ure and Wm. Jefferies as Counselors; and at the annual election in August, 1878, he was elected county recorder and representative to the Territorial Legislature from Tooele County. Although the election was fairly won by the People's Party with a majority of 300 votes over all the Liberal frauds, the Liberal County Court as a board of canvassers, declared the minority Liberal candidates duly elected. Hon. Wm. C. Rydalch, as selectman of the People's Party, emphatically protesting against the villainy to the last. The case was taken to the District Court by Elder Lyman for the people, to compel a proper count, where the case was decided in his favor. The Liberal canvassers appealed to the Supreme Court of the Territory, and after an eight months' legal struggle the right triumphed, the court compelled them by mandamus, to truly count and deliver Tooele County once more to the control and care of the People's Party, which was duly accomplished on the 29th of March, 1879. The Liberal office holders at the time of the change were as follows: W. B. Schyler, probate judge, E. C. Chase and D. W. Rench, selectmen, D. W. Mitchell, sheriff and assessor and collector, W. B. Dods, coroner, Edward Bird, county treasurer, E. F. Martin, county clerk and recorder, Lawrence Bethune, county superintendent of district schools, and Lawrence A. Brown, prosecuting attorney.

Those of the People's Party who took office at the change were as follows: F. M. Lyman, representative to the legislature, Hugh S. Gowans, probate judge, S. W. Woolley and D. H. Caldwell, selectmen, John Pickett, sheriff, John Gillespie, coroner, Wm. R. Judd, assessor and collector, Thomas Atkin, jun., treasurer, F. M. Lyman, clerk and recorder, J. R. Clark, superintendent of schools, and Lysander Gee, prosecuting attorney.

The experience of Tooele County at that time may justly be quoted as a sample of Liberal carpet-bag rule. When the Liberals received the county, it was out of debt, $4,000 ahead and the county scrip worth 100 cts. on the dollar. At the end of four years of ruin rule of the Liberals, the $4,000 were gone, all current taxes expended, a debt of about $15,000 fastened upon the county, and the county scrip refused at 10 cts. on the dollar.

Aug. 12, 1880, Elder Lyman started from Tooele,in company with John Gillespie, and joined Elders E. Snow and B. Young in Sanpete, where their company was partially made up for a tour to the southeast and south. They started from Fairview, Sanpete Co., Aug. 19th, and were joined by brethren from Parowan and Panguitch, at Castle Dale, Emery Co. The company comprised ten persons, namely, Erastus Snow, Brigham Young, Wm. H. Dame, John Gillespie, Alonzo Knight, James Houston, Israel Butt, Ashby Snow, George Young and F. M. Lyman. There were three carriages, one baggage wagon, ten horses and two mules. They visited San Juan mission, crossed the Southern Ute-Reservation,in Colorado,and the Navajo and Zuni Reservations, in New Mexico, and visited the settlements of the Saints in the Eastern Arizona and Little Colorado Stakes. The company returned to Utah early in October, and Elder Lyman reached his home in Tooele, Oct. 23rd, after traveling about eighteen hundred miles with teams. While away on that tour he was chosen at the General Conference in Salt Lake City, Oct. 10th, as one of the Twelve Apostles to fill a vacancy in that quorum caused by the reorganization of the First Presidency. He received his ordination in the Endowment House, Salt Lake City, Oct. 27th, from Pres. John Taylor, assisted by his Counselors, George Q. Cannon and Joseph F. Smith, and Apostles Wilford Woodruff, Orson Pratt, Erastus Snow, F. D. Richards, and Brigham Young and Counselor D.H. Wells.

Elder Lyman's first mission as an Apostle was to the Goose Creek country, in Cassia Co., Idaho,where quite a number of the Saints from Tooele Stake were locating. His party, consisting of Edw. Hunter, jun., John W. Cooley, John Q. Knowlton, Samuel F. Lee, Thomas W. Morgan, Cyrus Bates and W. A. Critchfield, started from Grantsville, Nov. 8th, crossed the desert west of the Great Salt Lake and, by way of Grouse Creek, reached Oakley, on Goose Creek, Nov. 11th. Encouraging meetings were held with the new settlers; the resources and facilities of the valley were carefully examined, and suitable counsel given to Elder Wm. C. Martindale and his assistants, who were in charge of the new settlements. The party returned to Tooele, Nov. 19th.

On December 3rd, Elder Lyman preached the funeral sermon of Patriarch Thos. Callister in Fillmore.

In December Elders Lyman and John Henry Smith were sent to Parowan, Iron Co., to harmonize the Presidency of the Stake and High Council. They started from Salt Lake City, Dec. 22nd, and returned Dec. 29th, having attended meetings in Beaver and Minersville also. Feb. 17, 1881, they started on a mission through the Stakes of Juab,Sanpete, Sevier, Panguitch,Kanab,St. George, Parowan and Beaver, and returned March 29th, having been gone forty days, traveling 900 miles (700 miles with team) and held 86 meetings. June 4th Elders Lyman, John Henry Smith and Junius F. Wells started on a mission south and were joined the next day, at Minersville, by Pres. John R. Murdock. They traveled through the Parowan, St. George, Panguitch, Beaver and Millard Stakes, and held meetings in most of the wards. On June 27th they organized a ward in Frisco, Beaver County, with Benjamin Bennett as Bishop,and S. H. Reeves and J. D. Irvine as his Counselors. They returned to Salt Lake City July 4th.

August 9th, Elder Lyman started from Salt Lake City for the Cassia County settlements, in Idaho, with the following brethren: John Henry Smith, H. J. Grant, Geo. S. Grant, O. P. Bates, Chas. L. Anderson, A.

H. Hale, A. W. Davis, John W. Cooley, F. M. Lyman, jun., A. J. Davis and Geo. A. Smith. They held meetings, gave additional organizations where such were required and returned to Salt Lake City Aug. 26th.

Oct. 20th, Elder Lyman and John H. Smith started on a tour to the Bear Lake Stake and held meetings in the settlements of Rich and Bear Lake Counties. They were called suddenly from this tour to join Pres. Taylor and company in a visit to the settlements of Millard, Beaver, Parowan and St. George Stakes.

Elder Lyman returned from St. George because of the death of his daughter Alta, and was thus prevented from returning with the company by way of the Kanab and Sevier Stakes. After the burial of his daughter, and having attended the Summit Stake conference Nov. 12th and 13th, in company with Pres. Jos. F. Smith and F. M. Lyman, jun., and also the Millard Stake conference on Nov. 26th and 27th, he hastened to meet Pres. Taylor and company at Gunnison, on their return from the south. The company attended the Sanpete Stake conference Nov. 30th and Dec. 1st, in Ephraim, and were joined by Pres. Jos. F. Smith, Elders John Henry Smith and C. W. Penrose. Meetings were held in different parts of Sanpete County by the Elders going out two and two, and all joined again and attended the Utah Stake conference Dec. 3rd and 4th, and reached Salt Lake City Dec. 5th. President Taylor was the only one of the Apostles who made the whole trip.

From the 21st of March to the 4th of April, 1882, Elder Lyman was on a mission in the Stakes of Sanpete and Millard, after which he moved part of his family to Provo and put his elder children in the B. Y. Academy for the following three years. On May 18th, he started south on a mission through the Stakes of Juab, Sanpete, Millard, Sevier, Panguitch and Beaver. He traveled in company with Pres. Woodruff, Elders F. D. Richards and John Henry Smith in Sanpete, was alone in Millard and with Bro. John H. Smith in Sevier, Panguitch and Beaver. They were joined by Elder Erastus Snow at Panguitch, and the three finished their labors together and returned to Salt Lake City June 21st. During this mission no less than half a dozen new wards or Bishoprics were organized. Jesse W. Crosby, jun., was sustained as President of the Panguitch Stake with M. M. Steele and Daniel Cameron as his Counselors. James Henrie was ordained a Patriarch. Daniel Thompson was sustained as first Counselor in the Presidency of the Millard Stake to fill the vacancy caused by the calling of Elder Edw. Partridge to preside over the Sandwich Islands Mission.

Between July 5th and 19th Elder Lyman attended the conferences of Parowan and Beaver Stakes and held meetings in the other settlements of those Stakes. He also spent a few days in the mountains east of Parowan with his brothers, Amasa M., Lorenzo S., Henry E., Charles R., William H., Solon E. and some of their families. Aug. 4th, he started from Provo, and joined Pres. Taylor's party at Salt Lake City, in a tour of the settlements of Cache and Bear Lake Valleys, attending conferences and holding meetings in the wards of those Stakes. The party consisted of Prests. John Taylor, Jos. F. Smith and W. Woodruff, Elders L. Snow, E. Snow, F. D. Richards, F. M. Lyman, John H. Smith and others. After the Cache Stake conference Pres. Taylor took Elders Moses Thatcher, F. M. Lyman and others with him to finish the rest of the northern mission. When they were nooning at the Temple Mill in the mountains between Cache and Bear Lake valleys, a message overtook them by express, requiring Pres. Taylor's immediate return to Salt Lake City. Pres. Taylor returned, and Elder Lyman continued his mission in company with his wife and daughter, Pres. C. O. Card and wife, and was joined in his labors by Elders William W. and John W. Taylor. They attended conference and many other meetings in Bear Lake Valley, Gentile Valley and Cache Valley, going by way of Soda Springs, and returned to Salt Lake City, Aug. 19th.

Sept. 21st, Elder Lyman, in company with Elders John Henry Smith, H. J. Grant, Bishop Edw. Hunter, jun., and the latter's daughter Ettie, started from Salt Lake City for the Goose Creek or Cassia County settlements, in Idaho. They went by train as far as Terrace. On this mission they completed the organization of the branches of Oakley, Little Basin, Albion, Cassia and Almo; in the Cassia Ward, under the Bishopric of Horton D. Haight, with Wm. C. Martindale and George Whittle as Counselors. They returned to Salt Lake City Sept. 29th.

From Nov. 16th to 23rd Elder Lyman was in company with Prests. Taylor, Cannon and Woodruff, Elders George Teasdale, George Reynolds and John Irvine in a preaching tour of the Sanpete and Juab Stakes.

On Nov. 17th President Taylor anounced to Elder Lyman that his Lamanite missionary labors would be to the Shoshones, of Tooele County, and the Utes, of Uintah. From Dec. 15th to 20th Elder Lyman joined the Presidency and half of his quorum in the conference at Logan and held meetings in most of the large settlements in Cache and Box Elder Stakes. At this conference the Cassia Ward with all its branches was detatched from the Tooele Stake and made a part of the Box Elder Stake.

At Grantsville, Dec. 30th, Elder Lyman sat in council with President Chas. L. Anderson, Bishop E. Hunter, jun., Wm. C. Rydalch, John T. Rich and Wm. H. Lee, and accepted the choice of the Presidency and Twelve of Bro. William Lee to take the Presidency of the Indian Mission in Tooele County. Owen H. Barrus and John A. Erickson were chosen as missionaries to the Lamanites. Subsequently Benjamin L. Bowen was also chosen for the same mission. They were to enter into this mission with their families.

From Jan. 6th to the 17th, 1883, Elder Lyman held meetings in all the wards of Millard Stake, assisted by the Presidency of the Stake. On Jan. 9th, he organized the Leamington Ward, with Lars Nielson Christensen as Bishop and Wm. A. Walker and B. P. Textorius as Counselors. Jan. 20th, he joined Prests. Taylor, Jos. F. Smith and W. Woodruff on their way from Salt Lake City to Ogden to attend the Weber Stake conference. Elder F. D. Richards joined the company in Ogden. At this conference Lewis W. Shurtliff was chosen as President of the Weber Stake, with C. F. Middleton and N. C. Flygare as Counselors. A new Bishopric for the Fourth Ward was organized with Bishop Edwin Stratford and Counselors Winthrop Farley and Thos. J. Stevens.

Jan. 22nd, Elder Lyman and Pres. Shurtliff held meeting in Plain City, when the Bishopric of that ward was given to George W. Bramwell, jun., with Counselors John Spiers and Peter C. Green. These brethren were ordained on the 23rd. Elders Lyman and Shurtliff also held meetings in Harrisville, Slaterville, North Ogden, West Weber and Hooperville, and returned to the City Jan. 24th.

From Feb. 16th to the 20th, inclusive, Elder Lyman and son F. M. Lyman, jun., attended the Sanpete Stake conference, in Ephraim, and also held meetings in Manti and Wales. At this conference he made arrangements with Bishop John Spencer and Indian Nephi, of Indianola, to accompany him in May or June of that year, on a mission to the Utes of Uintah. In March, accompanied by Elder Junius F. Wells, he made a preaching tour of the Emery Stake, holding meetings in all the settlements besides attending the conference in Huntington on the 3rd and 4th. At this conference the High Council of that Stake was sustained and organized. George Frandsen was ordained Bishop of the Price Ward, with E. W. McIntire and C. B. Rhodes as his Counselors.

March 13th, Elder Lyman started on a trip to Deep Creek, Tooele Co., in the interest of the Indian Mission, in company with Pres. C. L. Anderson and Elders W. C. Rydalch, John T. Rich and S. S. Worthington. He received by purchase over a thousand acres of land with water, much of it fenced, and with some buildings and other improvements for the establishment of an Indian Mission. He and his brethren preached the Gospel to the Lamanites, taught them the doctrines and history contained in the Book of Mormon and bore testimony to them of the restoration of the Gospel through Joseph Smith. He returned to Tooele March 21st.

On May 4th, he started from Provo, accompanied by Bishop John E. Booth as far as Heber City on his way to the Ute Indians of Uintah, and attended the Wasatch Stake conference on May 5th and 6th, in Heber City, where he made all necessary preparations for his mission. On the 9th, he and party, consisting of Pres. A. Hatch, Frank A. Fraughton and Geo. T. Giles moved out into Strawberry Valley, after having been hindered some time on the way by the breaking of a king bolt. In that valley they were joined by Bishop John Spencer and Hyrum Seely from Sanpete. These brethren had crossed the mountains from Spanish Fork Canyon, and were compelled to leave their wagon on top of the mountains in four feet of snow, with Indian Nephi to guard it and the supplies, as it was impossible to get the wagon and supplies out, Bros. Giles and Seely returned to their homes, having started out only to help across the mountain. The party laid over one day on Currant Creek, waiting for Bishop Spencer and Indian Nephi to bring up their baggage from their deserted wagon. In the afternoon of the 10th of May Elder Lyman walked to the top of a sugar loaf mountain about two miles and a half north of the camp, on Currant Creek, which is about one thousand feet above the table land, and there kneeled upon a large flat stone, facing the Indian country and offered up a prayer for the opening up of the mission to the Lamanites of that region, and particularly asked the Lord to soften the hearts of the Indian agents at Uintah and Ouray, on the Uncompahgre reservation. He had learned that these agents were very bitterly opposed to the "Mormon" people and their doctrines.

Early in the morning of the 12th, Elder Lyman was seized with what threatened to prove a fatal rupture, in the lower part of his body on the left side, which put him for two hours in the throes of death, from which he was only rescued by the power of God, through the laying on of hands by Pres. A. Hatch and the Elders of the camp. He was healed instantly as the hands were taken from his head. Up to this juncture, it seemed as if Satan were determined that the mission to the Utes should not be opened up. Immediately after the recovery of Elder Lyman, the company, now consisting of himself, Pres. Hatch, Bishop Spencer, Elders Fraughton and Indian Nephi, with two wagons and five horses, continued their journey without any further trouble. On the 15th, at the Uintah Agency, they were joined by Pres. A. K. Thurber, who had left Richfield on the 8th with his pack mule and riding horse and was alone till he fell in with A. C. Hatch, at Currant Creek, who was company for him to the agency.

Agents J. J. Critchlow, at Uintah, and J. F. Minniss, at Ouray, received the missionaries with marked kindness, and the white men at both agencies, including Agent Minniss, attended the meetings. The Gospel and the Book of Mormon were freely taught by Elder Lyman and his brethren, including Elder Nephi and Tabby and many more of the chief Utes, who are firm Latter-day Saints. They bore very powerful and fearless testimonies. A conference was held at Ashley on the 19th and 20th of May, when the following Indian missionaries were selected, sustained and set apart: Bishop Jeremiah Hatch, President, Israel Clark, Jeremiah Hatch, jun., Thomas Karren, George Glines and Thomas Bingham, jun. The party returned to Heber City on the 27th and Elder Lyman to Provo on the 28th of May. From the 6th to the 14th of June Elder Lyman made a tour of Millard County holding meeting in the principal settlements. From the 16th to the 27th of June he was one of the party with Prests. Taylor and Cannon on a southern tour. They held meetings at Nephi, Deseret, Minersville and Beaver, and attended the Parowan Stake conference on the 23rd and 24th, at which point Elder Erastus Snow joined the company.

August 11th, Elder Lyman took his son (F. M., jun.) and went by rail and team to Indianola, Sanpete Co., which is an Indian Ward, where they held meetings; the singing and much of the praying were done by the Lamanites. At this place a small company was formed consisting of the two Lymans, Bishop J. Spencer, Henry E. Gardner, Jos. Nephi Seely with wife and two little children, with two wagons, and Indian Nephi (who had been surnamed "Lehi" by Elder Lyman while on their former mission to Uintah), on horse back. They started on the 13th for Strawberry Valley, where they met Pres. A. Hatch, Bishop Wm. Forman, Frank A. Fraughton and other brethren with quite a number of ladies out on a picnic. They held meeting with a small company of red men, preached the Gospel to them and baptized three; the others were already members of the Church. Elder Lyman and son returned to Provo on the 16th.

On the 17th, Elder Lyman joined Elders Erastus Snow, Brigham Young, Charles Wilcken and Andrew Jenson, at Provo, in a tour of the Sanpete Stake, attended conference at Mt. Pleasant, and many other meetings. Lyman held meeting in Fountain Green and inaugurated there a new Bishop, James Yorgason, and returned to Provo on the 22nd. On Aug. 30th Elder Lyman joined Elder John Morgan from Salt Lake City, at Provo, went east over the D. and R. G. Ry. to the Emery Stake, attended conference at Castle Dale, Sept. 1st and 2nd, and also held meetings in the other wards. They then continued their journey eastward to Denver, and into San Luis Valley, in Colorado, and held conference at Manassa on the 8th and 9th; they also held meetings in all the wards. Elder Morgan was stricken down with sickness so that he could do but little preaching in that Stake. They then continued their journey making a thorough tour of the San Juan Stake and held conference at Bluff on the 22nd and 23rd, when L. C. Burnham was sustained and ordained Bishop of Burnham Ward, with Joshua Stevens and A. S. Farnsworth as Counselors. They visited Burnham and Mancos, parts of the Stake, and returned, visiting Leadville on the way, to Provo, where they arrived on the 29th.

In November Elders Lyman and C. W. Penrose attended the Wasatch Stake Conference. He made a tour of all the branches in the Cassia Ward, in Idaho, and on November 21st started south, taking with him his daughter Annie. At Scipio he selected Pres. Daniel Thompson to accompany him. Pres. A. H. Cannon joined him in his labors in Millard Stake, where the Seventies were reorganized. Pres. Ira N. Hinkley took the party to Beaver, and Pres. J. R. Murdock to Parowan and Panguitch. Meetings were held by the way and conference at Panguitch. Elder John Houston accompanied the party through the Kanab, St. George and Parowan Stakes, where conferences or other meetings were held in most of the settlements. Pres. Woodruff, Erastus Snow and George Teasdale were also present at the St. George conference on Dec. 15th and 16th. Elder Edw. M. Dalton accompanied the party to Milford from Parowan, and Elder Lyman returned to Provo Dec. 25th, after having traveled 905 miles, attended five quarterly conferences, and altogether 60 meetings in 35 days.

Dec. 27th, he joined company with Pres. Jos. F. Smith at Provo, on his way to the conference in Beaver, which they attended on the 29th and 30th, held meeting in Minersville on the 31st and returned to Provo Jan. 1, 1884.

April 17, 1884, Elder Lyman accompanied Prests. John Taylor and Geo. Q. Cannon with the committee on the Iron Works, viz: Wm. Jennings, Moses Thatcher, Erastus Snow, John R. Murdock, F. M. Lyman and Elias Morris, also Supt. John Sharp and many others—23 all told—to the south country. They held meetings through Beaver and Parowan Stakes, visited the iron mines and works at Iron City, and reported upon the changes of that interprise.

Elder Lyman returned by way of Parowan, Beaver, Fillmore and Deseret to Salt Lake City April 28th. On May 3rd he started with Elder B. Young on a mission to Arizona, by way of Denver, Pueblo and Albuquerque. They held conference in St. Johns, Apache Co., Arizona, May 17th and 18th, and in St. Joseph, in the Little Colorado Stake, May 31st and June 1st. They also visited and instructed the people of all the other settlements in those Stakes. In visiting Prescott, the capital of Arizona, they were joined by Pres. Lot Smith and by Daniel Seegmiller, where they were courteously received by Gov. F. A. Tritle, Secretary Van Arman, Judge Sumner Howard, Sheriff Henkle and members of the bar. They visited Fort Moroni, in the San Francisco mountains. Returning from the capital, they crossed the country from Holbrook, on the Atlantic and Pacific railway, by Woodruff, Snowflake, Erastus, St. Johns, Zuni village and Reservation Savoia and Fort Wingate, then to the railway again, and reached Salt Lake City on June 20th.

From July 9th to the 23rd Elder Lyman was off on a preaching tour through Millard Stake. August 5th, he joined President Taylor's party, including Pres. Geo. Q. Cannon, Elders L. John Nuttall, John Irvine and a number of sisters in a tour of the Bear Lake, Bannock, Oneida and Cache Stakes. Conferences or other meetings were held in the settlements in detail, including the Indian Mission and settlements in Malad Valley. The High Council of the Bannock Stake and several Bishoprics were organized, and a large amount of important business transacted in each Stake. Elder Geo. Teasdale joined the company at Evanston, and was with it the balance of the tour. Elders Erastus Snow and Sol. H. Hale, from Gentile Valley, joined the party at the conference in Paris on the 10th, also Pres. C. O. Card from Logan. They returned as soon as conference was over. After a laborious mission the party returned to Salt Lake City Aug. 28th and was met in Ogden by Pres. Jos. F. Smith, Elders Erastus Snow and John Morgan.

From Sept. 18th to 25th Elder Lyman was preaching in the Millard Stake settlements. On Nov. 14th, he joined Prests. Taylor, Geo. Q. Cannon, W. Woodruff and Elders Moses Thatcher, W. N. Dusenberry, L. John Nuttall and John Irvine in a tour of the Sanpete Stake and holding conference in Ephraim, and visiting the Temple in Manti. The party returned to Salt Lake City, while Elder Lyman continued his mission south, in company with Pres. A. K. Thurber, holding meetings by the way and conference in Richfield, Nov. 22nd and 23rd, where he was joined by Elder Geo. Teasdale and Pres. S. B. Young. The reorganization of the Seventies of the Sevier Stake was accomplished. Elders Lyman, Teasdale and Pres. Thurber made a tour of Rabbit Valley and Grass Valley, attended the Panguitch Stake conference on the 29th and 30th, and visited the out-of-the-way settlements of Escalante and Cannonville, accompanied by Pres. Jesse W. Crosby, jun. At Cannonville they effected a ward organization with Wm. J. Henderson as Bishop, and Daniel Goulding and E. H. Thompson as his Counselors. The Elders with Pres. Crosby extended their mission through the Stakes of Kanab, St. George and Parowan, attended the confereuces and held meetings in all the wards by the way. They shared their labors in St. George with Elder Erastus Snow and were taken from Parowan to Milford by Elder Edw. M. Dalton on the 22nd, and reached Salt Lake Dec. 23rd. On the 24th Elder Lyman took quite a number of his family to Payson, where he attended the reunion of the Tanner family, which lasted over the 25th, 26th and 27th. Elder F. D. Richards and members of his family were also in attendance.

On the 27th Elder Sidney Tanner was ordained a Patriarch to the family and promised five years more lease of life, if he would faithfully attend to the duties of his office, although he was at that time 75 years of age.

On the evening of the 27th Elder Lyman took train for Beaver, where he joined Elder Teasdale in conference at noon on the 28th. The two Elders were engaged with important business in Beaver on the 29th and 30th, and while holding meeting in Adamsville in the evening of the 30th, Elder Lyman received a message from Pres. Taylor requesting him to be in Salt Lake City on the 2nd of January, 1885, "prepared to take a few weeks' trip."

Jan. 3, 1885, Pres. Taylor's party started out over the Utah Central and Union Pacific Railways by way of Denver, Pueblo and Albuquerque. The party was made up as follows: Prests. John Taylor and Joseph F. Smith, Elders Brigham Young, Moses Thatcher, F. M. Lyman, John Q. Cannon, Jesse N. Smith, Lot Smith, C. W. Penrose, John Sharp, George Reynolds, Daniel S. Spencer, Charles Barrell, Brigham Randall and Mr. Miller. Elder Erastus Snow joined the party at Pueblo, traveling by the D. & R. G. Ry. Elders Young and Penrose and Mr. Miller parted from the company at Cheyenne Jan. 4th. While Pres. Taylor and the rest of the party were making the tour of the eastern Arizona and Little Colorado Stakes, Elder Lyman and Bishop John Sharp made a trip to Prescott on business, and returned to Holbrook, on the Atlantic and Pacific Railway, where they again joined company with the main party on Jan. 11th, and traveled to Albuquerque the same evening, where they transferred to the A. T. and S. F. Ry., and reached St. David on the 13th on their way into Sonora. The 14th was spent in St. David, and on the 15th they ran down past Nogales, and Hermosilla, the capital of Sonora, to Guaymas, on the Gulf of California. Returning to St. David they parted company with Prests. Jesse N. and Lot Smith and were joined by Pres. C. Layton. They made a tour of the Maricopa Stake, after which Elder Lyman and Pres. C. Layton on Jan. 21st visited Elders Flake and Skouson in the Yuma Penitentiary, Arizona. (These were the first of our brethren ever committed to that prison for conscience sake.) They joined the main party again on the 22nd and continued the tour by way of Los Angeles, San Francisco and Sacramento to Salt Lake City, where they arrived Jan. 27th.

While this party was away many threats were in the air that Pres. Taylor and other members of the party would be arrested at once on their arrival either at Ogden or Salt Lake City. Nothing of the kind was attempted. Since that time, however, it has seemed wise for the Presidency and some of the Apostles to withdraw from the public gaze and to perform their duties in a more retired way.

Feb. 9th, Elder Lyman went to Payson. At Nephi, on the 13th he was joined by Elders H. J. Grant, S. B. Young and C. D. Fjeldsted. They attended the Stake conference in Manti on the 14th and 15th. Elders Lyman and Grant continued their mission to Gunnison, Scipio and Fillmore. At the latter place Stake conference was held on the 21st and 22nd. At this conference Bishop Joseph D. Smith was honorably released from the Bishopric of the Fillmore ward, as he was soon to start on a mission to Europe. Thomas C. Callister was chosen and ordained Bishop to fill the vacancy, and Alma Greenwood and James A. Melville were set apart as his Counselors. Elder Grant returned to the City on the 23rd and Elder Lyman on the 24th.

From Feb. 26th to March 9th, Elders Lyman and Grant made a tour of the Emery Stake and Pleasant Valley coal mines. From March 31st to April 8th Elder Lyman was in attendance at the General Annual Conference, at Logan, at which time the U. S. marshal and his deputies were present in force from Salt Lake City and Idaho, with the air full of threats to arrest, and to enter the Temple in the hope of finding the Presidency. Elder Lyman and Erastus Snow attended the Stake conference at Coalville, Summit Co., on May 9th and 10th.

From May 12th to the 24th Elder Lyman was on a visit to the Deep Creek Indian Mission, in company with Pres. H. S. Gowans and Elder Wm. C. Rydalch. On this occasion Pres. Wm. Lee, at his own request, was honorably released from the Indian Mission because of his age and feebleness. Elder Owen H. Barrus was then chosen to preside in the mission with John A. Erickson and Benjamin L. Bowen as his Counselors.

June 5th, Elder Lyman was appointed on an exploring mission to Mexico to be joined at El Paso, in Texas, by Senor Ignacio Gomez del Campo, from the city of Mexico, to examine government lands suitable for the settlements. From June 12th to the 30th he and John Henry Smith performed a mission in Millard, Parowan and Beaver Stakes. Elder H. J. Grant joined them at Minersville and shared in the labors at the Parowan Stake conference on the 20th and 21st, at which time Bishop John E. Dalley was sustained as first Counselor in the Presidency of the Stake. Bishop Wm. C. Mitchell as a member of the High Council. The two wards of Parowan were joined in one, with Charles Adams as Bishop and W. C. McGregor and Lars Mortensen as his Counselors.

July 3rd, Elder Lyman left his home in Tooele on his mission to Mexico, at which time members of his family were prostrated with serious attacks of sickness. He left Salt Lake City July 5th without a companion, traveling by rail to El Paso, Texas, where he arrived July 8th, and was met by Elders George Teasdale and Jesse N. Smith on the 9th. Elder Lyman was very kindly received by Senor Escobar, Mexican consul at El Paso, who introduced him to Senor Campo.

At this time the States of Chihuahua and Sonora in Mexico, as well as Arizona, were in terror from the murderous raids of Geronimo, the Apache chief, and his band of outlaws, and they were understood to be in the Sierra Madre, in the State of Chihuahua, the very country they were to explore. Hence Senor Campo concluded to send a military man—Colonel Angel Boquet—with orders for a company of Mexican troops for their protection, should they need them. Elders Lyman, Teasdale and party reached Corralitos, on the Casas Grandes River, in the State of Chihuahua, July 16th, where four days were spent in holding meetings with the camps of the Saints and in getting together a small company of explorers, with riding and pack animals, saddles, provisions, arms and ammunitions. Colonel Boquet would not consent to enter the mountains without soldiers, as news of fresh raids on ranches with murder and robbery came in every few days. The party all told was as follows: F. M. Lyman, George Teasdale, A. F. Macdonald, Jesse N. Smith, Geo. C. (or Parson) Williams, Isaac Turley, A. L. Farnsworth, Edmund Richardson, Moses M. Sanders and Israel Call.

On July 20th they started from Turley's Camp, on the Casas Grandes River. The colonel was not ready with his soldiers, but proposed to overtake the party after a few days. With his troops he attempted to overtake the explorers, but failed, and suffered greatly for want of food before they found their way back to the settlements and supplies. The party finished their explorations July 31st and arrived at Pres. Jesse N. Smith's camp, near La Ascencion, where they were joined by Elders Erastus Snow, John W. Taylor and Frank R. Snow, Aug. 2nd.

August 6th, after having visited all the camps of the Saints in that region of country, Elders E. Snow, Lyman, Teasdale, Taylor and F. R. Snow took passage in wagons with Pres. Lot Smith and M. M. Sanders for San Jose station, on the Mexican Central Railroad. From that point Elders Teasdale, Smith and Sanders returned to the camps, the others going to El Paso by rail, where they were met by Elder Brigham Young and President C. Layton on the 9th.

August 13th, Elders Snow and Lyman started by the Mexican Central Railway for the city of Mexico, where they arrived August 16th. The mission to the city of Mexico and the regions round about occupied those brethren till Sept. 7th. Elder Helaman Pratt, who presided in the Mexican Mission, was located in the city of Mexico with his family, also Elder Horace Cummings. At Ozumba Elders Isaac J. Stewart and Wm. W. Cluff, jun., were located. Elders Snow and Lyman took leave of the city of Mexico Sept. 7th and arrived in Salt Lake City on the 13th, traveling all the distance by rail.

In October Elder Lyman was in attendance at the General Semi-Annual Conference of the Church in Logan, in connection with Elders F. Richards, Moses Thatcher, John Henry Smith, Heber J. Grant and John W. Taylor, of the Apostles; and on his return to Salt Lake City, with Elder John Henry Smith, held meetings in Hyrum and Wellsville; at the latter place they were assisted by Elder Moses Thatcher; they also held meetings in Mantua, Brigham, Willard and Huntsville.

From Oct. 20th to Nov. 6th Elder Lyman was on a mission to all the settlements of Emery Stake, assisted on the west side of the Stake by Elder B. Young and at Price and Moab, on Grand River, by Elder H. J. Grant. Having been called on another mission to Mexico, he started from Salt Lake City Nov. 10th, in company with Elders Erastus Snow and Brigham Young for the south. They went by rail to Holbrook, on the Atlantic and Pacific Railway, from which point they traveled by team preaching the Gospel in all the settlements of the Little Colorado and Eastern Arizona Stakes, and then crossed the great Mogollon Mountains to the Gila settlements, in the St. Joseph Stake. The murderous Apaches were stealing and killing at the time on every hand. They reached the settlement of Safford Nov. 29th and on the 1st of December, on the road they had passed over, Lorenzo S. Wright, aged 31 years, and Seth Wright, 21 years of age, sons of the late Hon. Jonathan C. Wright, of Box Elder County, Utah, were shot to death by Apaches. Elders Snow, Young and Lyman each spoke at the funeral of the murdered brethren in Layton Dec. 2nd. After finishing their labors among the Gila settlements the brethren who accompanied the Apostles over the mountains (including Pres. Oscar Mann, Bishop Edward Noble, Smith D. Rogers, Price Nelson and others) returned home, and the Elders traveled by teams to St. David on the San Pedro River, accompanied by Prests. Layton, Martineau and Johnson and Bishop Taylor, of Pima, where they arrived Dec. 5th.

From Dec. 11th to 21st the following brethren were gone on an exploring tour in Sonora as far south as the dilapidated town of Arispe, the ex-capital of the State of Sonora, on the Sonora River, viz: Brigham Young, F. M. Lyman, John W. Campbell, John Hill, Thos. S. Merrill, Joseph N. Curtis and M. G. Trejo. Elder Snow in the meantime made a tour of the Maricopa stake, on Salt River. On the return of the exploring party they were joined at St. David by Elders Erastus Snow and Geo. Teasdale.

Dec. 24th Elders Young and Lyman took train at Benson on the Southern Pacific Railway, accompanied to Deming by Elder Teasdale, and arrived in Salt Lake City Dec. 29, 1885. Elder Lyman traveled in 1884 and 1885 about 36,000 miles.

Jan. 19, 1886, Elder Lyman's family were accorded a hearing before the grand jury of the Third District Court, in Salt Lake City, and since that time it has been deemed unsafe for him to remain in Utah Territory.

SALT LAKE COUNTY.

Salt Lake County contains that part of Utah Territory "which is bounded south by Utah County, west by the summit of the range of mountains (Oquirrh) between Great Salt Lake and Tooele Valleys and a line running from the northern termination of saidsummit through Black Rock on the south shore of Great Salt Lake, north by the shore of said lake easterly to the mouth of the Jordan River, thence by the centre of the channel of said river to a point due west from the Hot Springs north of Salt Lake City, thence by a line running due east to said Hot Springs, thence by the summit of the spur range terminating at such Hot Springs to its intersection with the summit of the Wasatch Mountains, and east by the summit of said Mountains," which separate Salt Lake County from Summit and Wasatch Counties. All the islands in the Great Salt Lake also belong to Salt Lake County for election, revenue and judicial purposes.

Salt Lake County is the oldest most populous and richest county in Utah and covers an area of about twelve hundred square miles. The county has almost double the population of any other, while its capital, Salt Lake City, has about four times the number of inhabitants that the next largest city in Utah contains. The area of the county is not very large, but it is thickly settled. Salt Lake County is a practical embodiment, or representative, of all the counties north of the southern rim of the Salt Lake Basin. It contains a great number of farms, which are utilized to the best advantage; its irrigating system is the most perfect; all the minerals that have contributed to the wealth of other communities, excepting, perhaps, coal, are found in Salt Lake County in great abundance and are unusually easy of access. The natural tendency of wealth has been and still is to concentrate here, where the capital of the Territory is; and trade has consequently followed, or come with it hand in hand. The most remarkable granite deposits exist in this county, and in Little Cottonwood Canyon. This has for years been a source of wealth. The Salt Lake Temple is built of granite quarried from this deposit, while frequent demands are made for it for other purposes. The Salt Lake Assembly Hall is also constructed of the same stone. There are two woolen mills in the county; the largest tannery and shoe factory in the Territory; numerous smelting and reduction and sampling works, lead pipe and white lead works. Of a population bordering on 35,000 souls, Salt Lake City itself has close on 25,000, which leaves 10,000 for the farming, mining and stock-raising inhabitants of the county. The east side of the valley is most thickly settled, because the Wasatch Range yields an abundance of water which is utilized for farming; while the low Oquirrh Range on the western side of the valley affords but few and insufficient streams. Canals are being constructed and artesian wells bored, which are assisting very materially in the more rapid settlement of the western half of the county, and give promise that, in a few years, it will not be behind the eastern half, with all its natural advantages. The Jordan River, the outlet for Utah Lake, runs almost through the centre of the county and finds its way to the Great Salt Lake. The other principal streams in the county are City Creek, Red Butte Creek, Emigration Creek, Canyon or Parley's Creek, Mill Creek, Big and Little Cottonwoods Creeks, all rising in the Wasatch Mountains on the east, and Bingham Creek, Rose Creek and Butterfield Creek, whose sources are in the Oquirrh range of mountains on the west.

The earliest, and perhaps the richest mining districts in which gold and silver, and lead and copper were found in abundance in the Territory, and which first excited attention, were discovered in this county. The Bingham or West Mountain district is inferior, only to the Tintic Districts. There are also the Little Cottonwood and Big Cottonwood districts in the Wasatch Range, in both of which are hundreds of good properties. The other mining districts in the county are Adams', Hot Springs, Draper, Granite, Red Butte, Island and New Eldorado. Gold, silver, lead, copper, iron, marble and salt abounds.

The people of Salt Lake County generally are wealthy in homes, in excellent farms, in a fine grade of cattle and horses, in mannfactures, and in all that contributes to wealth and to its permanent increase through economic resources. The mineral springs—Hot and Warm so called—are among the most noted in the West, while the Great Salt Lake is yearly visited by thousands who pass through this county to reach its shores. It is a central point for nearly all the railroads in the Territory. Salt Lake City is not only the capital of the county, but of the Territory.

Salt Lake County is at present divided into 31 voting precincts. Of these five are in Salt Lake City, namely the First (comprising the First, Second, Third, Eighth, Ninth and Tenth Bishop's Wards). Second (comprising the Fourth, Fifth, Sixth, Seventh, Fourteenth and Fifteenth Bishop's Wards). Third (comprising the Sixteenth, Seventeenth and Nineteenth Bishop's Wards). Fourth (comprising the Eighteenth, Twentieth and Twenty-first Bishop's Wards) and Fifth (comprising the Eleventh, Twelfth and Thirteenth BishopsWards. The country district is divided into 26 precincts, namely, Big Cottonwood, Bingham, Bluff Dale, Brighton, Butler, Draper, East Mill Creek, Farmers, Granger, Granite, Herriman, Hunter, Little Cottonwood, Mill Creek, Mountain Dell, North Jordan, North Point, Pleasant Green, Riverton, Sandy, Silverton, South Cottonwood, South Jordan, Sugar House, Union and West Jordan.

The county is also divided into school districts numbered respectively from 1 to 64, with a few numbers omitted.

HISTORY—Salt Lake County, originally known as Great Salt Lake County, was first created by an act passed by the General Assembly of the State of Deseret, in Dec., 1849. This act was ratified by the Legislative Assembly of Utah Territory Feb. 3, 1852. On March 15th following the county was fully organized with Elias Smith as probate judge. Its present boundaries were established by an act of the Utah Legislature approved Jan. 10, 1866.

When the county was first organized in 1852, it was divided into four voting precincts, to wit., G. S. L. City, Farmers, Cottonwood and West Jordan Precincts. Draper Precinct was added March 4, 1856 by order of the county court. On July 21, 1863, the county court redistricted the county, dividing it into 11 precincts (4 in G. S. L. City and 7 in the country) namely: First, Second, Third and Fourth Precincts of G. S. L. City, and Sugar House, Mill Creek, Big Cottonwood, South Cottonwood, Union, Fort Herriman and Draper, the latter being the only one whose boundary lines were not changed. By subsequently dividing and subdividing those precincts the following new ones have since been established:

HISTORY OF THE STAKE PRESIDENCY AND HIGH COUNCIL—The Pioneers, under the direction of President B. Young, arrived in Great Salt Lake Valley in July, 1847, Before returning to Winter Quarters, the Twelve Apostles made preparations for the organization of a Stake of Zion in the valley, by appointing John Smith President, with Charles C. Rich and John Young as Counselors. This organization was to take effect on the arrival of the emigrant companies in the fall.

On the 3rd of October, 1847, the Saints met in conference in the G. S. L. City fort, when the above named brethren were sustained as a Presidency of the Saints in the valley, and the following Elders were at the same time sustained as members of the High Council: Henry G. Sherwood, Thomas Grover, Levi Jackman, John Murdock, Daniel Spencer, Lewis Abbott, Ira Eldredge, Edson Whipple, Shadrach Roundy, John Vance, Willard Snow and Abraham O. Smoot. Albert Carrington was sustained as clerk of the High Council.

At the General Conference held in G. S. L. City, Oct. 8, 1848, Charles C. Rich was sustained as the President of the Church in G. S. L. Valley, in place of John Smith, who was appointed presiding Patriarch to the Church. John Young and Erastus Snow were sustained as Counselors to President Rich. The members of the High Council were sustained as at the preceding conference, with the exception of Thomas Grover, whose name was omitted. Newel K. Whitney was sustained as Presiding Bishop.

In a council of the Twelve Apostles held in the house of George B. Wallace, G. S. L. City, Feb. 13, 1849, a more permanent Stake organization was effected with Daniel Spencer as President and David Fullmer and Willard Snow as his Counselors. Elders Charles C. Rich and Erastus Snow had been ordained into the quorum of Twelve Apostles the day previous. On the 14th, it was decided to divide G. S. L. City into nineteen Wards, and on the 16th the High Council was also organized with Isaac Morley as President, and the following named members: Eleazer Miller, Levi Jackman, John Vance, Henry G. Sherwood, Edwin D. Woolley, Titus Billings, Shadrach Roundy, Ira Eldredge, Phinehas Richards, Wm. W. Mayor and Elisha H. Groves. The Stake authorities were ordained and set apart by the First Presidency and Twelve Apostles.

At the General Conference in October, 1849, Henry G. Sherwood was appointed President of the High Council, instead of Isaac Morley, who was called to preside over the settlement founded in Sanpete Valley. Heman Hyde and John Kempton were sustained as members of the High Council instead of Phinehas Richards and Titus Billings, who had also moved away from the city.

At the April Conference, 1850, Thos. Grover was sustained as a member of the High Council, but as he shortly afterwards went to the States, John Parry was sustained as a High Councilor in his place, at the General Conference held in G. S. L. City, Sept. 8, 1850.

At the General Conference held Sept. 8, 1851, Elders Winslow Farr and William Snow were voted to be members of the High Council, instead of Lewis Abbott, deceased, and Elisha H. Groves, who had removed south. Nathaniel H. Felt was sustained as a member of the Council at the October Conference, 1852, Henry G. Sherwood having denied the faith.

Willard Snow having been sent on a mission to Europe in the fall of 1851, and Daniel Spencer in 1852, Counselor David Fullmer, at the April Conference, 1853, was voted to be President of the Stake. Thomas Rhoads and Phinehas H. Young were subsequently chosen as his Counselors.

At the April Conference, 1853, Phinehas Richards was called to fill the vacancy in the High Council caused by the death of John Kempton Dec. 18, 1852. William W. Mayor being sent on a mission to England, Seth M. Blair was added to the Council in his stead, at the October Conference, 1853.

At the fall conference, 1854, Daniel Garn and Ira Ames were added to the Council, instead of Nathaniel H. Felt and Seth M. Blair, who were absent on missions.

After these changes the Council stood intact until October 1859.

At the October Conference, 1856, Elder Daniel Spencer, who had returned from his mission to Europe, was again sustained as President of the Stake. David Fullmer and Thomas Rhoads were chosen as his Counselors.

At the General Conference held in G. S. L. City, Oct. 8, 1859, the High Council was, on motion, dissolved, because of its members being too scattered to attend to business. A few days later, Oct. 16, 1859, a new High Council was organized consisting of the following brethren, who were ordained at Pres. Young's Office: W. Eddington, James A. Little, Claudius V. Spencer, Samuel W. Richards, George Nebeker, John T. Caine, Joseph W. Young, Gilbert Clements, Edward Partridge, Franklin B. Woolley, Orson Pratt, jun., and Joseph F. Smith.

At the April Conference, 1860. George B. Wallace was sustained as second Counselor to Pres. Daniel Spencer, instead of Thomas Rhoads who had moved away.

At the April Conference, 1861, John V. Long, John L. Blythe, Brigham Young, jun., and Howard O. Spencer were sustained as members of the High Council instead of Joseph F. Smith, C. V. Spencer, Edward Partridge and Samuel W. Richards, who were absent on missions.

At the General Conference, April 7, 1862, Claud. V. Spencer, who had returned from his mission to Europe, was sustained as a member of the High Council instead of James A. Little, Thos. B. Broderick instead of Franklin B. Woolley, and James H. Hart instead of Orson Pratt, jun. Elders Spencer, Hart and Broderick were blessed and set apart for their positions, April 10, 1862.

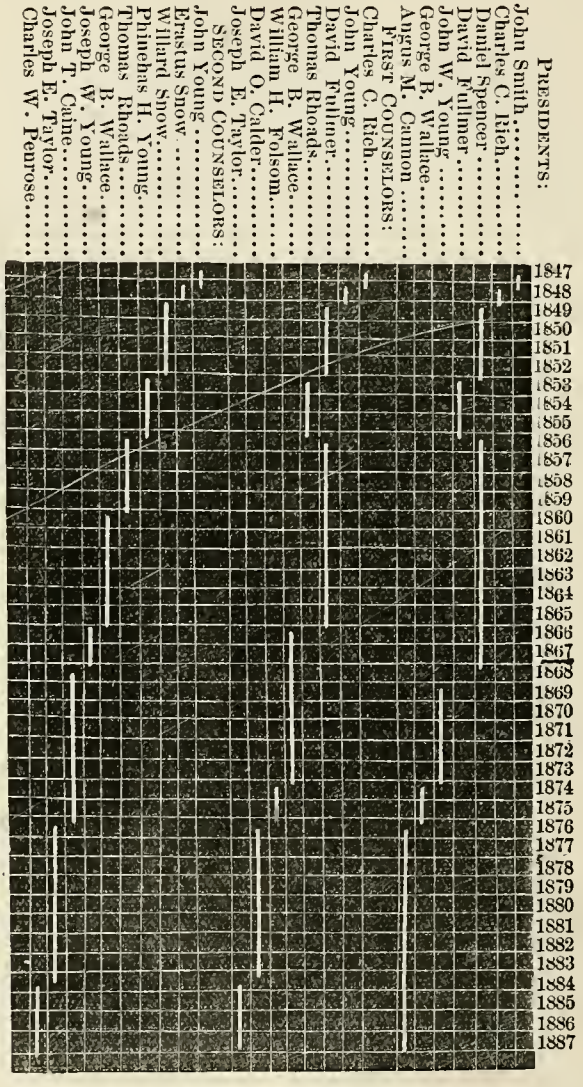
At the semi-annual conference October 7, 1862, John Squires and Wm. H. Folsom were sustained as members of the High Council in the places of Gilbert Clements, who had left the country, and Brigham Young, jun., who was absent on a mission to England.

Elders Emanuel M. Murphy and Thomas E. Jeremy were sustained as members of the High Council, at the semi-annual conference, Oct. 8, 1864, instead of Thomas B.



Broderick, deceased, and James H. Hart, who had removed to Bear Lake Valley.

At the April Conference, 1865, George W. Thatcher was sustained as a member of the High Council, instead of Geo. Nebeker, who was called on a mission to the Sandwich Islands.

At the April Conference, in 1866, David Fullmer, at his own request, was released from the position of first Counselor, because of failing health, and Geo. B. Wallace was then sustained as first and Joseph W. Young chosen as second Counselor to Pres. Spencer. Joseph F. Smith, who had re-

In January, 1880, Alternate A. W. Winberg was taken into the Council to fill a vacancy caused by Milando Pratt's removal to Ogden. Subsequently Elder Pratt returned and took a position as an alternate.

In the latter part of 1881 Alternate John T. Caine was admitted into the Council, instead of Millen Atwood who was ordained Bishop of the Thirteenth Ward.

Counselor David O. Calder died at Lake Point, Tooele Co., Utah, July 3, 1884, and at the Stake conference, held Aug. 2, 1884, Charles W. Penrose was sustained as second Counselor to Pres. Cannon, Counselor Joseph E. Taylor taking the position as first Counselor.

In 1885, Elias A. Smith, Jesse W. Fox, jun., and Alonzo H. Raleigh were added to the list of alternates; Joseph D. C. Young was chosen an alternate in 1886.

At the special Stake conference, held in Salt Lake City, May 7th and 8th, 1887, Alternates Milando Pratt, Henry P. Richards, Jesse W. Fox, Elias Morris and James P. Freeze were sustained as members of the High Council, instead of Thomas E. Jeremy (to be ordained a Patriarch), John H. Rumel (dropped), Miner G. Atwood and Hosea Stout (excused because of failing health) and John R. Winder (appointed second Counselor to the Presiding Bishop of the Church). The following named brethren were sustained as additional alternates: John Nicholson, John Clark, David L. Davis, James Moyle, Orson A. Woolley and Wm. W. Riter.

For a number of years, previous to the general reorganization of the various Stakes of Zion, in 1877, the Salt Lake Stake embraced Salt Lake, Tooele, Davis, Morgan, Summit and Wasatch Counties.

Organization of Wards—At a council of the First Presidency, the Apostles and other leading men in the Church, held in G. S. L. City, Feb. 14, 1847, the City was divided into 19 wards. At a similar council held Feb. 16, 1849, the following division of the Great Salt Lake Valley was decided upon: The country south of the City and east of the river Jordan was divided into four wards, viz., Canyon Creek Ward (afterwards Sugar House Ward) embracing the Five Acre Survey and all east of it, Mill Creek Ward, embraeing the Ten Acre Survey and all east of it, a third Ward (Holladay's Settlement al - as Big Cottonwood) embraeing the country between the Ten Acre Survey and (Big) Cottonwood Creek, and a fourth Ward embraeing all the country south of the (Big) Cottonwood Creek. West of the river Jordan it was decided to organize another Ward to be known as the Canaan Ward.

Feb. 22, 1849, Preidents Brigham Young and Heber C. Kimball, several of the Twelve Apostles and others met in council in G. S. L. City, when the following named brethren were ordained and set apart as Bishops of the City Wards: David Fairbanks (1st Ward), John Lowry (2nd), Christopher Williams (3rd), Wm. Hickenlooper (6th), Wm. G. Perkins (7th), Addison Everett (8th), Seth Taft (9th), David Pettegrew (10th), Benjamin Covey (12th), Edward Hunter (13th), John Murdock, (14th), A. O. Smoot (15th), Isaac Higbee (16th), Jos. L. Heywood (17th), and James Hendrix (19th). April 8, 1849, a Bishoprie was set apart for the Fourth Ward, Salt Lake City.

Three of the country Wards (Mill Creek, Big Cottonwood and South Cottonwood) were organized, at least in part, in 1849, but the Canyon Creek or Sugar House Ward was not fully organized until years afterwards, and the proposed Canaan Ward was not organized at all.

A new Ward was added towards the close of 1849, namely that of Little Cottonwood, afterwards known as Union. The Eighteenth Ward, Salt Lake City, was organized in April, 1851, the Eleventh Ward July 13, 1851, West Jordan Ward in January, 1852, Draperville Ward in the spring of 1852, the Fifth Ward April 11, 1853, the Sugar House Ward in April, 1854, the Twentieth Ward in October, 1856, the Herriman Ward in 1858, and the Brighton Ward in February, 1867. At the time of the general reorganization in 1877, seven new Wards were organized by dividing up some of the larger Wards, namely, South Jordan and North Jordan Wards, both organized June 17, 1877; Granite Ward, organized July 1, 1877; the Twenty-First Ward, Salt Lake City, organized July 5, 1877, and the East Mill Creek and Farmers Wards, both organized July 15, 1877. Besides these, the Fifth Ward, Salt Lake City, and Union, Herriman and Brighton Wards, which had existed for several years previous as mere branches or parts of other Wards, were reorganized. Since the general reorganization, six other new Wards have been organized, namely, Mountain Dell Ward (org. Aug. 8, 1882), Sandy (org. Sept. 3, 1882), Pleasant Green (org. Oct. 1, 1882), Granger (org. Feb. 2, 1884, Bluff Dale (org. Aug. 8, 1886) and Riverton (org. Aug. 8, 1886)

MINOR DIVISIONS.

The following descriptive and historical articles, alphabetically arranged, embrace all minor divisions and points of interest within the limits of Salt Lake County:

ALTA, one of the famous mining towns in Utah, is situated at the foot of the celebrated Emma Hill, near the summit of the Wasatch Mountains, on the head waters of the Little Cottonwood Creek, 16 miles east of Sandy and 28 miles south-east of Salt Lake City. It is the business centre of the Little Cottonwood Precinct and Mining District, and the terminus of the Alta Branch of the Denver and Rio Grande Railway. The shipments comprise silver and lead ore. The population is about 100.

HISTORY—Alta dates back to 1868, when the Little Cottonwood Mining District was first organized. At one time it was a populous and influential city, but a disastrous fire almost swept it away Aug. 1, 1878, and it has not since been extensively rebuilt. A large number of people have lost their lives by snow-slides in Alta and surrounding hills at various times.

BINGHAM CREEK, one of the principal mountain streams which enters Salt Lake Valley from the west. rises near the summit of the Oquirrh Mountains and flows in a north-easterly direction through Bingham Canyon, where it is utilized for mill and cleansing purposes, and in the valley below for the irrigation of farming lands. From the head of Car Fork, its principal tributary, to its original outlet into the river Jordan is a distance of nearly fifteen miles. Formerly its water was pure and good, but since the opening of the mines in Bingham Canyon, where the stream is monopolized for cleansing and other mining purposes, it has become filthy and poisonous.

BINGHAM JUNCTION is a railway station on the D. & R. G. Ry. within the limits of the West Jordan Ward, 11 miles south of Salt Lake City. Here the Bingham Branch of the D. & R. G. Ry. system diverges to the west and the Alta Branch to the east.

BINGHAM PRECINCT comprises about thirty square miles of mountain country bounded on the north by West Jordan Precinct, on the east and south-east by Herriman Precinct and south-west by the summit of the Oquirrh Mountains, which separates it from Tooele County. Pop. in 1880, 1,022. In the centre of this precinct is the mining town of Bingham situated in Bingham Canyon, on the Bingham Branch of the D. & R. G. Ry. It is 26½ miles south-west of Salt Lake City, and contains a bank, a brewery, a brickyard, Baptist and Josephite churches, a distillery, 5 quartz mills, a saw mill, good public and private schools and numerous handsome and well stocked general and special stores; also a number of saloons, gambling houses etc. It is the central point of the West Mining District. The town is surrounded by numerous mines, the majority of which are turning out large quantities of paying ore. Bingham is the terminus of the Bingham Branch of the D.& R. G. Ry.

HISTORY—Bingham dates back to 1863, when precious metals were first discovered in Bingham Canyon by the California Volunteers under General Connor. The first mining claim was recorded Sept. 17, 1863, since which the number of claims has increased to about four thousand. In past years it enjoyed the reputation of being one of the most solid and reliable mining camps in the country.

BIG COTTONWOOD CREEK, one of the largest streams entering Salt Lake Valley from the east, rises in a number of romantic lakes near the summit of the Wasatch Mountains. The creek flows through the celebrated Big Cottonwood Canyon in a westerly direction until it emerges into Salt Lake Valley about eighteen miles from its highest source. Thence its course is north-westerly through Butler, Big Cottonwood and South Cottonwood Precincts until it empties into the river Jordan about five miles south of Salt Lake City. In the summer its waters are all used for irrigation purposes. From its source to its original outlet into the river Jordan is a distance of about twenty-six miles. There are four water-power saw-mills on the creek and one steam saw-mill.

The best known of all the Big Cottonwood lakes is the so called Silver Lake (also known as Brighton's Lake), a small sheet of water occupying a few acres of a fine flat which is formed by the mountains on both sides of the canyon receding back from the main creek. This flat which affords fine pasturage in the summer measures from one hundred yards to a quarter of a mile in width and about half a mile in length; and there, on what is known as Brighton's place, is built a hotel and a number of small summer residences.

About one mile above Silver Lake is Lake Mary, which is supposed to be the finest small sheet of water in the mountains of Utah. It is surrounded by lofty cliffs, which cast their shadows in the clear waters below, giving the whole a very romantic and phantom-like appearance. Immediately below is a smaller lake commonly known as Lake Phoebe, and a few hundred yards above is Lake Catharine, another beautiful sheet of water surrounded by cliffs, meadows and groves of timber. Still half a mile further to the south Lake Martha nestles amidst the naked hills, near the summit of the mountains. This is the head waters of one of the principal affluents of the Big Cottonwood Creek.

Besides this string of fine mountain lakes, which all abound in fish of various kinds, there are two other small lakes on the road between Alta and Brighton's, about one mile above Silver Lake, known as the Twin Lakes; they are about two hundred yards apart, both surrounded by groves of timber and meadows, and are the source of another tributary of the Big Cottonwood Creek.

HISTORY—Big Cottonwood Canyon is famous in Church History as the place where the people of G. S. L. City celebrated Pioneer day in 1856 and 1857. On July 24th, of the latter year, when the festivities were going on in commemoration of the Pioneers entering G. S. L. Valley ten years previous, Mr. Judson Stoddard arrived from Independence, Mo., and reported that General Harney was on the march to Utah with an army for the purpose of annihilating the "Mormons." The pine tree on which the American flag on that occasion was unfurled in the breeze is still standing immediately back of Mr. Brighton's house. In 1870 W. S Brighton made some improvements near Silver Lake and claimed the adjacent flat. In 1871 he built a log cabin and opened a boarding house, since which a number of other buildings have been erected, and the place, being cool and healthy in the summer, is fast becoming popular as a desirable place for spending a few weeks during the hot season.

BIG COTTONWOOD PRECINCT established July 21, 1863, is bounded on the north by East Mill Creek Precinct, east and south by Butler Precinct, and west by South Cottonwood and Mill Creek Precincts. It contains about eleven square miles lying on both sides of the Big Cottonwood Creek. Pop. in 1880, 661.

BIG COTTONWOOD WARD is coextensive with the precinct bearing the same name. The ward meeting house, situated on rising ground near the right bank of the Big Cottonwood Creek, is about nine miles south-east of the Temple Block, Salt Lake City. The ward comprises a fine farming district.

In May, 1887, the presiding authorities of the Ward stood as follows:

Bishopric—David B. Brinton, Bishop; Santa Anno Casto and Milo Andrus, jun., Counselors; B. B. Bitner, ward clerk.

HISTORY—Big Cottonwood, originally known as Holladay's Settlement, was settled in the spring of 1848 by John Holladay, Porter Doudle, William and Benjamin Matthews, Washington Gibson, Allen Smithson and others who had arrived in the valley with the Pioneers in July, 1847, in what is known in Church History as the Mississippi Company, because most of the Saints who arrived in it hailed from Monroe County, Mississippi. Some of them, however, were from Illinois. After spending the winter of 1847-48 in the G. S. L. City fort, these families started out in the spring of 1848 to find a suitable place for locating farms, and finally made a camp on Spring Creek, about half a mile south-east of the present Big Cottonwood ward house, or three miles below the mouth of Big Cottonwood Canyon. They settled close together and built a number of log cabins. The little village, which was the first founded in Utah outside of Salt Lake City, was called Holladay's Burgh, in honor of John Holladay, one of the first settlers, who also was the first acting Bishop of the place. He presided from 1849 to 1851, and then accompanied Elders Amasa M. Lyman and Charles C. Rich to San Bernardino, Cal. Ezekiel Lee (popularly known as Doctor Lee) was appointed to act as Bishop in his stead. Bishop Lee presided five years and a half. His Counselors were Lyman Stevens and Ephraim Badger. When E. Badger subsequently removed from the Ward, Geo. Boyes was chosen as second Counselor in his stead. In October, 1853, the population of Holladay's Settlement, which was then known as Big Cottonwood, had increased to 161 souls.

Nov. 15, 1856, David Brinton was ordained Bishop of the Ward by Edward Hunter. Four days later (Nov. 19th) a meeting of the officers and members of the Big Cottonwood Ward was held in Bishop Brinton's house, when Milo Andrus was chosen as first and Albert Miles as second Counselor to Bishop Brinton.

Dec. 21, 1856, at a meeting held at the Big Cottonwood school house, Winslow Farr, sen., Wm. T. Smith, Wm. W. Hutchings, Wm. Watkins, Robert D. Covington and James S. Cantwell were appointed ward Teachers. They were set apart the following day.

In 1857 Bishop Brinton was called on a mission to the United States, and during his absence Counselor Milo Andrus had charge of the Ward as acting Bishop.

March 23, 1858, a special meeting was held in the ward house for the purpose of making arrangement for moving south on account of the approach of Johnston's Army. Pres. Brigham Young had counseled the Saints of Big Cottonwood to remove to Beaver Valley, and consequently W. S. Covert was chosen as captain of the company selected to go there. But when the general move took place in April, 1858, the majority of the Big Cottonwood Saints settled temporarily on the bottoms north of the Provo River, where they remained until they returned in July following.

At a meeting held near the Provo River April 25, 1858, the Big Cottonwood Saints were reorganized by the appointment of W. S. Covert as first and Wm. Watkins as second Counselor to Elder Milo Andrus. Wm. W. Hutchings, W. T. Smith, James S. Cantwell and Henry Hughes were appointed to act as Teachers and Henry Hughes as leader for the choir.

Bishop Brinton having returned from his mission, a meeting was held in Big Cottonwood Feb. 6, 1859, for the purpose of reorganizing the lesser Priesthood of the Ward. On that occasion Milo Andrus tendered his resignation as first Counselor to Bishop Brinton, which was accepted, and on March 6, 1859, Albert Miles also resigned as second Counselor.

March 13, 1859, Charles A. Harper was appointed first Counselor, and on March 20, 1859, George Boyes was chosen as second Counselor to Bishop Brinton.

Oct. 1, 1866, Bishop Brinton appointed Levi Stewart as his first Counselor, instead of Charles A. Harper, who had resigned his position.

In 1869 a serious difficulty arose between Bishop Brinton and James Spillet, but the case was finally settled by the assistance of Apostles Geo. Q. Cannon and Brigham Young, jun. A distillery for making whiskey was subsequently started in the Ward by Wm. Howard, which caused considerable drunkenness.

In 1870 a petition was gotten up and forwarded to President Brigham Young from a number of the residents of the South District to have the Bishop removed, and consequently Apostles John Taylor, W. Woodruff and Geo. Q. Cannon held a meeting with the Saints, March 6, 1870, when, after considerable discussion and preaching, the people voted to sustain their Bishop.

About this time Levi Stewart removed from the Ward, when Geo. Boyes became first Counselor and Alexander De Witt was chosen as temporary Counselor to Bishop Brinton. The Bishop was called on a mission to England in 1870, and during his absence Counselor Boyes had temporary charge of the Ward. He called Alex. De Witt and Charles Stillman to his aid as temporary Counselors.

Bishop Brinton returned from his mission in the summer of 1872. Counselor Boyes died and B. B. Bitner was chosen first Counselor in his stead. When David Brinton was discontinued as Bishop in 1873, Elder B. B. Bitner was placed in charge of the Ward

He presided about one year until William G. Young, formerly of South Cottonwood, was appointed Bishop. He chose as Counselors John Neff and Niels Petersen. This Bishopric continued until the time of the general organization.

The Big Cottonwood Ward was reorganized July 15, 1877, with David B. Brinton as Bishop, and Santa Anna Casto and Milo Andrus, jun., as his Counselors. They were all ordained and set apart by Pres. Daniel H. Wells.

As successors to James Brooks (who moved away) Elders Charles A. Harper, N. Petersen, John Rider, Wm. Lark and B. B. Bitner have acted as ward clerks and recorders.

A number of brethren were employed at the numerous saw-mills located at various points in Big Cottonwood Canyon at an early day, and as a general desire was manifested to have Sabbath meetings held there, a branch organization was effected in the canyon, May 17, 1857, at a meeting held in the house of J. T. Phippen. George Gardner was appointed President, and Joseph T. Phippen, James Wade, Lorenzo Johnson and James Adams, Teachers. Bro. Gardner subsequently moved away and Freeman T Phippen was appointed to preside over the Saints in Big Cottonwood Canyon in his stead, Feb. 14, 1858. This branch, which was during its existence under the jurisdiction of the Big Cottonwood Bishopric, was discontinued some time afterwards.

The first building erected for public worship in Big Cottonwood was also used for school purposes. It was built at an early day and is not now in existence. At a meeting held June 15, 1861, it was resolved to build a new ward meeting house to cost about fifteen hundred dollars; $1,250 was subscribed for this purpose at the meeting. The house cost $4,100 before it was finished That building has now been torn down and a new ward house, a fine brick building has just been erected on the same grounds.

BLUFF DALE PRECINCT, created Dec. 14, 1883, is bounded on the north by Riverton and Draper Precincts, east by Draper Precinct, south by Utah County and west by Herriman Precinct. It contains about twenty-five square miles of a hilly and mountainous country, lying on both sides of the river Jordan. It embraces School District No. 61.

BLUFF DALE WARD is coextensive with the Bluff Dale Precinct. The ward house, beautifully situated on the top of the bluffs on the west side of the river Jordan, is about twenty-two miles south-west of the Temple Block, Salt Lake City.

In May, 1887, the presiding authorities of the Ward stood as follows:

Bishopric—Lewis H. Mousley, Bishop; Wm. W. Merrill and Alfred J. Dansie, Counselors; Lewis Petersen, ward clerk.

Deacons' Quorum—George Hatt, Pres.

Sunday School—Lewis Petersen, supt.; Jedediah Casper and Charles Jensen, Counselors; Joseph S. Mousley, secretary.

Relief Society—Mary A. Mousley, Pres.; Lucy Merrill and R. S. Madsen, Counselors; Martha Dunyon, secretary.

Y. M. M. I. A.—Lewis Petersen, Pres.; Isaac Dunyon and Jedediah Casper, Counselors; Joy Dunyon, secretary.

Y. L. M. I. A.—Harriet Petersen, Pres.; Martha Dunyon and Hannah Madsen, Counselors; Ellen Nichols, secretary.

HISTORY—The settlers in that tract of country now included in the Bluff Dale Ward originally belonged to the West Jordan and subsequently to the South Jordan Ward. At a meeting held Aug. 8, 1886, at which Prests. Angus M. Cannon and Joseph E. Taylor and other leading men were present, the south part of the Riverton branch of the South Jordan Ward and the west part of Draper Ward was organized into a separate ward with Lewis H. Mousley as Bishop and Wm. Wallace Merrill as first and Alfred John Dansie as second Counselor.

BRIGHTON PRECINCT, established May 13, 1867, is bounded on the north by North Point Precinct, separated from Salt Lake City and Farmers Precinct on the east by the river Jordan, bounded on the south by Granger Precinct, and west by Hunter Precinct. It contains 18 square miles and embraces school districts Nos. 32 and 62. Pop. in 1880, 387.

BRIGHTON WARD comprises the Brighton and North Point Precincts. Most of the soil within the limits of the Ward is very salty and unproductive, a small portion only can be irrigated from the canals. There is, however, a few very good farms on the west bank of the river Jordan. Dry farming has been tried to quite an extent, but with only moderate success. Nearly all the inhabitants are Latter-day Saints. There are two meeting houses in the Ward, one in Brighton Precinct, situated a few hundred yards south of the Utah and Nevada Ry. track, and about four miles west of the Temple Block, Salt Lake City. The other one is in North Point Precinct and is pleasantly situated on rising ground a short distance west of the Jordan River, about seven miles by road north-west of the Temple Block, Salt Lake City. Regular services are held in both houses every Sabbath day, and there is at North Point also a separate Sunday School and a Y. M. and Y. L. M. I. A.; also a branch of the Brighton Relief Society which meets every second week under the direction of Sister Hannah Hanson.

In May, 1887, the presiding officers of the Brighton Ward stood as follows:

Bishopric—Fredrick W. Schoenfeld, Bishop; Nathan Hanson and Edward Schoenfeld, Counselors; Joseph Schoenfeld, ward clerk.

Deacons' Quorum—Geo. C. Jones President.

Sunday School at Brighton—Cyrus H. Gold, supt.; John R. Jones and Robert Hazen, sen, assistants; Robert Hazen, jun., secretary.

Sunday School at North Point—W. A. Barron, supt.; Joseph Hanson and Orson W. Rudy, assistants; Emma Hansen, secretary.

Relief Society—Mary Ann Hazen, Pres.; Hannah Hanson and Ottilia Schoenfeld, Counselors; Agnes M. Jones, secretary.

Y. M. M. I. A. at Brighton—Robt. Hazen, jun., Pres.; Cyrus H. Gold and Wm. R. Gedge, Counselors; Joseph Schoenfeld, secretary.

Y. L. M. I. A. at Brighton—Anna Cochrane, Pres.; Belle Adamson and Nettie Jones, Counselors; Nettie Jones secretary.

Y. M. & Y. L. M. I. A. at North Point—Wm. A. Barron, Pres., George E. Lufkin and Joseph Hanson Counselors; Emma Hanson, secretary.

HISTORY—At a meeiing of the general authorities of the Church held in G. S. L. City, Feb. 16, 1849, it was decided to organize all that part of G. S. L. Valley lying west of the river Jordan into a Ward to be known as the Canaan Ward. It appears, however, that no such Ward organization was ever effected. In the fall of 1849 a company of Welsh Saints, under the direction of Reese Williams, located what was known as the Welsh settlement, on a spot now embraced n the late Feramorz Little's farm in Granger Ward, but the farming not proving succesful, the settlement was subsequently broken up. Levi Reid and Simeon Baker were among the first settlers west of the Jordan on what is now known as North Point Precinct. They were followed by a number of others who took up farms near the river and also located stock ranches further west, clear up to the Tooele County line.

At an early day the settlers west of the Jordan were under the jurisdiction of the Nineteenth and Sixteenth Ward Bishopries, and the people generally attended meetings in the City. The Brighton Ward was organized in answer to the following petition from the settlers and those owning land west of the river Jordan, not comprehended in any previous organization:

"Brighton, Feb, 2, 1867.

"Pres. Brigham Young.

"Dear Brother. We, the undersigned members of the Brighton Ward, would be much pleased if you would appoint or cause to be appointed an officer to preside over this Ward as a Bishop, believing that the moral and pecuniary interests of the people here would be greatly benefited by such a step. We have had no meetings and but few regulations, which are so much needed to keep us in training and to unite us in carrying out every enterprise inaugurated for our mutual good."

This petition was signed by A. W. Cooley, J. Nash, P. A. Droubay, H. Sutton, W. Gedge, J. Wood, G. R. Jones, F. Shoenfeld, C. Howell, Benjamin Hiskey, J. Vincent, L. Walls, G. B. Wallace and J. G. Carlisle.

Pres. Young directed Elders Geo. A. Smith, A. M. Musser and a number of other brethren to go over and organize the settlers into a Ward. Accordingly, a meeting was held in the house of Wm. W. Camp, Feb. 24, 1867. On that occasion Andrew W. Cooley was elected Bishop of the new Ward by unanimous vote. He was ordained March 7, 1867. The Ward, when first organized, included all the settlers and country on the west side of the Jordan River, north of West Jordan Ward, extending north to the Great Salt Lake and west to the boundary line of Tooele County. Robert Hazen, sen, was shortly afterwards chosen to act as clerk of the Ward, and a quorum of Teachers set apart to visit the members, who all lived in a scattered condition.

In the summer of 1870 Bishop Cooley removed from the Ward, and at a Teachers meeting held July 16, 1881, Elder Henry Sutton, sen., was put in temporary charge, and the branch attached to the Nineteenth Ward.

At a meeting held in J. M. Bernhisel's house, June 14, 1874, Bishop A. H. Raleigh presiding, a branch of the "United Order of Zion" was effected at Brighton with A. H. Raleigh as President; Henry Sutton and Robert Hazen, Vice-Presidents; F. W. Shoenfeld, secretary; Wm. W. Camp, treasurer; Peter Bell, James Lane and John Hirst, directors.

July 18, 1875, Elder Frederick W. Shoenfeld was appointed the presiding Teacher of the Ward, and at a meeting held in the house of J. R. Jones, Sunday Dec. 5, 1875, Elder Shoenfeld offered a spot on his homestead (six rods square) as a donation for the purpose of having a meeting house ereeted thereon. His offer was accepted and preparations made for building. It took several years before it was completed sufficient to hold meetings in it, and has not yet been dedicated. It is used for all kinds of gatherings; also the district school is taught in it.

Sept. 2, 1875, a Female Relief Society was organized in the Ward with the necessary officers who yet hold their respective positions.

July 12, 1876, the work on the Brighton canal was completed and water turned in. This canal, which taps the Jordan River at a point due west of the "Church farm houses" is about ten miles long.

A meeting was held in the bowery at Brighton, July 29, 1877, for the purpose of effecting a thorough reorganization of the Ward. Daniel H. Wells, Angus M Cannon, David O. Calder, Geo. Teasdale, Elias Smith and a good number of the local Priesthood and Saints were present. It was moved by Pres. Cannon, and sustained with unanimous vote, that all that country bounded on the north by the Great Salt Lake, on the east by the river Jordan, on the south by the North Jordan Ward and on the west by Tooele County, be designated as the Brighton Ward, and that Fred. W. Shoenfeld be Bishop of the same, with Nathan Hanson as his first and John R. Jones as his second Counselor; that Robert Hazen act as ward recorder and John Hirst as presiding Priest of the Pleasant Green District. The following named brethren were also sustained as Teachers of the Ward: Wm. Gedge, Peter Bell, Joseph Parry, G. M. Jones, Levi Reid, Robt. Hazen, Henry Sutton, sen., Alexander Adamson, James Bertoch, Osmond LeCheminant, Lehi N. Hardman and Edward Lambert. Elders Shoenfeld, Hanson, Jones and Hirst were then ordained to the High Priesthood and set apart to their various positions by Pres. D. H. Wells.

April 13, 1879, a Sunday School was organized with James Clayton as superintendent. Previous to this, commencing with 1872, Elders Fred. W. and Edward Shoenfeld had organized a family Sunday School for the benefit of their own children, to which they also invited all others in the neighborhood to send their children. This private school, which at times was well attended, was held alternately in the houses of the two brothers Shoenfeld.

In November, 1879, a mutual improvement association was organized. About this time the population of the Ward consisted of 241 souls. Oct. 2, 1880, Edward Shoenfeld was ordained a High Priest by Pres. A. M. Cannon and set apart to act as second Counselor to Bishop F. W. Shoenfeld, instead of John R. Jones, who had removed to Iron County.

The North Point meeting house was built by donations in 1884. It is an adobe building 32 x 20 feet. Meetings have been held in it regularly since its completion in the fall of 1884. It is also used for district school purposes.

By the organization of the Pleasant Green Ward in 1882, and the Granger Ward in 1884, the Brightou Ward was reduced to its present dimensions.

BUTLER PRECINCT, created Dec. 15, 1877, out of portions of Big Cottonwood, South Cottonwood and Granite Precincts, is bounded on the north by Big Cottonwood and East Mill Creek Precincts, east by Silverton Precinct, south by Granite Precinct and west by Union and Big Cottonwood Precincts. It contains seventeen square miles of mountain and valley country lying on both sides of Big Cottonwood Creek. Pop. in 1880, 165.

BUTLERVILLE, a post office in Butler Precinct, is situated about twelve miles south-east of Salt Lake City.

BUTTERFIELD CREEK, a small mountain stream, rises in the Oquirrh Mountains near the south-west corner of Salt Lake County. It flows north-east through Butterfield Canyon until it emerges into Salt Lake Valley. About nine miles from its head-waters it reaches the little settlement of Herriman, where it is conveyed out of its original channel and used for irrigation purposes.

CANYON CREEK, or Parley's Creek, a clear mountain stream, rises near the summit of the Wasatch Mountains. The Creek proper is formed by a number of affluents, of which Lamb's Canyon Creek, Big Mountain Creek, Summit Creek and Hatch Creek are the four principal streams. It flows in a south-westerly direction through Parley's Canyon until it emerges into Salt Lake Valley about seven miles south-east of Salt Lake City. From the source of Big Mountain Creek to its original outlet into Mill Creek is a distance of about twenty miles. There are one steam saw-mill and two woollen factories (the Wasatch Mills and the Deseret Mills) on the creek, the two latter below the mouth of the canyon.

HISTORICAL—July 4, 1850, Parley's Canyon was opened for travel under the name of the "Golden Pass." The road from the mouth of the canyon to what is known as Hardy's Station was made under the direction of Apostle Parley P. Pratt.

CITY CREEK, a fine mountain stream, rises near the summit of the Wasatch Mountains, near the boundary line between Salt Lake and Davis Counties. It flows in a south-westerly direction through City Creek Canyon for about twelve miles until it emerges into Salt Lake Valley a short distance above the Temple Block, Salt Lake City. From this creek the supply of water is obtained for the Salt Lake City water works, which are located in the canyon a short distance above the City.

HISTORY—When the Pioneers first came to the valley in 1847 they found this creek divided into three different channels; one of these flowed in a north-westerly direction through what is now known as the Seventeenth and Nineteenth Wards, another ran in a westerly direction through the Temple Block and the Sixteenth Ward, and a third one known as the east channel cut through Pres. Young's garden, thence flowed in a southerly direction over the grounds where the buildings on the east side of upper Main Street now stands, thence in a south-easterly direction through the Eighth and Third Wards until it united with the waters of Red Butte, Emigration, Canyon and Mill Creek in a marsh immediately south of the City. Later the three channels were united into one and conducted through an aqueduct along the centre of North Temple Street straight west to the river Jordan.

DRAPER PRECINCT, established March 4. 1856, is bounded on the north by Sandy and Granite Precincts, east by the Wasatch Mountains, south by Utah County and west by Bluff Dale, Riverton and South Jordan Precincts. It contains about forty square miles of valley and mountain country. Pop. in 1880, 425.

DRAPER WARD, formerly known as South Willow Creek, is coextensive with Draper Precinct. It is a flourishing settlement on the U. C. Ry. 17 miles south-east of Salt Lake City and contains a ward house, a school house, a steam saw-mill, several stores and a large number of comfortable private dwellings. Grain, general produce and fruits are raised in great abundance. The Ward is noted for its well attended meetings, a model Sunday School and lively associations. Nearly all the inhabitants are Latter-day Saints.

In May, 1887, the presiding authorities of the Ward stood as follows:

Bishopric—Isaac M. Stewart, Bishop; Henry Day and Absalom W. Smith, Counselors; John Heward, ward clerk, Priests' Quorum—Bishoprie presiding.

Teachers' Quorum—Hyrum Brown, Pres.

Deacons' Quorum—Isaac Fitzgerald, Pres.; Joseph Terry and Wm. Norris, Counselors.

Sunday School—Peter N. Garff, supt; Joseph M. Smith and Charles C. Crapo, assistants; David O. Ridout, secretary.

Relief Society—Catharine Smith, Pres.; Hannah Rawlins and Mary Smith, Counselors; Hannah Burnham, secretary.

Y. M. M. I. A.—David O. Ridout, Pres.; David Brown and Charles Sadler, Counselors; John Hyrum Smith, secretary.

Y. L. M. I. A.—Mary Ann Ridout, Pres.; Mary Ann Ballantyne and Hannah Brown, Counselors; Alice Stringfellow, secretary.

Primary Associations—Catharine Smith, Pres.; Emmy Terry and Elizabeth Day, Counselors; Eliza J. Stewart, secretary.

HISTORY—Draper was first settled by Ebenezer Brown and family in 1849; the following year Wm. Draper, Zemira Draper, And J. Allen, Andrew Burnham, and a few others, with their respective families, settled on a small creek which they called South Willow Creek. Later, when a post-office was established and a precinct organized, the name of the new settlement was changed to Draper, in honor of Wm. Draper and family, who were among the first settlers. In October, 1853, the population had increased to 222. At the time of the Indian difficulties in 1854, a fort, inclosing a few acres on the grounds where the present ward house now stands, was erected, and most of the settlers spent the winter of 1854-55 within its walls, but the following spring the people moved back onto their respective farms. Some years later the present town site was surveyed.

In 1858, at the time of the general move, the place was deserted for a few months, but most of the settlers returned to their homes as soon as peace was fairly established between the Saints and Johnston's Army. The early settlers irrigated their lands from four small streams rising in the mountains east of the settlement. The largest of these was Willow Creek. About the year 1860 these four streams were converted into one at an expense of about $5,000. The water supply still proving insufficient to irrigate all the available farming lands in the immediate neighborhood of the settlement, steps were taken to bring water from the river Jordan by digging a large canal, which taps the river near the county line, at the same point as the Utah and Salt Lake Canal. This canal, which is known as the East Jordan and Draper Canal, is twenty feet wide in the bottom and nearly eighteen miles long. It cost about $150,000. There are over four hundred shareholders.

Elder William Draper was the first acting Bishop or presiding Elder of the Draper Ward. He presided from 1852 to 1856, with Ebenezer Brown and Zemira Draper as Counselors. In October, 1856, Isaac M. Stewart was ordained Bishop. W. R. Terry and Absalom W. Smith were chosen as his Counselors. In 1862 Elder Terry was called to go to southern Utah, when Absalom W. Smith became first and Henry Day second Counselor. No change in the Bishopric was made at the time of the reorganization, although a meeting similar to those held in other Wards for that purpose was held June 24, 1877. On account of the religious persecution now raging against the Saints, Counselor Smith has been forced into exile, and in 1886 Jonathan C. Crapo was ordained and set apart to act as Counselor pro tem. during the absence of Elder Smith.

EAST MILL CREEK Precinct, established Dec. 5, 1877, is bounded on the north by the Sugar House and Mountain Dell Precincts, separated from Summit County on the east by the summit of the Wasatch Mountains, bounded on the south by Silverton, Butler and Big Cottonwood Precincts and west by Mill Creek Precinct. It contains about twenty-four square miles, most of which is mountainous country. Pop. in 1880, 371.

EAST MILL CREEK WARD is coextensive with the precinct bearing the same name. Nearly all the inhabitants are Latter-day Saints. The commodious ward house, which is also used for school purposes, is romantically located on rising ground overlooking the whole country west and northward. It is about eight miles south-east of the Temple Block, Salt Lake City.

In May, 1887, the presiding officers of the Ward stood as follows:

Bishopric—John Neff, Bishop; Henry B. Skidmore and Samuel Oliver, Counselors; James M. Fisher ward clerk.

Deacons' Quorum—Oscar Capson and Joseph Osguthorpe, Presidents of 1st and 2nd Quorum.

Sunday School—Daniel H. Kimball supt.; James M. Fisher and James Russell, assistants; Marian B. Neff, secretary.

Relief Society—Anna E. Neff, Pres.; Lydia Osguthorpe and Sarah A. Skidmore, Counselors; Francis Maria Neff, secretary.

Y. M. M. I. A.—John B. Fagg, Pres.; John Capson and Amos B. Neff, Counselors; C. F. Stillman, secretary.

Y. L. M. I. A.—Grace A. Neff, Pres.; Mary B. Neff and Delia Stillman, Counselors; Marian B. Neff, secretary and treasurer.

Primary Association—Fannie Oliver, Pres.; Francis Maria Neff and Edith E. Fisher, Counselors; May S. Neff, secretary.

HISTORY—The early history of East Mill Creek is identified with that of Mill Creek, It was first distinguished as the upper district of the Mill Creek Ward; a school house was erected at an early day and regular meetings held every Sabbath. Later, when the Mill Creek Ward had grown quite large, that part of it which is now included in East Mill Creek was attached to Big Cottonwood, er being at that time only a small Ward. Thus it continued until the reorganization in 1877.

While East Mill Creek existed as a mere branch or part of other Wards, it had a presiding Elder who took charge of meetings and affairs generally under the direction of the respective Bishopries. The first of these presiding Elders was Julian Moses who presided a number of years. He was sueeeded by John Haslem and John Neff, the latter presiding until called on a mission to England in 1873. After this H. B. Skidmore presided until July 15, 1877, when East Mill Creek was organized into a Ward, with John Neff as Bishop, and Henry B. Skidmore and Samuel Oliver as Counselors. All these brethren were ordained and set apart by Pres. Daniel H. Wells.

While the East Mill Creek Saints were connected with the people of Mill Creek and Big Cottonwood, they assisted in building meeting houses in both these Wards. And later they have built their own commodious ward house at a cost of about three thousand dollars.

Some of the first fruit grown in Salt Lake Valley was raised in East Mill Creek, by D. Russell, who planted an orchard near the mouth of Mill Creek Canyon. Some of the trees planted by him in 1849 are still alive and bearing fruit.

EMIGRATION CREEK, a mountain stream of considerable size, rises near the summit of the Wasatch Mountains. The East Fork, West Fork and Brigham's Fork are its main tributaries. It flows in a south-westerly direction through the celebrated Emigration Canyon until it emerges into Salt Lake Valley about twelve miles from its head waters. From its source to its original junction with Mill Creek, at a point immediately south of the present site of Salt Lake City, is a distance of about sixteen miles.

HISTORICAL—Emigration Canyon is famous in the early history of Utah as the mountain pass through which the Pioneers and early immigrant trains entered Salt Lake Valley. After the opening of a good wagon road through Parley'sCanyon, the immigration, in order to avoid the crossing of the "Little Mountain", generally passed through that canyon.

ENSIGN PEAK is a dome-shaped mountain, standing out in bold relief from the more lofty mountains behind it, about two miles north of the Temple Block, Salt Lake City. From its top, which is about five hundred feet above the Temple Block, a fine view is had of the City, Valley and Great Salt Lake.

HISTORICAL—This mountain is famous in the history of Utah as the spot where the Pioneers, after their arrival in the valley, first unfurled the "stars and stripes." Pres. Brigham Young and others ascended the peak for that purpose, July 26, 1847, and at the same time named it. On the top of Ensign Peak, July 21, 1849, also, were administered the first endowments given in Salt Lake Valley. Elder Addison Pratt was the person to whom the blessings were administered on the occasion.

FARMERS PRECINCT, established Dec. 5, 1877, is bounded on the north by Roper Street, or the corporation limits of Salt Lake City, east by Sugar House Precinct, south by Mill Creek Precinct and separated from Brighton Precinct on the west by the river Jordan. It contains only about five square miles of rich farming and pasture lands, being the smallest precinct in the county in point of area. Pop. in 1880, 320.

FARMERS WARD, formerly a part of the Sugar House Ward, is coextensive with Farmers Precinct, and contains the west part of the original Five Acre Survey. The ward house located on the State Road is about three miles south of the Temple Block, Salt Lake City.

In May 1887, the presiding officers of the Ward stood as follows:

Bishopric—Henry F. Burton, Bishop; John Gabbott and Wm. Wagstaff, Counselors; Wm. Gibby, ward clerk.

Deacons' Quorum—Lyman W. Burton, Pres.: John Gray Peart and Albert Van Cott, Counselors.

Sunday School—Willard L. Snow, supt.; Asahel H. Woodruff and Frank Van Cott, assistants; Albert G. Wagstaff, secretary.

Relief Society—Emma Woodruff, Pres.; Sarah Jane Cannon and Catherine Gibby, Counselors; Annie Free, secretary.

Y. M. M. I. A.—Asahel H. Woodruff, Pres.; Wilford A. Kimball and John G. Peart, Counselors; Ray Van Cott, secretary.

Y. L. M. I. A.—Elizabeth Peart, Pres.; Naomi Butterwood and Ella Snow, Counselors.

HISTORY—Farmers Ward was organized July 23, 1877, at a meeting held in the Sugar House ward house, with Lewis H. Mousley as Bishop, and John Wagstaff and John Gabbott as his Counselors. Elders Mousley and Wagstaff were ordained and set apart at the time and Elder Gabbott on the 26th, Pres. Daniel H. Wells officiating.

Lewis H. Mousley having removed to Bluff Dale, a meeting was held Sept. 12, 1886, when H. F. Burton was sustained as Bishop of the Farmers Ward, with John Gabbott and Wm. Wagstaff as his Counselors.

FORT DOUGLAS, one of the most desirable military posts in the United States, is a beautiful suburban spot located on rising ground, near the mouth of Red Butte Canyon and about three miles east of the Temple Block Salt Lake City. The Fort Douglas Military Reservation contains 2,560 acres. Pop. in 1880, 403, mostly soldiers.

HISTORY—In the fall of 1862 Col. P. E. Connor, commanding the Third California Volunteers, and a regiment of Nevada troops, came to Salt Lake Valley, with orders to establish a military post there. The "overland travel" was at that time menaced by Indians, and Salt Lake Valley was selected for a permanent camp, on account of its central position and the facilities it offered for supplying the troops with what was necessary for their support. The site of the present post was selected by Col. Connor, Oct. 20, 1862, and was named in honor of Stephen A. Douglas, the distinguished senator from Illinois. At first the reservation was only one mile square, but subsequently was enlarged to its present dimensions, four square miles. The first flagstaff was cut in the Wasatch Mountains by the troops, and with infinite labor was brought to camp. In an address by General Morrow, delivered Dec. 26, 1873, on the occasion of raising the flagstaff, the following of historical interest was said, relating to the first quarters built at Fort Douglas:

"There was no railroad in 1862. Everything was scarce, and if procurable at all, procurable at high prices. The troops wintered in 1862-63 in 'dug-outs,' and in 1863 the permanent quarters were begun. The work was all done by the volunteers; and it is a tribute to the ingenuity and enterprise of our volunteer soldiery, and a comment on our 'regular' establishment, when I say that little has been done to our quarters or barracks at the post since the volunteers left them."

In 1865, Colonel George, First Nevada Volunteers, was in command of Camp Douglas. After the war of the rebellion had ended the "regular" troops came again to Utah, and Major William H. Lewis, Thirty-sixth Infantry, came to command Camp Douglas in the summer of 1866, relieving Colonel Potter.

Since the days of the volunteer companies the fort has been rebuilt in a fine, substantial manner, and additional improvements are made yearly.

FRANCKLYN, a railway station on the Utah Central and D. & R. G. Rys., is situated in South Cottonwood Precinct, between the two Cottonwood Creeks, near the Horn Silver Smelter and 7 miles south of Sa Lake City.

GERMANIA is the name of a railway station and the most extensive smelting and lead works in Utah. They are situated on the south side of the Little Cottonwood Creek, on the line of the U. C. Ry., 7½ miles south of Salt Lake City.

GRANGER PRECINCT, established April 13, 1878, is bounded on the north by Brighton Precinct, separated on the east from Mill Creek Precinct by the river Jordan, bounded on the south by North Jordan Precinct and west by Hunter Precinct. It contains 12 square miles of good farming land. Pop. in 1880, 145.

GRANGER WARD is coextensive with the Granger Precinct. The ward house site (building in course of erection), located in the centre of a fine farming district, is nine miles south-west of the Temple Block, Salt Lake City. The farming lands are irrigated from the North Jordan, South Jordan and Utah & Salt Lake Canals. All kinds of small grain and vegetables are raised. Nearly all the people are Latter-day Saints: meetings are held in the district school house.

In May, 1887, the presiding authorities of the Ward stood as follows:

Bishopric—Daniel McRae, Bishop; John Bawden, Counselor; John C. McKay, ward clerk.

Deacons' Quorum—Geo. A. Wallace, Pres.; Alma J. Gerber and James H. Taylor, Counselors;

Sunday School—Henry L. Bawden, supt.; Alexander J. Hill and Fred. B. Eldredge, assistants; R. C. Wilcken, secretary.

Relief Society—Mary E. Porter, Pres.; Elizabeth Park and Mary Bess, Counselors; Kate McKay, secretary.

Y. M. M. I A.—Alexander J. Hill, Pres.; Josiah Wallace and Wm. H. Park, Counselors; Samuel D. Wallace, secretary.

Y. L. M. I. A.—Agnes Mackey, Pres.; Henrietta Wallace and Emily C. McRae, Counselors; Mary J. Park, secretary.

Primary Association—Hannah Wallace, Pres.; Mary A. Gerber and Agnes B. Park, Counselors; Florence Barton, secretary.

HISTORY—That district of country now included in the Granger Ward formerly belonged to the North Jordan and Brighton Wards. At a meeting held in the North Jordan ward house, Feb. 24, 1884, the Ward was organized with Daniel McRae as Bishop and Abram Sørensen and John Bawden as Counselors. Counselor Sørensen has since removed to Cache Valley.

GRANITE, once a flourishing town, was situated in the mouth of Little Cottonwood Canyon, about twenty miles by rail south-east of Salt Lake City, and 1½ west of Wasatch, the nearest railway station. See Granite Ward.

GRANITE PRECINCT, established March 24, 1871, is bounded on the north by Butler Precinct, east by Little Cottonwood Precinct, south by Draper Precinct and west by Draper and Sandy Precincts. It contains about twenty miles of valley and mountain country, lying on both sides of the Little Cottonwood Creek. Pop. in 1880, 250.

GRANITE WARD comprises Graite, Butler, Little Cottonwood and Silverton Precincts, consisting chiefly of a hilly and mountanious tract of country. There are only a very few Latter-day Saints in the two last named precincts, but they constitute nearly all the population of Butler and Granite. All the inhabitants live very much scattered on their farms, and most of them realize but small returns from their lands, which is rather poor and can only be cultivated in spots, on account of its uneven surface and the scarcity of water. The only public building in the Ward is the Butler district school house, which has a most romantic location on the brow of a hill overlooking the valley north and west. It is about twelve miles, by road, south-east of Salt Lake City. Meetings are held in this building every Sunday, and every other Sunday religious services are also held at Wasatch, in Little Cottonwood Canyon, which belongs to the Granite Ward. A commodious ward house is now in course of erection near the centre of the Ward. There is a separate Sunday School in Granite whic meets in a lumber building located near the stamp-mill, between the Little Cottonwood Creek and the Alta

Branch of the Denver & Rio Grande Railway.

On the Big Cottonwood Creek, in this Ward, and about ten miles from Salt Lake City, is located the famous Deseret Paper Mills.

In May, 1887, the presiding authorities of the Ward stood as follows:

Bishopric—Alva Butler, Bishop; Wm. Thomson, Counselor and ward clerk.

Deacons' Quorum—Thomas Thomson, Pres.; Geo. F. Despain and Lewis Neeley, jun., Counselors.

Sunday School at Granite—Solomon A. Wixom, supt.; Oscar N. Despain and James Muir, assistants; Adell Boyce, secretary.

Sunday School at Butler—George Low, supt.; Mark H. Bleazzard and George U. Thomson, assistants; Josephine Thompson, secretary.

Relief Society—Ruth A. Despain, Pres.; Jane E. Butler and Charlotte Mason, Counselors; Josephine Thompson, secretary.

Y. M. & Y. L. M. I. A.—Mark H. Bleazzard, Pres.; Wm. Hadfield and Alva J. Butler, Counselors; Alva J. Butler, secretary.

HISTORY—A town called Granite was located in the mouth of Little Cottonwood Canyon in 1870. At the time of its greatest prosperity (1872-74) it consisted of about fifty buildings, mostly stores, saloons, boarding houses and cabins for the accommodation of the workmen employed on the Flagstaff and Davenport smelters (situated near by), and the teamsters who hauled ore from the mines up the canyon to the smelters below. This teaming was the main support of the town. Finally the smelters were removed, and the town has since become extinct, only one house now remaining on the town site. In the meantime the surrounding country had been settled by Latter-day Saints who originally belonged to the South Cottonwood Ward, but when the reorganization of the Salt Lake Stake of Zion took place, that portion of the country above described was organized into a Ward. This was done at a meeting held in the South Cottonwood ward house, July 1, 1877, when Solomon J. Despain was appointed Bishop of the new Ward. Niels Grahn and Hyrum S. Despain were ordained High Priests and set apart by Daniel H. Wells to act as first and second Counselors, July 15, 1877. Subsequently Counselor Grahn removed to Idaho, when John Boyce became first Counselor, and on May 7, 1881, Alva Butler was ordained a High Priest and set apart to act as second Counselor.

In 1886 Bishop Despain was forced into exile because of religious persecution. Counselors Boyce and Butler then took temporary charge of the Ward until March 13, 1887, when Pres. Angus M. Cannon and other Elders met with the Saints of the Granite Ward in the Paper Mill buildings, for the purpose of reorganizing the Bishopric. At that meeting Alva Butler was nominated for Bishop. He was ordained a High Priest and set apart to this position March 16, 1887, by Franklin D. Richards. William Thomson, jun., was ordained a High Priest and set apart to act as second Counselor. No first Counselor has yet been appointed.

HERRIMAN PRECINCT, established July 21, 1863, is bounded on the north by West Jordan Precinct, east by South Jordan, Riverton and Bluff Dale Precincts, south by Utah County and west by Bingham Precinct. It contains about forty miles of valley and mountain country. Pop. in 1880, 342.

HERRIMAN WARD is coextensive with the Herriman Precinct. The village of Herriman, containing nearly all the inhabitants, is pleasantly situated on Butterfield Creek, 22 miles south-west of Salt Lake City, and 2 miles south of Revere Switch, the nearest railway point. It has a good meeting house, which is also used for school purposes, and a number of comfortable dwellings.

In May, 1887, the presiding authorities of the Ward stood as follows;

Bishopric—Charles C. Crump, Presiding Elder.

Deacons' Quorum—Joseph H. Crump, Pres.; James T. Butterfield and George G. Miller, Counselors.

Sunday School—Henry Crane, supt.; Samuel Butterfield and Almon Butterfield, assistants; Nancy J. Freeman, secretary.

Relief Society—Alice B. Crane, Pres.; Margaret E. Crump and Sarah T. Butterfield, Counselors; Mary A. Tempest, secretary.

Y. M. M. I. A.—Jeremiah R. Freeman, Pres.; Wm. Crane and David J. Bowen, Counselors; James G. Crane, secretary.

Y. L. M. I. A.—Emma J. Bodell, Pres.; Sarah Ann Newman and Alice B. Crane, Counselors; Nancy J. Freeman, secretary.

Primary Association—Mary Ann Tempest, Pres.; Clara D. Farmer and Sarah B. Freeman, Counselors; Nancy J. Freeman, secretary.

HISTORY—Herriman was first settled in the spring of 1849 by Henry Herriman, Thos. Butterfield, sen., Robert Petty and John Stoeking. These four brethren built a log cabin each, fenced some land, raised a crop and called their location Butterfield Settlement. They also made a mountain road up what they called Butterfield Canyon, where they found considerable timber. In the fall of 1853, the settlement was strengthened by the arrival of about twenty other families, who were called by President B. Young to locate there. This increased the population to 71 souls. The following year a fort inclosing 2½ acres of ground was built of concrete, as a protection against the Indians, who, while hostile, stole several bands of horses and cattle from the settlers. In the spring of 1858 the settlement was abandoned because of the "Utah war", but reoccupied the same year when peace was restored. Shortly afterwards the present townsite was surveyed, and the settlement named Herriman, in honor of Henry Herriman, one of the first seven Presidents of the Seventies, since which the population has steadily increased, though the prosperity of the place during the last few years has been much impeded by the water in the creek becoming impure through mining camps being established in the canyon above. When the place was first settled the water was pure, grass and timber plentiful and all other natural facilities excellent.

Henry Herriman was the first presiding Elder. He was succeeded by Thomas Butterfield, who presided until 1855, when he was called on a mission to Snake River, and McGee Harris then took charge until the move in 1858, under the direction of the West Jordan Bishopric. After the move Bishop L. W. Hardy and A. O. Smoot visited Herriman and organized it to a Ward with Alexander F. Barron as Bishop and John Stoeking and Henry Arnold as Counselors. In 1861 Bishop Barron was called on a mission to southern Utah, after which Henry Arnold took charge as presiding Elder until the spring of 1866, when he removed to Salt Lake City. In the autumn Ensign I. Stoeking returned from a four-year mission to Europe and was ordained Bishop of the Herriman Ward. He presided about ten years, or until he removed from the Ward in 1876, when Herriman again became a part of the West Jordan Ward, with James Crane as presiding Elder. At a special meeting held in the West Jordan ward house, June 17, 1877, Herriman was organized into a separate Ward, for the third time. On that occasion James Crane was ordained Bishop, with David Bowen and Chas. C. Crump as Counselors, Pres. Daniel H. Wells officiating.

Nov. 25, 1885, Apostle John Henry Smith, Joseph E. Taylor, Bishop Wm. B. Preston and others met with the Saints of Herriman and set apart Chas. C. Crump to act as first Counselor to Bishop Crane, instead of David Bowen, resigned. James G. Crane was ordained a High Priest and set apart as second Counselor.

Bishop Crane died July 6, 1886, since which Elder Chas. C. Crump has had temporary charge of the Ward.

HUNTER PRECINCT, established March 19, 1880, and organized out of the east part of Pleasant Green Precinct, is bounded on the north by the Great Salt Lake, east by North Point, Brighton and Granger Precincts, south by North Jordan Precinct and west by Pleasant Green Precinct. It contains 42 square miles. This precinct, which also comprises School Districts Nos. 50 and 63, belongs to the Pleasant Green Ward.

HOT SPRINGS. On the lines of the Utah Central and D. & R. G. Rys., nearly four miles north-west of the Temple Block, Salt Lake City, and within the city corporation limits, are the celebrated Hot Springs, which boil up from under a huge rock forming a clear and transparent pool of a bluish shade. The water which has a temperature of about 128 deg., smell strongly of sulphur as it emerges from its cavernous source. From the pool it is conveyed in an 8-inch pipe for a distance of about one hundred yards to a cooling tank, 126x30 feet, from which it is brought into the bath houses and then allowed to escape to the Hot Springs Lake, a shallow sheet of water, with irregularly defined shores covering about four square miles of the low country lying between the mountains and the river Jordan, with which the lake is connected by an outlet. Although the healing properties of the Hot Springs water was known at an early day, and experience in several instances showed it to be efficacious in curing diseases, it was not utilized to any extent until a few years ago, when John Beck bought the Hot Springs property with a view of converting it into a bathing resort. He built two bathing houses, made nearly all the improvements now found on the grounds and opened the resort to the public in 1885. The main building is 120x96 feet and contains a plunge bath, 58x32 feet, two ladies baths and four tub baths. The smaller building, 81x35 feet, contains 12 baths, connected with 17 bed and dressing rooms. The business is at present managed by James L. Tibbitts, under the direction of H. B. Clawson, of Salt Lake City, the latter having acted as Mr. Beck's Agent since July 22, 1887. The property is now known as Beck's Hot Springs; the proprietor is absent from the Territory.

LITTLE COTTONWOOD CREEK one of the principal streams entering Salt Lake Valley from the east, rises near the summit of the Wasatch Mountains, a short distance south of the mining town of Alta, and flows in a westerly direction through Little Cottonwood Canyon until it emerges into Salt Lake Valley, about eleven miles from its source; thence its course is north-westerly, through Granite, Union and South Cottonwood Wards, until it empties into the river Jordan about six miles south of Salt Lake City. Its whole length is nearly twenty-four miles. One of the main tributaries of the creek rises in Case's Lake, a small but very romantic sheet of water situated near the tops of the mountains, about two miles south of Alta. It was named after Mr. Geo. W. Case, who located a mining claim near by. Being surrounded by cliffs reaching clear down to the water's edge, it very much resembles Lake Mary, on the Big Cottonwood Creek. The Little Cottonwood Creek has no forks, but a large number of small streams empties into it from both sides of the canyon, some of them heading in romantic lakes near the tops of the mountains.

On this creek is Alta, once an important mining camp, and Wasatch, where the men employed at the Church quarry have their quarters. The tramway between Wasatch and Alta has opened the canyon for the traveling public, and during the summer season a large number of tourists visit Alta and the head-waters of the Little Cottonwood Creek, to enjoy the grand scenery and the cool, refreshing canyon breeze.

HISTORICAL—Little Cottonwood Canyon has been renowned for its rich mines, and at an early day for its excellent timber. At one time a large number of saw-mills were located at various points in the main canyon and several of its numerous side gulches; now there is but little accessible timber left. The mines also are worked but little, compared to what they were years ago.

LITTLE COTTONWOOD PRECINCT, established March 24, 1871, is bounded on the north by Silverton Precinct, east and south by the summit of the mountains, and west by Granite Precinct. It contains all that portion of the Wasatch Mountains which is drained by the head-waters of Little Cottonwood Creek, about 25 square miles. Near the centre of the precinct is situated the mining town of Alta. Pop. in 1880, 300.

HISTORICAL—When the precinct was first organized, it was called Mineral Precinct, but the County court changed its name to what it now is, July 22, 1871.

LITTLE COTTONWOOD WARD. See Union.

LÖVENDAHL'S, a flag station on the U. C. Ry., 9 miles south of Salt Lake City, was named in honor of S.

M. Lovendahl, the owner of the adjacent property.

MILL CREEK, a beautiful mountain stream, rises near the summit of the Wasatch Mountains and flows westward through Mill Creek Canyon for about twelve miles until it emerges into Salt Lake Valley. There it is used for irrigation purposes. From its source to where it originally emptied into the river Jordan, at a point immediately south of the White Bridge, at the foot of North Temple Street, Salt Lake City, was a distance of about twenty-one miles. In its original course it received as tributaries Canyon Creek, Emigration Creek, Red Butte Creek and part of City Creek. These streams all came together in a sort of marsh immediately south of the present site of Salt Lake City. A canal, about one mile long, now conducts the surplus waters of Mill Creek from the Wasatch Roller Mills (situated a short distance west of the State Road) due west to the river Jordan, into which it empties at a point four miles south of the original outlet. The surplus waters of Emigration Creek, Canyon Creek and Red Butte Creek are conducted through a canal along 8th West Street, Salt Lake City, to the Hot Springs Lake.

In early Utah days there were a number of saw-mills on Mill Creek; now there are only two running, as the best timber in Mill Creek Canyon has long since been taken away.

MILL CREEK PRECINCT, established July 21, 1863, is bounded on the north by Farmers and Sugar House Precincts, east by East Mill Creek and Big Cottonwood Precincts, south by South Cottonwood Precinct and separated from North Jordan and Granger Precincts on the west by the river Jordan. It contains about twelve square miles of some of the best and most productive farming land in Utah. Pop. in 1880, 1,416. This precinct contains School Districts Nos. 30, 31, 36 and 39.

MILL CREEK WARD is coextensive with Mill Creek Precinct. It contains a water power flouring-mill, several saw, shingle and planing mills, a number of well stocked general and special stores and many comfortable private residences. The shipments comprise flour, grain and general produce. The ward house is pleasantly situated on rising ground near the centre of the Ward, ½ mile east of the State Road and about five miles south-east of the Temple Block, Salt Lake City. The Ward is noted for its well attended meetings, well conducted organizations, excellent district schools, and for the liberality of the Saints in paying tithing and donations.

In May, 1887, the officers of the Ward stood as follows:

Bishopric—James C. Hamilton, Bishop; John F Snedaker and Jens Hansen, Counselors; Geo. B. Bailey, ward clerk.

There is a Priests' Quorum presided over by the Bishopric, a quorum of ordained Teachers, under the presidency of Samuel Cornwall, and two Deacons' Quorum, presided over by Frank Murphy and Abraham Hill.

Sunday School—John F. Snedaker, supt.; O. P. Lemmon and Levi P Helm, assistants; Clara Snedaker, secretary.

Relief Society—Elizabeth Hill, Pres; Ann Walters Lemmon and Elizabeth Snedaker, Counselors; Francis Hanson, secretary.

Y. M. M. I. A.—Levi P. Helm, Pres.; Wm. N. Hill and Joseph Hansen, Counselors; Philip Carlisle, secretary.

Y. L. M. I. A.—Clara Snedaker, Pres.; Mary B. White and Agnes Merrill, Counselors; Mary Jensen, secretary.

There are four Primary Associations, one in each school district, presided over by Ann Walters Lemmon, Mary McAllister, Francis Hanson and Mary Ann Birch.

HISTORY—In the spring of 1848 John Neff located a mill site on Mill Creek, near a little grove, about two miles below the mouth of Mill Creek Canyon. In July and August following the mill race was dug by a Mr. Binley and about harvest time the mill commenced operation, even before the building was roofed in. With the exception of a small chopping mill put up by Charles Crisman, at the mouth of City Creek Canyon, this was the first mill in Salt Lake Valley, and it made the first flour produced in Utah. This mill occupies one of the finest mill sites in Utah Territory.

Mr. Neff moved his family out on the mill site early in the fall of 1848 and thus became the first settler on Mill Creek. A few weeks later Daniel Russell settled near the mouth of Mill Creek Canyon, about a mile above the mill, and the following spring planted an orchard and commenced farming.

For a number of years the Neff and Russell families were the only settlers in that tract of country now included in the East Mill Creek Ward. In the early days of Utah that upper bench country was considered unfit for cultivation; but some years ago its special adaptation for the raising of fruit and lucern was discovered, and at the present time the excellent quality of the tame hay, garden vegetables and fruits raised in that locality is known all over the country.

In 1848 and 1849, the Gardner family (including Robert Gardner, sen., Archibald Gardner and Robert Gardner, jun.), Reuben Miller, Alexander Hill, Wm. Casper and family, John Borrowman, Joseph Fielding, John Scott, Stephen Chipman, Roger Lukeham, Mary Smith and family (including Patriarch John Smith and Apostle Joseph F Smith) and others settled at various points on Mill Creek and Big Cottonwood Creek. The Gardners built a saw-mill and subsequently a grist-mill about two miles below John Neff's mill site.

In the winter of 1849-50 religious services were held in Alexander Hill's house, on the Big Cottonwood Creek. During the few following years meetings were held in private houses, and in 1853 the first school house, a small adobe building, was erected on the State Road, immediately north of Big Cottonwood Creek. Another small school house (known as the North school house) was built near the present residence of Levi North. This building, which was rather plain in point of architecture, having a mud roof and rough flooring, was pulled down by a number of young men who conceived the idea of a better building. Another house, 30 x 20 feet, was consequently erected in 1855, near the point where the "big ditch" crossed the county road going to Union Fort. A similar school house was built a short distance east o the first school house on the Big Cottonwood, part of the material used for the former building being utilized again. Later, another school house known as the Scott school house, 20 x 30 feet, exclusive of a vestry, was built near the northern limits of the Ward. The present ward house was erected in 1868.

At the time of the general move in April and May, 1858, the Mill Creek Saints settled temporarily at Spanish Fork. A few, also, stopped at Springville, Goshen and other places in Utah County. Nearly all returned in July following.

Shortly after the move, James Gordon opened a distillery and commenced to manufacture whiskey on the State Road. This served as a temptation for the young to become intemperate. For refusing to cease that obnoxious business, Mr. Gordon was excommunicated from the Church, April 10, 1859.

April 8, 1849, Joel H. Johnson was ordained the first Bishop of the Mill Creek Ward. His Counselors were Reuben Miller and James Rawlins. At the General Conference of the Church, held in G. S. L. City, in April, 1851, Reuben Miller was voted to be the Bishop of the Ward. He was ordained shortly afterwards. He chose as Counselors James Rawlins and a brother Hotchkinson. Counselor Hotchkinson, went to California in 1851, and Alexander Hill was chosen second Counselor in his stead. Elder Rawlins was discontinued as Counselor in 1852 or 1853, when Alexander Hill became first Counselor, and Alva Keller was chosen to act as second Counselor. Alva Keller was dropped in 1856, and John A. Smith was chosen in his stead. During the absence of Alexander Hill on a four-months' mission to Salmon River, Robert Gardner acted as Counselor pro tem. in his stead. John A. Smith removed to Tooele County in 1859, and Washington Lemmon was chosen as second Counselor in his stead. This Bishopric (Miller, Hill and Lemmon) stood intact for twenty-three years, no change being made, at the time of the general reorganization in 1877, except that the Ward was slightly diminished in size by the organization of new Wards.

Bishop Reuben Miller died in July, 1882, beloved and honored by the people, over whom he had presided so many years. After his death, Counselor Hill had temporary charge of the Ward until Sunday, March 30, 1884, when Pres. Jos. F. Smith, Apostle Brigham Young, and Prests. Angus M. Cannon and Joseph E. Taylor and others met with the Saints of Mil Creek for the purpose of appointing a new Bishopric. On that occasion James C. Hamilton was ordained a High Priest and set apart to act as Bishop of the Mill Creek Ward by Jos. F. Smith. John F. Snedaker was ordained and set apart by Angus M. Cannon as first, and Jens Hansen by Joseph E. Taylor as second Counselor to Bishop Hamilton.

MOUNTAIN DELL PRECINCT, created Nov. 10, 1877, is bounded on the north by Morgan County, east by Morgan and Summit Counties, south by East Mill Creek Precinct, and west by Sugar House Precinct. It contains about fifty square miles of mountain country and includes School District No. 55. Pop. in 1880, 95.

MOUNTAIN DELL WARD is coextensive with the precinct bearing the same name. The ward house, a small log building, which is also used for school purposes, is situated in Parley's Canyon, about fourteen miles south-east of the Temple Block, Salt Lake City. The population of the Ward consists of eleven "Mormon" families and two families of "outsiders." Most of the people live on the creeks near what is known as Hardy's Station. All kinds of small grain and potatoes are raised without irrigation. The farms are located on the table land back from the creeks.

In May, 1887, the presiding authorities of the Ward stood as follows:

Bishopric—Wm. B. Hardy, Bishop; Wm. W. Taylor and James Laird, Counselors; Bines Dixon, ward clerk.

Sunday School—Wm. W. Taylor, supt.; W. B. Hardy assistant, Bines Dixon, jun.; secretary.

Relief Society—Mary Dixon, Pres.; Taey Hardy and Elizabeth Windmill, Counselors; Emily Taylor, secretary.

Y. M. & Y. L. M. I. A.—Mary Hards Pres.; Mary Dixon and Velara Laird, Counselors; Elizabeth Taylor, secretary.

HISTORY—The first settler in Parley's Canyon was Mr. Hatch who located on Big Mountain Creek, about two miles north of Hardy's Station about the year 1855. One or two more families moved up soon afterwards. In 1860 Bishop L. W. Hardy built a house at the "forks," where he for a number of years kept a mail station. Ephraim Hanks had made some improvements on the same grounds previous to this. It is only a few years since farming was actually commenced.

The first ecclesiastical organization known dates back to Oct. 5, 1878, when James Laird "was sustained as presiding Priest of the Mountain Dell Branch of the Sugar House Ward." This was done at a Stake conference. Aug. 20, 1882, the branch was organized as a Ward with Wm. B. Hardy as Bishop and Wm. W. Taylor and James Laird as Counselors. Counselor Laird died, and Bines Dixon was subsequently ordained a High Priest and set apart as second Counselor to Bishop Hardy by C. W. Penrose.

MURRAY, the post office name for South Cottonwood, 7 miles south of Salt Lake City, was named in honor of Governor Eli H. Murray.

NORTH JORDAN PRECINCT, established June 3, 1872, is bounded on the north by Pleasant Green, Hunter and Granger Precincts, separated from Mill Creek and South Cottonwood Precincts on the east by the river Jordan, bounded on the south by West Jordan Precinct and separated from Tooele County on the west by the summit of the Oquirrh Mountains. It contains about thirty square miles of valley and mountain country. Pop. in 1880, 282.

NORTH JORDAN WARD, also known as Taylorsville, is coextensive with the North Jordan Precinct. The ward house beautifully located near the centre of the Ward west of the river Jordan, is 10½ miles south-west of Salt Lake City, and 1½ west of Francklyn, the nearest railway station. The Ward contains a water power grist-mill, some of the best farms in Salt Lake Valley and many fine residences. Farming and sheep raising are the principal industries of its inhabitants. The Ward is known for its well attended meetings, orderly Sunday School, lively associations and the general industry of its inhabitants. An efficient chour is ably conducted by Archibald Frame.

The follwing were the presiding authorities of the Ward in May, 1887.

Bishopric—Samuel Bennion, Bishop; William Panter and Samuel Bringhurst, jun.; Counselors.

Deacons' Quorum—Parley Wiliams, President; Archibald Frame, jun.; and Wm. H. Harker, Counselors. There are also a number of ordained Priests and Teachers not yet properly organized into quorums.

Sunday School—Archibald Frame, superintendent; George M. Spencer, and Wm. H. Haigh, assistants; Albert Spencer, secretary.

Relief Society—Eliza Spencer, Pres.; Mary P. Bennion and Mary Ann Webster, Counselors; Alice J. Harker, secretary.

Y. M. M. I. A.—Joseph S. Lindsay, Pres.; Wm. Harker and James Frame, Counselors; John W. Webster, secretary.

Y. L. M. I. A.—Fanny Frame, Pres.; Mary Ann Haigh and Elizabeth Frame, Counselors; Georgiana Webster, secretary.

Primary Association—Eliza A. Bennion, Pres.; Susan W. Bennion and Mary E. Lindsay, Counselors; Laura Bennion, secretary.

HISTORY—The early history of the North Jordan Ward is interwoven with that of West Jordan, being the head-quarters of the latter Ward until the spring of 1859, when Bishop A. Gardner became Bishop. At that time the West Jordan Ward, included all that part of Salt Lake County lying west of the river Jordan, besides a small tract of country on the east side. A branch organization was effected at North Jordan with John Bennion as presiding Elder. He acted under the direction of Bishop Gardner. Elder John Bennion resigned his position and Samuel Bennion succeeded him as presiding Elder, Sept. 27, 1863. The latter acted in that capacity until June 17, 1877, when the North Jordan branch was organized into a Ward with Samuel Bennion as Bishop and Archibald Frame and Joseph Harker as Counselors. These brethren were all ordained and set apart on that occasion, Elder Bennion by Bishop Hunter. The Ward at that time also comprised most of that section of country now included in the Granger Ward. July 29, 1883 Daniel McRae and Samuel Bringhurst, jun., were ordained High Priests and set apart to act as Counselors to Bishop Bennion, instead of Counselor Frame and Harker; and when the Granger Ward was organized partly of the north district of North Jordan, Feb. 24,1884, William Panter was chosen as first Counselor to Bishop Bennion, instead of Counselor McRae, who was chosen as Bishop of the new Ward. The original North Jordan Canal (See West Jordan) has been enlarged several times until it now is 16 feet wide in the bottom. The North Jordan people have also taken an active part in making the so-called South Jordan Canal, which taps the river at Bluff Dale at the same point as the Salt Lake City Canal. From these two canals the people get their main water supply for irrigation purposes.

The present ward house, a fine brick building, was erected in 1878, as an addition to the rock school house built some pears previous.

NORTH POINT PRECINCT, established March 19, 1880, of a part of Brighton Precinct, is bounded on the north by the Great Salt Lake, separated from Davis County and Salt Lake City on the east by the river Jordan, bounded on the south by Brighton Precinct and west by Hunter Precinct. It contains about twenty square miles of level country, a great deal of which consists of alkali bottoms. This precinct belongs to the Brighton Ward and contains School District No. 48. The population of North Point consists of about thirty families, all members of the Church but one.

PAPER MILL POST OFFICE is the post office name for the Sugar House Ward.

PLEASANT GREEN PRECINCT, established July 21, 1874, is bounded on the north by the Great Salt Lake, east by Hunter Precinct, south by North Jordan Precinct and west by the summit of the Oquirrh Mountains, or the county line. It contains about seventy square miles of valley and mountain country, only a small portion of which is adapted for cultivation. Pop. in 1880, 179. School District No. 47 is included in this precinct.

PLEASANT GREEN WARD comprises the Pleasant Green and Hunter Precincts. The ward house, which is also used for school purposes, is located in the centre of a fine farming district, about twelve miles south-west of Salt Lake City. Nearly all the inhabitants are Latter-day Saints, who all live on their farms in a scattered condition. The farming lands are watered from the Utah & Salt Lake Canal, or cultivated without irrigation, good crops being raised in some places upon the latter principle. Religious meetings are held in the ward house and also in the Hunter school house.

In May, 1887, the presiding authorities of the Ward stood as follows:

Bishopric—Lehi N. Hardman Bishop; Hyrum T. Spencer and John Hirst, Counselors; Peter LeCheminant, ward clerk.

Deacons' Quorum—James C. Bertoch, Pres.

Sunday School—Isaac Coon, President; James Bertoch and Austin M. Brown, Counselors; Samuel B. Taylor, secretary.

Relief Society—Alvira S. Hirst, Pres.; Ann Bertoch and Nancy Dearden, Counselors; Fanny Jenkins, secretary.

Y. M. & Y. L. M. I. A.—Isaac Coon, President; Austin M. Brown and James C. Bertoch, Counselors; Jane E. Spencer, secretary.

HISTORY—Lorenzo D. Young was the first man who located a stock range in that district of country now included in the Pleasant Green Ward. He settled at Mill Stone Point, about fourteen miles west of Salt Lake City. Some time afterwards Joseph Toronto located another stock range at a place known in early times as Toronto's Point, (now Spencer's Point), about one mile west of Mr. Young's range. In the fall of 1859, the three brothers LeCheminant (Peter, Osmond and Edmund) settled near by, and a few years later attempts were made at dry farming, but this did not prove very profitable. Not until after the completion of the Utah & Salt Lake Canal (which terminates at Spencer's Point,) was farming entered into by the Pleasant Green people to any great extent.

The first settlers of Pleasant Green belonged ecclesiastically to Salt Lake City until 1867, when they became a part of the Brighton Ward. John Hirst was the first Elder who commenced holding meetings at Pleasant Green, and for a number of years services were held in private houses, the great distance to the place where meetings were held in the Brighton Ward making it inconvenient for the settlers from the west side to meet there. At the time of the reorganization of the Brighton Ward, July 29, 1877, John Hirst was ordained and set apart by Pres. D. H. Wells as presiding Priest of the Pleasant Green branch of the Brighton Ward. That same year a meeting house (the present ward house) was built, and the first meeting held in it Dec. 30, 1877.

At a meeting held at Pleasant Green, April 15, 1877, the Saints there were counseled to keep a record of their own, which has been done ever since. Elder John Hirst died at Pleasant Green, Sept. 7, 1878; and Lehi Nephi Hardman was ordained and set apart as presiding Priest in his stead by Daniel H. Wells, Sept. 22, 1878.

At a meeting held at Pleasant Green, Sunday Oct. 1, 1882, the Pleasant Green branch of the Brighton Ward was organized into a separate Ward with Lehi N. Hardman as Bishop. He was ordained and set apart by Apostle Brigham Young, jun. Hyrum T. Spencer was ordained and set apart by Pres. Angus M. Cannon as first and John Hirst by Joseph E. Taylor as second Counselor. Peter LeCheminant, was appointed ward clerk.

RED BUTTE CREEK, a clear mountain stream, rises near the summit of the Wasatch Mountains and flows in a south-westerly direction through Red Butte Canyon for nearly eight miles until it emerges into Salt Lake Valley just above Fort Douglas. There a good portion of its water is taken into reservoirs and used for culinary and irrigation purposes. The residue of the stream is used by the Salt Lake City people for watering gardens. The original creek emptied into the Mill Creek immediately south of Salt Lake City.

REVERE SWITCH, a flag station on the Bingham Branch of the D. & R. G. Ry. is situated on Bingham Creek, 5½ miles north-east of Bingham and 19 miles south-west of Salt Lake City.

RIVERTON PRECINCT, established Dec. 23, 1879, is bounded on the north by South Jordan Precinct, separated from Draper Precinct on the east by the river Jordan, bounded on the south by Bluff Dale Precinct and west by Herriman Precinct. It contains about twelve square miles and includes School District No. 44.

RIVERTON WARD is coextensive with Riverton Precinct. The ward house, pleasantly situated on rising ground, a short distance west of the river Jordan, is about nineteen miles south of the Temple Block, Salt Lake City.

In May, 1887, the presiding authorities of the Ward stood as follows.

Bishopric—O. P. Miller, Bishop; Jesse M. Smith and Gordon S. Bills, Counselors.

Sunday School—S. L. Howard, supt.; Alexander B. Kidd and Christian Petersen, assistants; Charles M. Nokes, secretary.

There are also a Deacons' quorum, improvement associations, etc.

HISTORY—Samuel Green, Timothy Gilbert, Peter N. Garff and Chris. Christensen were among the first settlers on the river bottom in that section of country now included in the Riverton Ward. Lars Jensen was the first settler on the bench, west of the river bottom, and built the first house at a point about a mile south-west of where the Riverton ward house now stands. This was in 1870. In the beginning of 1871 work was commenced on the South Jordan Canal, which had been surveyed the year previous. After three years labor, in which John Hansen took a very prominent part, the county came to the assistance and completed the canal, which taps the river Jordan near the "Point of the Mountain", about one mile north of the county line, and is about twenty miles long. Water was first turned into it about the year 1876, and from that time the bench country began to fill up with settlers who irrigated their farms from the canal water. A few years later, when the Utah & Salt Lake Canal was completed, more land was brought under cultivation; hence the gradual increase of the population.

At an early day a branch organization was effected, with Nicholas T. Silcock as President, and the little settlement called Gardnersville, in honor of Bishop Archibald Gardner who owned most of the land in the neighborhood at that time. Bro. Silcock presided under the West Jordan Bishopric until the reorganization in 1877, when Gardnersville was consolidated with and made a part of the South Jordan Ward, which was organized June 17, 1877. In 1879, when a precinct was established, the name of the settlement was changed to Riverton. Another branch organization took place in 1881, when Lars Jensen was appointed President under the direction of the South Jordan Bishopric. After this meetings were held regularly every Sabbath. Elder Jensen presided until his death April 23, 1883. Some time afterwards Orin P. Miller was placed in charge of the branch. He presided until Aug. 8, 1886, when Riverton was organized into a separate Ward, with Orin P. Miller as Bishop, and Jesse Morgan Smith and Gordon S. Bills as Counselors.

ROSE CREEK, a small mountain stream rises in the Oquirrh Mountains, near the boundary line between Salt Lake, Utah and Tooele Counties, and flows through Rose Canyon in a north-easterly direction for about six miles, until it emerges into Salt Lake Valley. There it is taken up by the Herriman people and used for irrigation purposes. The creek and canyon were named in honor of a family called Rose, who burned coal in the canyon at an early day.

SALT LAKE CITY, the headquarters of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, the capital and metropolis of Utah Territory, the judicial seat of Salt Lake County, and one of the handsomest cities in America, is located on the river Jordan, 12 miles from the southeast shore of the Great Salt Lake, at 40 deg. 46 min. 8 sec. north latitude and 112 deg. 6 min. 8 sec. west Greenwich longitude, in the famous Salt Lake Basin, at an altitude of 4,200 feet above sea level. It nestles at the very base of the Wasatch Mountains, which, within a few miles of the city, rear their lofty snow-capped peaks from 7,000 to 8,000 feet above, displaying their varying beauties of canyon, crag, pass and cone; and as they stretch far southward, bounding for over 200 miles the grandest of valleys, the paradise of the farmer, horticulturist and fruit-grower. To the west and north-west lies the silent, mysterious Great Salt Lake, with its health-giving miniature sea-breezes and exceptional bathing facilities.

The area of the city is about four miles east and west by three miles north and south, and most of the streets, which cross each other at right angles, are 132 feet wide, and are lined by a uniform succession of shade and fruit trees, and washed at either curb by cold and sparkling mountain streams, giving the whole city the appearance of a huge grove, whose luxuriance of foliage covers an attractive collection of marts, cottages and villas, with here and there a steeple, a dome or a tower of some handsome residence standing boldly out from amidst the mass of trees.

The shape of the city assumes something of the appearance of an irregular and broad faced L, the angle, an obtuse one, being formed by a short western spur of the Wasatch range of mountains, the south-western corner of which the city closely hugs. Of late years the houses have crept gradually up the foot of the spur, or bench as it is called. On this elevated portion of the city, the blocks are smaller and the streets narrower than in the older portion.

The mean summer temperature of the city is about 74 deg., but on account of the dry and rare atmosphere it is not more oppressive than a mean five degrees lower would be on the sea level. Although the mercury often reads above 90 deg. in July and August, sunstroke is almost unknown, severe thunders and lightnings are infrequent, and the nights are uniformly cool. The mean temperature in winter is about 32 deg., and the Salt Laker often has occasion to felicitate himself on the enjoyment of the pleasantest of winter weather, when the great eastern railways are blocked up by snow, or the mercury at the chief centres of population day after day reads from 15 to 30 deg. below zero. The real winter holds from three to six weeks only. The annual mean is 51 deg., and a residence in the city is worth the while solely for the agreeableness of the climate.

The present corporate limits of Salt Lake City are nearly ten miles from east to west, and about five miles from north to south. From this, however, must be taken the Fort Douglass Military Reservation, two miles square, situated immediately east of the city proper.

The city is divided into five municipal wards, and also into twenty-one ecclesiastical, or Bishops', Wards. The city government is vested in a city council composed of a mayor, five aldermen—one for each of the five municipal wards—and nine councilors, who are elected biennially by the qualified voters on the second Monday in February of each even year. At the same election a marshal, a treasurer, a recorder and an assessor and collector are also elected, and hold office for two years and until their successors are elected. About the city are springing up various manufacturing industries, all calculated to win for it permanen prosperity, and maintain its future importance as a commercial centre. The Salt Lake County Court House is situated in the city. In the City Hall the Territorial Legislature convenes, there being no State House. The District Court of the Third District holds its sessions in what is known as the Wasatch Block, a large building constructed for commercial purposes; in the same structure the Postoffice is situated. The finest public buildings in the city are either religious, benevolent, educational, or for amusement. There are the Temple, Tabernacle and Salt Lake Assembly Hall on the Temple Block, besides several fine meeting houses in some of the Bishop's Wards. There are also St. Mark's Cathedral, St. Paul's Chapel, the Presbyterian, Methodist, Congregational, Catholic and Baptist Churches, and that of the so-called Josephite Church, and the Jewish Synagogue. The Deseret University is a fine educational structure, not finished as yet; there are also Hammond Hall, the Salt Lake Collegiate Institute, St Mary's Academy, Rowland Hall, St. Mark's

School House and several others. One of the finest structures in the city, and of recent date, is St. Mary's Hospital, situated in the eastern part of the city. The Salt Lake Theatre and the Walker Opera House are the most noted places of amusement.

Among the places of interest is the Deseret Museum, opposite the Temple Block, south. From the numerous curiosities deposited there the visitor may form a somewhat correct idea of the wonderful resources of the Rocky Mountain country.

There are three cemeteries: the City Cemetery, adjoining which is the Jewish; and the Mount Olivet, situated on the bench east of the city proper. The two former are northeast of the city, but all within the corporate limits.

There are within the limits of the city four public places, intended at a future time for parks; while the old Mill Farm, situated at the southeastern part of the city, was purchased a few years ago, for park purposes, and it is now known as the Liberty Park. The park proper contains 100 acres; while there are ten acres at the south-east corner, in which springs rise, and are also embraced in the resort. The work of putting it in proper condition has barely commenced.

The city has pleasant hotel accomodations, insuring comfort at reasonable prices; it has excellent waters supplied from City Creek by means of piping laid under the streets, with frequent hydrants and head sufficient to force it over the tops of the highest buildings. The water is largely consumed during the year for culinary purposes, and in the summer also for the sprinkling of lawns, made of easy avail in the more thickly settled portion of the town by means of water mains. There are about thirteen miles of main pipes in the city doing service for culinary, lawn and fire purposes when required. The mains are tapped at regular intervals by hydrants so as to render every assistance in case of fire.

The Warm and Hot Springs, noted for their health-giving mineral waters and for the healing effect upon bathers, are within the corporate limits of the city; the first being connected with all parts of the city by street cars.

Persons visiting the Great Salt Lake, either for the benefit of the breeze, for the advantages of bathing, or simply for the purpose of viewing its surface, first go to Salt Lake City, from which point there is rail communication to the Lake. The distance from the city to the portions of the lake most freqnently visited is about twenty miles.

The city is lighted both by gas and by the electric light. Between ten and twelve miles of gas mains thread the principal streets of the city.

The Utah Central and Denver & Rio Grande Railways connect the city with the Union Pacific and Central Pacific at Ogden, the Union Pacific continuing the connection from Ogden with the Atlantic States, and the latter with the Pacific States. The Utah & Northern secures connection with Idaho and Montana. The Denver & Rio Grande also gives connection with the Atlantic States by its own route, while the Utah Central gives connection with the more southern settlements of the Territory. The Utah & Nevada gives communication with the Great Salt Lake and mining camps in the Oquirrh range, as do the Salt Lake Western and the Bingham Branch of the D. & R. G. Ry., while the camps of Little Cottonwood can be reached over the Alta Branch of the D. & R. G. Ry., and Park City via the Utah Central, Union Pacific and Echo & Park City roads. Telegraphic communication may be had over the world by the Western Union, while by the Deseret Telegraph Company, a local line, Territorial cities and towns may be reached. The street cars run to all parts of the city; telephonic and district telegraph systems are in operation.

The population of the city is at present estimated to be nearly 30,000, of which nearly three-fourths are members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.

HISTORY.—Salt Lake City was first settled by a company of Latter day Saints, under the leadership of Pres. Brigham Young. This company is known in local history as the Pioneers. They were the advance guard of the large body of Saints who were expatriated from Nauvoo, Hancock County, Illinois, in the spring of 1846. The Pioneers, numbering 143 men, 3 women and 2 children, left the Missouri River at Winter Quarters, (now Florence, Nebraska) in April, 1847, with 73 wagons, and were joined by about a dozen other persons on the journey. Orson Pratt and Erastus Snow, two of the Pioneers, entered the valley of the Great Salt Lake through Emigration Canyon, about five miles south-east of the city, July 21st of the same year, Mr. Pratt being the first to set foot on the present site of Salt Lake City. The day following the main body of the Pioneers entered the valley, and encamped two or three miles south of the city, moving the camps northward and camping on the spot now known as Washington, or the Eighth Ward, Square, on the 23d. President Young, who had been delayed because of prostration caused by an attack of mountain fever, entered the valley with the remainder of the Pioneers, on the 24th. On the 29th about 150 members of the Mormon Battalion, consisting of detachments of sick, who had wintered at Pueblo on the Arkansas River, also arrived, accompanied by a party of Saints numbering some fifty souls, the latter having started from Mississippi in 1846, and wintered at Pueblo. The Battalion was under charge of Captains James Brown and Nelson Higgins and Lieutenant Wesley W. Willis. A ten-acre fort of logs and adobes was built on what is now known as the Old Fort Square in the Sixth Ward. Two additions, the North Fort and the South Fort, were subsequently made, the original ten-acre fort being too small to accomodate all the people.

Elder Tarleton Lewis was appointed Bishop in the Middle Fort, Edward Hunter in the South Fort and Joseph B. Noble in the North Fort.

In the fall of the year 1847, nearly two thousand other immigrants followed the Pioneers, coming mainly from Winter Quarters and immediate vicinity. In August, 1847, the survey of a city was commenced, and at a meeting held Aug. 22, 1847, it was decided to call the new town site the "City of the Great Salt Lake," this, sometime afterwards, took the form of Great Salt Lake City. The city was laid off into blocks of 10 acres each, or 40 rods square, the streets intersecting each other at right angles, with a total width of eight rods, including 20 feet of sidewalk on either side of the street.

In March, 1848, the Great Salt Lake City fort contained 423 houses and 1,671 souls. Their farming field consisted of 5,133 acres of land, of which 875 acres were sown with winter wheat. About this time a post office was established with Jos. L. Heywood as postmaster. On the 25th of March the first public meeting was held on the Temple Block.

In consequence of the scanty harvest of 1848 breadstuff and other provisions became very scarce in the valley, and many of the people were compelled to eat rawhides and to dig sego roots for months upon which to subsist previous to the harvest of 1848. In the fall of that year Pres. Brigham Young, Heber C. Kimball, Willard Richards and Amasa M. Lyman arrived in the valley with large companies of Saints.

In the spring of 1849 most of the people who had wintered in the fort moved out onto their city lots, or into the adjoining country. At the General Conference held in October, 1849, a Carrying Company, for carrying goods from the Missouri River to the valley and also to run a passenger train was organized. About five hundred wagons and fourteen hundred Saints arrived in the valley in 1849, besides a number of California emigrants who, during their stay in the Territory, were converted to "Mormonism" and remained with the Saints.

June 15, 1850, the first number of the Deseret News, the first paper published in the Rocky Mountains, was issued in Great Salt Lake City; Willard Richards, editor.

At the General Conference held in the city in October, 1853, the Bishops of the various Wards reported 5,979 members of the Church in the city, besides a few non-Mormons. In 1860 the population had increased to about 9,000, in 1870 to 12,854 and in 1880 to 20,765.

Great Salt Lake City was incorporated by act of the General Assembly of the Provisional State of Deseret, approved Jan. 19, 1851. The legislature of the Territory of Utah, by joint resolution, approved Oct. 4, 1851, adopted or legalized the laws of the Provisional Government of Deseret. The incorporation act of Jan. 20, 1860, repealed the previous incorporation act, but confirmed the old boundary lines, with the exception of a few slight changes intended to secure greater definiteness. The incorporation limits were about eight miles east and west, and a trifle over six miles north and south. An act, approved Jan. 18, 1867, removed the western boundary line from the banks of the Jordan River to a line running due north and south, averaging about two miles west of the river. An act, approved Jan. 29, 1868, changed the names of Great Salt Lake City and County to Salt Lake City and Salt Lake County. An act, approved Feb. 15, 1872, removed the south line, east of the Jordan River, northward to 10th South Street, thus excluding nearly all of the Five Acre Survey.

The first municipal officers of the city were appointed by the governor and legislature, Jan. 9. 1851. Jedediah M. Grant was appointed mayor; N. H. Felt, William Snow, Jesse P. Harmon and N. V. Jones, aldermen; Vincent Shurtliff, B. L. Clapp, Zera Pulsipher, Wm. G. Perkins, Lewis Robison, Harrison Burgess, Jeter Clinton, John L. Dunyon and Samuel Richards, councilors; Robert Campbell, recorder, and Elam Luddington, marshal. On the 11th the officers took the oath of office, and the city council apportioned the city into four municipal wards.

Mayor Grant died Dec. 1, 1856, and A. O. Smoot succeeded him. He served as mayor ten years, or until 1866, when he was succeeded by Daniel H. Wells, who also served ten years, after which Hon. Feramorz Little served six years, (from 1876 to 1882), Wm. Jennings two years (1882-84), and James Sharp two years (1884-86). The present incumbent, Francis Armstrong, has served since Feb. 1886.

Great Salt Lake City, naturally, was the capital or central point of the country in its vicinity. An act of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory, however, approved Oct. 4, 1851, made Fillmore, in Millard County, about 130 miles south of the city, the capital of the Territory, at which place one wing of a State house was subsequently built. Later, on Dec. 15, 1856, the seat of government was removed to Salt Lake City, and it has remained there from that date up to the present period.

The increase in the population of the city has been steady and pronounced from the first, although its development, like that of the whole Territory, was necessarily slow, because of the great hardships which had to be borne from drouth and other difficulties in earlier times, because of a lack of sufficient food for a number of years in Pioneer days, and because of the great distance—about a thousand miles—between Salt Lake City and any civilized point outside Utah. For years, nearly the only money brought into the Territory was by immigrants coming and passing through, many of whom, while on their way to California, were glad to dispose of surplus articles at a nominal price, and in exchange for articles of food that could be had in Utah.

At the General Conference held April 7, 1851, it was voted to build a Temple in Great Salt Lake City. Feb. 14, 1853, the Temple Block was dedicated and the ground broken for the foundation of the Temple, the corner stones of which were laid April 6th following. June 16, 1854, the workmen began to lay the foundation, which was completed July 23, 1855. Aug. 15, 1854, a wall, which yet remains, was completed around the Temple Block. The Endowment House was built in 1855 and dedicated May 5th of that year.

In the spring of 1851 school houses were built in most of the Wards in the city, and also in the country Wards.

May 21, 1851, work was commenced on the structure subsequently known as the Old Tabernacle. The building was dedicated April 6, 1852, and was used for religious worship until 1879, when it was pulled down to make room for the present Salt Lake Assembly Hall. The building now known as the Big Tabernacle, on the Temple Block, was completed in 1867.

The first legislature of Utah Territory convened in Great Salt Lake City, Sept. 22, 1851. The "University of the State of Deseret" was opened in the city Nov. 11, 1851. In February, 1852, the Territorial Library was opened in the Council House, with Wm. C. Staines as librarian. Congress had appropriated 5,000 towards the purchase of books, which were selected by Delegate J. M. Bernhisel. Sept. 3. 1852, the first company of Perpetual Emigrating Fund immigrants arrived in the city from Europe with 31 wagons; A. O Smoot captain.

In 1853 the "Spanish Wall" was built around the city. It was twelve feet high six feet thick at the base, tapering to two feet six inches six feet from the ground, and preserving that thickness to the top. It was nine miles in length. This wall was built as a protection against the Indians.

A mass meeting was held in the city Jan. 31, 1854, for the purpose of taking steps towards memorializing Congress to construct a national railroad from the Missouri River via the South Pass and G. S. L. City, to the Pacific. In the following March Elias Smith succeeded the late Willard Richards as postmaster. Aug. 31, 1854, Col. E. J. Steptoe arrived in the city with about one hundred and seventy five soldiers.

In 1855 the County Court House, "Lion House" and other noted public and private buildings were erected in the city.

At a mass meeting held in the city, Jan. 26, 1856, steps were taken for organizing the B. Y. Express Carrying Company, to carry a daily exprss from the Missouri River to California. In subsequent meetings shares were taken to stock a thousand miles of the road.

An ordinance providing for the organization of a Fire Department was passed by the city council, Oct. 17, 1856. Jesse C. Little was appointed chief engineer.

Sept. 26, 1856, the first two companies of immigrating Saints which crossed the plains with hand carts arrived in the city, in charge of Edmund Ellsworth and D. D. McArthur. Other companies which followed—notably James G Willie's company, which arrived Nov. 9th, and Edward Martin's company, which arrived Nov. 30th, of that year—suffered extremely from cold and hardships before reaching the valley.

July 24, 1857, while the people of Great Salt Lake City and vicinity celebrated the 10th anniversary of the arrival of the Pioneers by a feast in Big Cottonwood Canyon, Mr. Judson Stoddard arrived from Independence, Mo., and reported that General Harney with 2,000 infantry, and a proportionate number of artillery and cavalry, were ordered to Utah. A few days later the Utah militia was ordered to be kept in readiness for an expedition to the mountains, to prevent the entering of the approaching army, if necessary, and on the 15th of August Col. Robert T. Burton and J. W. Cummings started east with 70 men for the purpose of protecting the immigrant trains and making observations in regard to the approaching army.

Capt. Stewart Van Vliet, of Gen. Harney's staff, arrived in the City Sept. 8th, and the following day had an interview with President Young. After a few day's stay he returned to his escort on Ham's Fork and proceeded from there to Washington, where he used his influence in favor of the Saints. Sept. 15th, Governor Brigham Young declared the Territory of Utah under martial law and forbade the troops to enter Great Salt Lake Valley. Large numbers of armed militia were ordered to Echo Canyon and other points to intercept the soldiers and prevent their access to the valley.

Jan. 16, 1858, a large mass meeting of citizens was held in the Tabernacle, in which a petition and resolution, setting forth the true state of affairs in Utah, were adopted and, on motion, sent to the U. S. government at Washington. Col. Thos. L. Kane arrived in the City by way of California, Feb. 24, 1858. He came voluntarily for the purpose of bringing about a peaceful solution of the existing difficulties between the United States and Utah. After consulting with Gov. Young and other leading citizens he went out to the army, which was encamped at Ft. Scott, (near Ft. Bridger). There he had an interview with the new governor, Alfred Cumming, who concluded to go with him to the city. In company with Col. Kane he arrived in the city April 12, 1858 and was kindly received by Pres. Young and other leading citizens and treated everywhere with "respectful attention." On the 19th he and Col. Kane visited the Utah library, where J. W. Cummings showed them the records and seal of the U. S. District Court, said to have been destroyed, and which was assigned as one of the reasons for ordering the army to Utah. A few days later the governor sent a truthful report to the Federal government in relation to the existing difficulties, proving that the "Mormons" were loyal to the Federal Government and that the sending of the expedition to Utah was a mistake.

At a public meeting held in the city March 21, 1858, the citizens agreed to leave their homes and go south, all the information derived from the eastern papers being to the effect that the approaching army was sent to destroy them. This resolution was carried into effect in April and May following, when all the citizens of northern Utah abandoned their homes and moved southward, leaving only a few men in every settlement to burn everything in case the approaching troops on their arrival in the valley should prove hostile. About one hundred men were left in the city for that purpose. The destination of the people, when they started, was by some supposed to be Sonoro, Mexico, but most of them located temporarily in Utah County.

June 7, 1858, L. W. Powell, of Kentucky, and Ben. McCullough, of Texas, sent as peace commissioners by the Federal government, arrived in the city. On the 11th they met in council with Pres Young and other leading men in the Council House, and after considerable discussion the existing difficulties were peaceably adjusted.

June 26, 1858, the soldiers, under Col. Johnston, passed through the city and camped on the west side of the river Jordan. They subsequently marched to Cedar Valley, in Utah County, where they located Camp Floyd. Soon after the arrival of the troops the citizens returned to their homes.

In the spring of 1860, the experiment of the "Pony Express" from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean was made. The first Pony Express from the west left Sacramento City, Cal., at 12 p. m. on the night of April 3rd and arrived in Great Salt Lake City at 11:45 p. m, on the 11th; from the east it left St. Joseph, Mo., at 6: 30 on the evening of April 3rd, and arrived in Great Salt Lake City at 6: 25 on the evening of the 9th.

In October, 1861, the Overland Telegraph Line was completed to Salt Lake City both from the east and west. On the 18th Pres. Young sent the first telegram which passed over the line east, and the first telegram was sent to San Francisco on the 24th.

In October, 1862, Col. P. E. Connor arrived in Great Salt Lake City, and two days later located Camp Douglas. During the year 1863 bitter feelings existed between these troops and the citizens.

In the earlier years of the settlement of the city there was a depression in business every winter. Merchandise was supplied almost entirely by ox-teams from the Missouri River, 1,000 miles east, which could make the trip only twice in a summer. The greater portion of the goods thus brought were generally sold out as early as Christmas, or soon after, and the market was consequently bare of them until a further supply could be had, while the prices all kinds of imported articles commanded in these days would seem fabulous. The discovery and development of gold mines in Montana, Idaho and other adjacent places in 1863, and later years, caused considerable business in Salt Lake and secured very high prices for Utah products. Wheat went as high as $5 and $6 per bushel; flour commanded prices ranging all the way from $12 to $25 per 100 pounds; while other things were held proportionately. In 1869 the construction and opening of the Union Pacific and Central Pacific Railroads, and latterly the Utah Central, and the discovery and development of valuable lead and silver mines in the Territory, introduced a most notable era of prosperity. This was followed by the pronounced depression in business, experienced over the whole country in 1873-4, from which Salt Lake City early recovered, only to suffer gradual but equally stringent depression ten years later.

Jan. 8, 1866, the City Hall on the corner of 1st South and 1st East Streets was dedicated.

Oct. 16, 1868, Zion's Co-operative Mercantile Institution commenced operations in the city.

Jan. 10, 1870, the capital of Utah was put in closer communication with the outside world by the completion of the Utah Central Railway.

In 1873 Salt Lake City was first lighted with gas.

On Wednesday Aug. 29, 1877, Pres. Brigham Young died at his residence, in Salt Lake City.

Salt Lake City was originally watered by City Creek, Red Butte and Emigration Creeks, but as the population of the city increased these streams were found to be inadequate for culinary and irrigation purposes. Consequently, by act of the Legislature, approved Feb. 20, 1880, the city council was authorized to borrow $250,000 to construct a canal, tapping the Jordan River at a point about twenty-five miles south of the city, to furnish the city with water and supply those needing it for irrigating purposes, at the same time releasing the nearer and better streams for culinary purposes. This canal was finished in 1881, having traversed the eastern side of the valley, and costing about $200,000.

Salt Lake City has always been the most important city in Utah Territory commercially as well as in other respects. It has also been the centre of mining interests and the earliest mining developments of the Territory. For further information see Church Chronology, by Andrew Jenson, pp. 31-112.

—FIRST WARD is separated from the Tenth Ward on the north by 6th South Street, bounded on the east by the Fort Douglas Military Reservation, on the south by the limits of the city—Roper Street—and separated from the Second Ward on the west by 6th East Street. It comprises the south-east corner of Salt Lake City and had a population of 520 in 1880. Nearly all the inhabitants are Latter-day Saints. The only public building in the Ward is the ward house, a fine brick building, 50x37 feet, erected in 1872, at a cost of about $7,000. It is situated on 8th East Street, between 7th and 8th South Streets. A district school house joins it on the south side.

In May, 1887, the presiding authorities of the Ward stood as follows:

Bishopric — Joseph Warburton, Bishop; Joseph Booth and John T. Thorup, Counselors; Charles Brown, ward clerk.

Deacons' Quorum—Heber D. Mitchell, President; William H. Warburton and Robert Siddoway, Counselors.

Sunday School—Niels Rasmussen, supt.; Joseph Stay and Wm. T. Jack, assistants; James D. Van Tassell, secretary.

Relief Society—Margaret Steele, Pres.; Anne Young and Jane Van Tassell, Counselors; Anna Kemmerly, secretary.

Y. M. M. I. A.—Wm. T. Jack, Pres.; Arnold H. Schulthess and James Young, Counselors; Millard F. Eakle, secretary.

Y. L. M. I. A.—Bertha Wilckin, Pres.; Nellie Powell and Lydia Johnson, Counselors; Marian Adams, secretary.

Primary Association—Alice M. B. Fletcher, Pres.; Mary W. Musser and Phebe Adams, Counselors; Jane Swift, secretary.

HISTORY—The First Ward contained originally only nine 10-acre blocks, but as the adjacent blocks were settled up, the Ward limits were extended both east and south. The last change of boundary lines was effected Jan. 3, 1883, when it was decided by the Presidency of the Stake to change the boundary between the First Ward and the Sugar House Ward so as to conform with the precinct boundary, which runs on a line east and west along Roper Street, sometimes called 10th South Street. This is the street running south of Pres. Geo. Q. Cannon's farm, on the Jordan River, north of the late John Van Cott's farm and near Dr. Young's lunatic asylum on the bench.

There being no old records of the Ward in existence, and all the original settlers having moved away, we have been unsuccessful in obtaining the names of the first settlers, nor could we get the particulars in regard to some of the first presiding officers. From the documentary history of the Church and other sources, however, the following information has been obtained:

David Fairbanks (now of Payson, Utah Co.) was the first Bishop of the Ward. He was ordained and set apart to that position Feb. 22, 1849. His Counselors were G. Dame and a Brother Henry. Bishop Fairbanks was succeeded by Peter McCue who was ordained Bishop of the Ward July 13, 1851. Elders James McCue and James Houston are supposed to have been his Counselors.

Bishop McCue apostatized and subsequently joined the Morrisites, and at the General Conference in April, 1856, Henry Moon was voted to be Bishop of the Ward. He was ordained Oct. 21, 1856. Hugh Moon and James Houston (the latter ordained Oct. 21, 1856) were his Counselors. They were both called on the Southern Utah Mission in 1861, and Jos. Warburton and Edmund Ellsworth were then appointed Counselors in their stead. They were, however, not ordained High Priests at that time, but acted by virtue of their calling as Seventies.

Counselor Ellsworth also moved away, and on Jan. 24, 1867, Cisson A. Chase was ordained second Counselor to Bishop Moon.

Early in the year 1870 Bishop Moon removed to Davis County, and on Nov. 14, 1870, Counselor Joseph Warburton was ordained a High Priest by Bishop Edward Hunter, and by Pres. Brigham Young appointed acting Bishop of the Ward. He chose for his Counselors Cisson A. Chase and Hezekiah Mitchell. Elder Chase died April 4, 1872, and Elder Mitchell Sept. 25, 1872. Bishop Warburton then chose Joseph Booth as first and Alexander Steele as second Counselors in their stead.

June 7, 1877, the Ward was reorganized under the direction of Apostle John Taylor. Joseph Warburton was ordained Bishop, and Joseph Booth and Alexander Steele were ordained High Priests and set apart as first and second Counselors, Apostle Taylor officiating in all instances. This Bishopric stood intact until Jan. 23, 1887, when Elder John T. Thorup was ordained a High Priest and set apart to act as second Counselor in the place of Alexander Steele who was absent on a mission to Scotland.

—SECOND WARD is separated from the Ninth Ward on the north by 6th South Street, from the First Ward on the East by 6th East Street; bounded on the south by the limits of the city and separated on the west from the Third Ward by 3rd East Street. It contains nine 10-acre blocks and a farming district and had 273 inhabitants in 1880, nearly all Latter-day Saints. A number of the people are of Scandinavian descent. A pottery and match factory were doing tolerable good business in the Ward. The public buildings are the ward house (a brick building, 53x30 feet, erected in 1883, and dedicated Nov. 21, 1886), a school house and a Relief Society Hall. The ward house is situated on the south side of 7th South Street, between 4th and 5th East Streets. The school house, an adobe building, is on the opposite side of the street. The famous Liberty Park, recently purchased by Salt Lake City for a pleasure resort, is partly in the Second and partly in the First Ward.

In May, 1887, the presiding officers of the Ward stood as follows:

Bishopric—Samuel Petersen, Bishop; James Leach and William Hart, Counselors.

Deacons' Quorum—Ernest K. Bassett, Pres.; James Hansen and Franklin Branting, Counselors.

Sunday School—Geo. K. Reese, supt.; Hans Sørensen and Andrew Petersen, assistants; Ernest K. Bassett, secretary.

Relief Society—Sarah Smith Wheeler, Pres.; Ann MeGregor and Augusta Leach, Counselors; Sarah E. Mitchell, secretary.

Y. M. M. I. A.—Chas. H. Bassett, Pres.; Hans Sørensen and Anthony Robinson, Counselors; D. B. Richards, secretary.

Y. L. M. I. A.—Sarah E. Mitchell, Pres.; Millie P. Bassett and Sarah Pope, Counselors; Nora Bassett, secretary.

Primary Association—Phebe Clark Young, Pres.; Johanne Olsen and Emily Hart, Counselors; Hannah Olsen, secretary.

HISTORY—The Ward was first organized in February, 1849, with John Lowry as Bishop. He was ordained Feb. 22, 1849. His Counselors were Elisha H. Groves and Jos. C. Kingsbury. Bishop Lowry moved south, and at the General Conference in April, 1851, Joseph C. Kingsbury was voted to be Bishop of the Ward. He was ordained July 13, 1851. On the same day Peter Dustin was ordained first Counselor and on Nov. 22, 1851, Moses Clawson was ordained second Counselor to Bishop Kingsbury.

In 1852 Moses Clawson was sent on a mission to Europe, and Isaac Hill succeeded him as second Counselor.

Bishop Kingsbury having removed to Ogden, Counselor Hill was ordained Bishop of the Ward by Edward Hunter, Dec. 28, 1854. The same day Wm. Wheeler and Niels Jensen were ordained to be his Counselors.

Bishop Hill being called on a mission to Canada a few years later (1857), Counselor Wheeler had temporary charge of the Ward during his absence. The Bishop returned from his mission the following year.

Counselor Niels Jensen died May 5, 1860, and Søren Iversen succeeded him as second Counselor, being set apart to that position May 24, 1860.

In 1864 Counselor Wheeler was called on a mission to England. About the same time Bishop Isaac Hill moved away, and Phinehas Howe Young was ordained Bishop of the Ward Dec 1, 1864. On the same day James Leach was ordained and set apart as his first and Søren Iversen as his second Counselor.

Counselor Iversen being called on a mission to Scandinavia in 1865, Daniel Corbett succeeded him as second Counselor. He was ordained March 22, 1866, and continued in that position until called on a mission to Canada in 1868. He was then succeeded by Elder Wm. Wheeler (who had returned from his mission to Europe two years previous) as second Counselor.

Bishop Young and Counselor Wheeler removed to Summit County in 1871, after which Counselor Leach presided as acting Bishop for six years, with Daniel Corbett and Søren Iversen as Counselors.

At a meeting held in the ward house, June 8, 1877, a reorganization of the Ward took place, when Samuel Petersen was ordained Bishop with James Leach and Wm. L. Ball as Counselors. Elder Petersen was ordained by Apostle John Taylor, Elder Leach by Geo. Q. Cannon and Elder Ball by Pres. D. O. Calder.

March 27, 1881, Wm. Hart was ordained a High Priest and set apart as second Counselor to Bishop Petersen, instead of Counselor Ball who had removed from the Ward.

—THIRD WARD is separated from the Eighth Ward on the north by 6th South Street, from the Second Ward on the east by 3rd East Street, bounded on the south by the limits of the city—Roper Street—and separated from the Fourth Ward on the west by East Temple Street. It contains nine 10-acre blocks and a farming district and had 477 inhabitants in 1880. About two-thirds of the people are Latter-day Saints.

The ward house, a brick structure 50x28 feet, was finished in 1883. It is located on 8th South Street, between 1st and 2nd East Streets. There is also a small lumber school house, a Relief Society Hall, four stores, a number of shops of various kinds, and many neat and comfortable residences.

In May, 1887, the presiding authorities of the Ward stood as follows:

Bishopric—Jacob Weiler, Bishop; John Y. Smith and Thomas Maycock, Counselors; John Wayman, ward clerk.

Deacons' Quorum—Peter Sørensen, Pres.

Sunday School—James Eardley, supt.; Francis Bolto and Walter Grames, assistants; Thomas Curtis, secretary.

Relief Society—Elizabeth Weiler, Pres.; Frances Smith, Counselor; Sylvia Eardley, secretary.

Y. M. M. I. A.—Thomas Curtis, Pres.; John T. Williams and Reuben H. Eardley, Counselors; Franklin J. Hewlett, secretary.

Y. L. M. I. A.—Sylvia Eardley, Pres.; Emily P. Weiler, Agnes Bolto and Mary Jane Gleason, Counselors; Dorthea Sørensen, secretary.

Primary Association—Louisa Maycock, Pres.; Elizabeth Weiler and Jane H. Gleason, Counselors; Dellie Eardley, secretary.

HISTORY—The Ward was first organized in February, 1849, with Christopher Williams as Bishop. He was ordained to that position Feb. 22, 1849. Hyrum N. Bingham and Timothy Foot were his Counselors. They both moved away and were succeeded by Jacob Weiler and Albert Gregory. The latter was ordained Jan. 4, 1853.

At the General Conference held in G. S. L. City in April, 1856, Jacob Weiler was voted to be Bishop of the Ward. He was ordained Oct. 21, 1856. Samuel Edwards (ordained Dec. 9, 1856) and John M. Murdock (ordained Oct. 21, 1856) were chosen as his Counselors.

In 1859 Elder Edwards moved away and John M. Murdock was promoted to the position of first Counselor, while Wm. Wagstaff (ordained Dec. 29, 1859) was called to act as second Counselor.

Elder Murdock having removed to Provo Valley, Elder Wm. Wagstaff succeeded him as first Counselor, and Thomas Maycock was called to the position of second Counselor, Nov. 20, 1861.

Counselor Wagstaff having removed to the Sugar House Ward, John Wayman was ordained first Counselor in his stead, April 27, 1871.

An effort was made to reorganize the Ward in the evening of June 10, 1877, at a meeting where Elders John Taylor and Geo. Q. Cannon and Pres. David O. Calder were present, but as a misunderstanding arose in regard to who should be chosen Bishop the Ward was left under the temporary charge of Elder John H. Picknell, until Dec. 23, 1877, when a reorganization was effected. On that occasion Jacob Weiler (the former Bishop) was sustained as Bishop and John Y. Smith and Thomas Maycock as his Counselors. Elder Smith was ordained a High Priest and set apart by Pres. D. O. Calder.

—FOURTH WARD is separated from the Seventh Ward on the north by 6th South Street, from the Third Ward on the east by East Temple Street, bounded on the south by the limits of the city—Roper Street—and separated from the Fifth Ward on the west by 2nd West Street. Only six 10-acre blocks are inhabited, the southern part of the Ward consisting of farming land and pastures. The Ward had 391 inhabitants in 1880, of which the great majority are Latter-day Saints. The only public buildings are the ward house, a fine brick structure 53x31 feet, and a school house, built of adobes, formerly used for all kinds of public gatherings. The two buildings are situated on the corner of West Temple and 7th South Streets.

In May, 1887, the presiding officers of the Ward stood as follows:

Bishopric—Harrison Sperry, Bishop; Thos. Corless and Charles Knight, Counselors; Wilford Smith, ward clerk.

Deacons' Quorums—1st Quorum: Jos. Mitchell, Pres.; Frank Smith and Harrison Sperry, jun., Counselors. 2nd Quorum: Wm. Hardman, Pres.; Frank Cutler and James Glen, Counselors; John Cutler, secretary.

Y. L. M. I. A. Mary Ann Hadley, Pres.; Mary Ann Lambert and Anna Erickson, Counselors; Edith Weiler, secretary.

Primary Association Mahala Jenkins, Pres.; Louie Smith, Counselor.

HISTORY—The first settlers of the Ward were Edward Corless and family, Mary Mosely and family and George Bundy, who moved out of the fort in the fall of 1848. Edward Corless built the first house in the Ward. In the spring of 1849, John Wakeley, Geo. Allen, "Father" Jenkins, John Preece and others built houses in the Ward. In the spring of 1849 a Ward organization was effected with Benjamin Brown as Bishop, and John M. Wakeley and John Preece as Counselors. These brethren were all ordained and set apart to their positions, April 8, 1849. Some time afterwards Counselor Wakeley removed from the Ward, when John Preece was promoted to the position of first Counselor. While Bishop Brown was absent on a mission to Europe in 1853-55 Counselor Preece had temporary charge of the Ward

July 15, 1856, Wm. Edwards was set apart to act as second Counselor to Bishop Brown. He held this position until Oct. 13, 1857, when Harrison Sperry was ordained second Counselor in his stead.

Feb. 8, 1866, Thomas Jenkins was ordained Bishop of the Ward. John Preece was set apart to act as his first Counselor March 22, 1866, and Harrison Sperry to the position of second Counselor Aug. 23, 1866.

Bishop Jenkins resigned in 1874, and on April 27, 1875, Bishop Wm. Thorn, of the Seventh Ward, was appointed to take temporary charge of the Ward; but a few weeks later (May 20, 1875,) Counselor Harrison Sperry was ordained Bishop. He acted without Counselors until Jan. 11, 1877, when John Preece was ordained to be his first and Thomas Corless his second Counselor.

HISTORY—Among the first settlers of the Ward was Thos. W. Winter, James Shaw, Andrew Cowan, John Page and others. There were only six houses in the Ward in 1853. A small school house was built in 1855, and a Sunday School opened in 1856. Previous to building the first school house, the people were socially connected with the Fourth Ward Saints. About the year 1865 that building tumbled down and in 1877 the present ward house was erected.

Thomas W. Winter was the first Bishop of the Ward. He was ordained to that position April 11, 1853, by Apostle Orson Hyde. Elders Robert Cowan and John Page were chosen as his Counselors. March 4, 1857, Elder Cowan was released, and second Counselor Page was ordained a High Priest by Bishop Edward Hunter and set apart to act as first Counselor to Bishop Winter. On the same day Fred. Cook was set apart as second Counselor.

In July, 1860, Elder Winter resigned his position as Bishop, after which the Ward was attached to the Sixth Ward and remained thus for about seventeen years.

At a meeting held June 12, 1877, at which Prests. Brigham Young and Daniel H. Wells, Apostle John Taylor and Geo. Q. Cannon, the Stake Presidency and other authorities were present, the Ward was reorganized. Richard Brimley, (formerly second Counselor to Bishop Hickenlooper, of the Sixth Ward) was set apart as Bishop of the Fifth Ward. Samuel J. Brown was also set apart as his second Counselor, and on June 15, 1877, Robert F. Turnbow was ordained a High Priest and set apart as first Counselor by Apostle John Taylor. Bishop Brimley resigned early in the fall of 1884, after which Elder John Page, through appointment by Pres. Angus M. Cannon, took temporary charge of the Ward until Nov. 30, 1884, when a meeting was held at the ward house for the purpose of forming a new Bishopric. On that occasion Samuel M. T. Seddon was chosen Bishop, with Charles J. Priday as first and Henry Harrow as second Counselor. These brethren, all being young men, were ordained High Priests and set apart to their several positions by the Stake Presidency.

—SIXTH WARD is separated from the Fifteenth Ward on the north by 2nd South Street, from the Seventh Ward on the east by 2nd West Street, from the Fifth Ward on the south by 6th South Street, and bounded on the west by the river Jordan. It contains 24 10-acre blocks and had 582 inhabitants in 1880. About nine-tenths of the people are Latter-day Saints. A number of the lower blocks, near the river, consist mostly of low lands and are not inhabited. The only public building is the ward house, 60x30 feet, which is used also for district school purposes. It is situated on 3rd West Street, between 4th and 5th South Streets. Some of the D. & R. G. Ry. shops are located in this Ward. There are eight stores, several shops and a number of neat private dwellings. The Ward is known for its well attended meetings, and able choir. It also affords a "silver band" consisting of 18 instruments, under the leadership of Lorenzo Sharp; the members all appear in handsome uniform and discourse music which compares favorably with that of other bands in the city.

HISTORY—The history of the Sixth Ward commences with the arrival of the Pioneers in G. S. L. Valley in July, 1847. It was there, on what is now known as the Old Fort Square, that the G. S. L. City fort was located, and during the seasons of 1847-49 this square (together with the adjoining blocks, on which were located the Northand South Forts,) was the centre of civilization in the Rocky Mountains. Within the rude walls of these forts, in small adobe huts, dwelt those hardy men and women through whose pioneer labor Utah has since become so renowned in history. After the arrival of President Young and company in Great Salt Lake Valley in the fall of 1848, permission was given for the people living in the forts to move out upon their city lots, but only a few availed themselves of the opportunity until the spring of 1849, when the bulk of the people moved out. Those who had taken lots in the immediate vicinity of the fort, however, showed a reluctancy to build on them, and a number of the people remained in the Old Fort until the spring of 1851, when orders were given to pull down all the remaining fort buildings, which was promptly done. Since then the famous Old Fort Square, (the property of Salt Lake City,) has been rented out to various parties for agricultural purposes. It is the intention some time in the future to utilize it for pleasure grounds. Among those who first built houses in the Sixth Ward were the families of Wm. Hickenlooper, Jesse West, Robert Watson and David Fullmer. In October, 1853, there were 206, and in October, 1855, 265 inhabitants in the Ward. In early times, after the abdicating of the Old Fort, the people met for worship in private houses. In 1851 the first school house, an adobe building, 38x22 feet, was erected on the present ward house site. In order to build this, a tax of $11 on each city lot in the Ward was levied, and this not being sufficient to complete the building, an additional tax of $2 per lot was added. The building commitee consisted of Wm. Fawcett, Geo. Colemere and John Lowe. Several years later the house was enlarged, but in 1872 the whole of it was pulled down and the present two-story frame building erected under the supervision of Samuel L. Evans, architect. Jesse West, James T. Snarr and Geo. D. Keaton constituted the building commitee.

The Ward was first organized Feb. 22, 1849, when William Hickenlooper was ordained the first Bishop of the Ward. He still acts in that position and has for many years been the only one left of the original nineteen Bishops of Salt Lake City. He has held his position continuously since the first organization of the Wards in 1849. The first Counselors to Bishop Hickenlooper were Jos. Stratton and Jacob Houtz. In 1853 Thos. Crooks and William Fawcett were acting as Counselors, the latter being ordained and set apart as second Counselor Jan. 4, 1853. Elder Crooks removed to American Fork, Utah County, when Wm. Fawcett became first Counselor, and Thomas Allman was chosen as second Counselor pro tem. Henry Holmes became second Counselor in the spring of 1857 and acted in that capacity until some time after the move in 1858. He finally removed to Weber County, and Edwin Rushton succeeded him as second Counselor in 1859.

In 1861 Counselor Fawcett was called on a mission to southern Utah, after which Bishop Hickenlooper acted with only one Counselor for some time. Finally Elder Rushton resigned, and Elder F. R. Kenner was set apart to act as Counselor, May 4, 1865. He soon afterwards removed to Sanpete County.

Sept. 6, 1866, Ralph Thompson and Samuel L. Evans were set apart to act as Counselors to Bishop Hickenlooper. Ralph Thompson died Feb. 8, 1872, when Elder Evans became first Counselor. Richard Brimley was set apart as second Counselor, Nov. 6, 1873.

At the reorganization of the Ward, June 12, 1877, Wm. H. Hickenlooper was retained as Bishop, with Samuel L. Evans and Jesse West as his Counselors. Elder West was ordained a High Priest and set apart to his position by Pres. B. Young, May 11, 1880, James C. Watson was ordained a High Priest and set apart as second Counselor in place of Jesse West, who was absent on a mission to Europe.

Counselor Evans died March 12, 1881, and at the quarterly conference held July 9, 1881 James C. Watson was sustained as first Counselor in his place. Jesse West, who had returned from his foreign mission, was chosen as second Counselor.

Deacons' Quorum—C. Lyon and Jacob Derrick, Presidents of 1st and 2nd Quorums.

Sunday School—Thos. V. Williams, supt.; John Midgley and Zach. T. Derrick, Counselors; Henry T. McEwan, secretary.

HISTORY—The Ward was first organized in February, 1849. Benjamin Covey was ordained Bishop, Feb. 22, 1849. His Counselors were Eleazer Miller and Elisha Everett. Bishop Covey being called on a mission to Carson Valley, Leonard W. Hardy was ordained Bishop of the Ward, April 6, 1856. His Counselors were Josiah G. Hardy (ordained Oct. 19, 1856) and Miner G. Atwood. Counselor Hardy removed to southern Utah, and Edward Snelgrove was ordained first Counselor in his stead, March 21, 1867. Elders Snelgrove and Atwood continued in their positions until Bishop Hardy's release.

June 21, 1877, the Ward was reorganized with Alexander C. Pyper as Bishop and John Druce and Leonard G. Hardy as his Counselors. Elders Pyper and Hardy were ordained High Priests and set apart by Apostle John Taylor, and Elder Druce by Apostle Geo. Q. Cannon. The former Bishop, Leonard G. Hardy, was released from the care of the Twelfth Ward because of the position he filled as first Counselor to Presiding Bishop Edward Hunter.

April 3, 1880, Martin Lenzi was set apart as second Counselor to Bishop Pyper, in place of Leonard G. Hardy who was absent on a mission.

Bishop Alexander C. Pyper died July 28, 1882, and Hiram B. Clawson succeeded him. He chose the same Counselors (Elders Druce and Lenzi) as had acted with Bishop Pyper.

—THIRTEENTH WARD is separated from the Eighteenth Ward on the north by South Temple Street, from the Twelfth Ward on the east by 3rd East Street, from the Eighth Ward on the south by 3rd South Street, and from the Fourteenth Ward on the west by East Temple Street. It contains nine 10-acre blocks and had 1,850 inhabitants in 1880. About two-thirds of the people are Latter-day Saints. That the "Liberal Party" polled a majority of votes at the election for school trustees July 11, 1887, was largely due to the facts that a number of the Saints had been disfranchised by the recent acts of Congress, and that a great number of the "Peoples Party" are foreigners who have not yet secured their papers of citizenship. This Ward is noted for its lively and well attended meetings, its excellent choir, good schools and well conducted associations. Besides the ward house, an adobe building, 60x35 feet, erected in 1860, and three adjoining school houses, there are in the Ward church buildings representing the Catholics, Presbyterians, Methodists, Episcopalians, Josephites, etc. Among other noted edifices in the Ward are the City Hall, St. Marks School, the Gardo House, Co-op Store, Salt Lake Theatre and a large number of fine business blocks. The Thirteenth Ward contains more business houses than any other Ward in the City, taking in all that important part of the business centre between East Temple and 1st East Streets, with all the stores and shops on 1st and 2nd South Streets, Commercial Street, etc. Within the limits of this Ward are also a large number of fine private residences. As a charitable institution of the Ward a fine two-story brick building containing 16 rooms, erected by Feremorz Little for the benefit of the Latter-day Saints in the Ward, deserves special mention. It was erected in 1883 at a cost of about $2,000 and dedicated and handed over to the Bishop of the Ward Sept. 6, 1883. This building is situated immediately back of the ward house.

Of home industries in the Ward Mr. John Reading's nurseries and flower gardens deserve special mention. They are the most extensive of their kind in Utah, and Mr. Reading's business extends to all parts of this and all surrounding Territories. He employs about ten persons all the year round. There are five green houses, covered with 7,000 square feet of glass, and a number of frames. Mr. Reading commenced this business in 1864 with a capital of $5. He built the first green house in the Territory in 1869 and has since spent over $6,000 in improvements on the grounds.

Sunday School—William Naylor, supt.; William Hennefer and Franklin Platt, assistants; Geo. E. Woolley, secretary.

Counselor Lewis moved south, and William W. Major succeeded him as second Counselor and served in that capacity until called on a mission to Eng and in 1853.

Edward Hunter having been chosen as Presiding Bishop of the Church, Edwin D. Woolley succeeded him as Bishop of the Thirteenth Ward in 1854. His Counselors were Bryant Stringham and John M. Woolley. Counselor Stringham resigned and Jeter Clinton was appointed first Counselor in his stead in the fall of 1856. In the absence of Jeter Clinton, on a mission to the States in 1857, James Townsend, Daniel McIntosh and others acted as Counselors pro tem. in cases of trial, or Bishop's court. John M. Woolley moved north and Wm. S. Godbe succeeded him as second Counselor in 1864.

Counselor Clinton resigned in 1868, when Wm. S. Godbe became first Counselor and F. A. Mitchell was chosen as second Counselor pro tem.. Afterwards he was set apart to that position.

Wm. S. Godbe was excommunicated from the Church for apostasy, Oct. 25, 1869, and Feramorz Little was subsequently chosen as Counselor in his stead.

In the spring of 1873 Elder Hamilton G. Park succeeded F. A. Mitchell as second Counselor, the latter having been called on a mission to the Sandwich Islands. Hamilton G. Park was called on a mission to Europe, and William Naylor succeeded him as second Counselor in the fall of 1875.

At the reorganization in 1877 no changes were made in the Bishopric. Elder Naylor who had acted as Counselor pro tem. was ordained a High Priest and set apart by Apostle John Taylor to his position.

Empey and Francis Platt were ordained High Priests and set apart as his Counselors, Dec. 31, 1881. —FOURTEENTH WARD is separated from the Seventeenth Ward on the north by South Temple Street, from the Thirteenth Ward on the east by East Temple Street, from the Seventh Ward on the south by 3rd South Street and from the Fifteenth Ward on the west by 2nd West Street. It contains nine 10-acre blocks and had 1,803 inhabitants in 1880. The ward house, an adobe building, 55x35 feet, is situated on First South Street, between West Temple and 1st West Streets. Joining it are two school houses, one on the west and another on the east side. About two-thirds of the population are Latter-day Saints, but the non-Mormons own about two-thirds of the real estate in the Ward. Quite a number of the "Mormon" families are poor.

This Ward embraces the west side of Main Street with all that business part of the city west of it. Hence, many of the principal business houses and the following hotels are within the limits of the Ward: The Continental, Walker House, Metropolitan, Valley House, Clift House and White House. Also the Jewish synagogue, St. Mary's Academy (Catholic) the County Court House, etc.

Brigham Young, located on the Council House corner. Parley P. Pratt settled on the same block further west. His house, now known as one of the Valley House cottages, yet stands, facing the Temple Block. Orson Pratt located on the west side of the same block. His house is also standing yet. Wilford Woodruff located on the corner of South Temple and West Temple Streets, where the Valley House now stands. Pres. John Taylor built a house on the south-west corner of the same block. His old house is still standing. Franklin D. Richards located a little south of where the Continental Hotel now stands, and Amasa M. Lyman on the block opposite the former residence of Geo. Q. Cannon, on the corner where Wm. H. Folsom's residence now stands.

The Ward was first organized in 1849 with John Murdock as Bishop, he being ordained to that position Feb. 22, 1849. His Counselors were Abraham Hoagland and Richard Ballantyne. Bishop Murdock was called on a mission to Australia, and Counselor Hoagland was ordained Bishop in his stead, July 13, 1851. On the same day Richard Ballantyne was set apart as his first Counselor, and on the 27th Phinehas Richards was set apart as second Counselor.

In the fall of 1852 Counselor Ballantyne was called on a mission to Hindostan, and Joseph Horne was chosen as first Counselor in his stead in the beginning of 1854. Oct. 13, 1859, Samuel Turnbow was ordained second Counselor, as successor to Elder Phinehas Richards. To fill a vacancy caused by the release of Elder Joseph Horne, William Carter was ordained and set apart as second Counselor to Bishop Hoagland Jan. 3, 1861. He had previously acted as temporary Counselor in the absence of Joseph Horne, having been set apart to that position April 28, 1859. By this change Samuel Turnbow, who had acted as second Counselor since 1859, now became first Counselor.

Nov. 20, 1862, Martin Lenzi was ordained second Counselor to Bishop Hoagland, to fill the vacancy caused by the removal of Elder Wm. Carter to southern Utah.

Elders Turnbow and Lenzi acted as first and second Counselors until Bishop Hoagland's death, which occurred Feb. 14, 1872.

March 4, 1872, Thomas Taylor was ordained Bishop of the Ward. Lewis S. Hills was set apart as his first and George Crismon as his second Counselor. Counselor Hills had only acted a few months, when John R. Winder was appointed first Counselor in his stead. This change took place in the fall of 1872, and during Bishop Taylor's absence in the east Elder Winder had temporary charge of the Ward.

July 2, 1874, Angus M. Cannon was ordained and set apart as second Counselor to Bishop Taylor. When Elder Winder removed from the Ward, Geo. Crismon was promoted to the position of first Counselor. Elder Cannon having been called to the position of President of the Stake, Geo. H. Taylor was ordained a High Priest and set apart as second Counselor in his stead, April 20, 1876.

At the reorganization of the Ward June 25, 1877, Thomas Taylor was still sustained as Bishop with Geo. Crismon and Geo. H. Taylor as his Counselors.

Counselor Crismon having removed to the Sugar House Ward, Geo. H. Taylor was set apart as first Counselor in his stead, Dec. 18, 1884. On the same day Samuel H. Hill was ordained a High Priest and set apart as second Counselor.

Bishop Taylor being away in Iron County and Counselor Hill being absent from home, Elder Benjamin Brown presided as acting Bishop of the Ward from March 1st to Aug. 4th, 1886, or during the time Counselor Geo. H. Taylor was incarcerated in the Utah Penitentiary for conscience sake.

Bishop Taylor having been excommunicated from the Church, a new Bishopric was organized, Oct. 11, 1886, consisting of George Hamilton Taylor as Bishop and Thomas E. Taylor and Benjamin Brown as Counselors.

The Ward was first organized in 1849 with Abraham O. Smoot as Bishop. He was ordained Feb. 22, 1849. His Counselors were Nathaniel V. Jones and Wm. Scarce. Counselor Scarce died in G. S. L. City Jan. 3, 1851, and about the same time Bishop Smoot removed from the Ward.

At the April Conference, 1851, Nathaniel V. Jones was voted to be Bishop of the Ward. He was ordained July 13, 1851, and Andrew Cunningham and Rodney Badger were set apart as Counselors the same day.

When Bishop Jones was absent on his East India Mission in (1852-53), A. Cunningham presided as acting Bishop of the Ward. He took charge about Oct. 15, 1852, and continued until Bishop Jones returned from his mission, when the latter again assumed the position as Bishop, with Andrew Cunningham and Rodney Badger as Counselors. While Elder Cunningham had charge of the Ward, Charles D. Barnum and Elijah Thomas acted as Counselors pro tem.

Counselor R. Badger was accidentally drowned in the Weber River, April 29, 1853, and Elijah Thomas was set apart as Counselor in his stead Dec. 6, 1853. Between this date and 1856 Charles D. Barnum and James Ure are supposed to have acted as assistant Counselors to Bishop Jones. July 1, 1856, William Whiting and John McLaws were set apart as Counselors to Bishop Jones.

At a solemn Teachers meet ng held in Elder B. T. Mitchell's house Dec. 24, 1856, the people voted in Benjamin T. Mitchell as Bishop, with William Empey as first and William Whiting as second Counselor. This was during the time of the reformation.

Bishop Mitchell resigned about the year 1859 and Andrew Cunningham was appointed Bishop in his stead. Robert T. Burton and Wm. C. Moodey were chosen as Counselors. Counselor Moodey was called on the Southern Utah Mission, and Joseph Pollard was appointed Counselor in his stead, about the year 1861.

Bishop Cunningham resigned in 1867, and Counselor Burton then became Bishop in his stead. His Counselors were Joseph Pollard and Elias Morris. This Bishopric stood intact during the following ten years.

The Ward was reorganized June 27, 1877. On that occasion Joseph Pollard was set apart as Bishop by Pres. Daniel H. Wells. Wm. L. Binder was ordained a High Priest and set apart as first Counselor by Apostle John Taylor, and N. V. Jones as second Counselor by Apostle Orson Pratt.

Charles Miller was clerk of the Ward in 1853. He was succeeded by John McLaws and John Clark. The latter has acted in that capacity for more than twenty years.

—SIXTEENTH WARD is separated from the Nineteenth Ward on the north by 2nd North Street, from the Seventeenth Ward on the east by 2nd West Street, from the Fifteenth Ward on the south by South Temple Street and bounded on the west by the river Jordan. It contains 27 10-acre blocks and had 1,479 inhabitants in 1880, most of whom are Latter-day Saints. There are only 18 blocks inhabited, the western part of the Ward being occupied by the Fair Grounds. The only public building in the Ward is the meeting house, a substantial rock building, 70x34 feet, which is also used for school purposes. It is situated on the corner of 1st North and 4th West Streets. The Deseret University buildings, on Union Square, are located in this Ward, also the Utah Central Railway depot and workshops, the Gas Works, and a number of fine private residences, including the late Wm. Jennings' residence; also a number of small stores and shops.

The Ward is famous for its well attended meetings and Sunday school. Apostle Joseph F. Smith resides in this Ward.

HISTORY—Among the first settlers of the Ward in 1848-49 were John Scott (of Nauvoo fame), Wm. C. Staines, who located where the late Wm. Jennings' residence now stands, Henry G. Boyle, Abel Butterfield, Jacob Butterfield, Mr. McIntire, Mrs. Smith, (widow of Joshua Smith), Andrew Gibbons, George Wardle, Joel Johnson and brothers, Seymour Brunson, Elijah Thomas (of the Mormon Battalion), Geo. C. Riser, who located on the block now occupied by the Utah Central Railway depot, Zera Pulsipher and sons, Harrison and William Burgess, who located where the gas works now are, Father Day and family, Gideon Gibbs, Elnathan Eldredge, Wm. Burton, "Father" Bauke, David Sessions, William Walker (of the Nauvoo police force), John Rolston, Joseph Fielding, Mary Smith, James Lawson, Wm McMillan Thompson, Winslow Farr, Shadrach Roundy and sons, Dimick B. Huntington, Levi W. Jackman, John S. Higbee, Charles Foster, Dr. Hovey, Wm. Moss, Mercey R. Thompson and others. A few of these families moved out on their lots in the fall of 1848, but the majority remained until the spring of 1849.

The Ward originally consisted of only nine blocks, and all the low lands west of these were covered with water, but after turning the three channels of City Creek into one in 1856, and conveying the water along North Temple Street direct to the river Jordan, more of the low land near the river was reclaimed and settled. Originally only one (the middle) channel of City Creek ran through the Sixteenth Ward.

In 1850 the people commenced to fence into blocks and afterwards into lots. In early times money was plentiful on account of the amount of gold dust brought into the Territory by members of the Mormon Battalion and others, but it was generally rejected in exchange for produce. So scarce were eatables that a lady in the Sixteenth Ward is said, on one occasion, to have cut, fitted and sewed a dress for the consideration of two squashes, and that when asked if she would take money instead of the squashes agreed upon, she regarded the offer as an insult. Seed potatoes were so scarce that they could not be bought for money. A member of the Ward who tried to purchase some, but was refused, was allowed by the owner to strip the potatoes of their sprouts, which, when planted, produced a good crop of potatoes.

In 1857 the population of the Ward consisted of 113 families, or 658 souls – 332 males and 326 females. There were at that time also 134 dwellings and 44 stables. In the fall of that year, Bishop Kesler was appointed major of the Legion and called upon to raise 25 men from the Sixteenth Ward to march at a moment's notice to Echo Canyon. The company left the city in a heavy snow-storm, reached the main body in Echo Canyon, rendered efficient aid during the campaign, and returned home in December. During the move in 1858 every house in the Ward was vacated, the windows being boarded up and preparations made to burn every thing, in case of a continuation of hostilities between the troops and the citizens.

In the spring of 1862, in consequence of the heavy snows melting in the mountains, City Creek became unsually high, which caused large quantities of gravel and soil to cave in at variovs points up the creek. This was brought down with the current and deposited on the low lands of the Sixteenth Ward. The lower part of North Temple Street was thus covered with gravel to the depth of from one to five feet. For six weeks the people worked night and day to save their property which was endangered by the floods. A number, however, were forced to leave their houses and seek shelter on higher ground. This calamity, though resulting in considerable loss of property, was the means of making a good gravel road where heretofore nothing but an unhealthy swamp had existed.

In 1869 the Utah Central Railway Company began the erection of machine shops and station buildings on the block where their depot now is situated, and in January, 1870, the first railroad (Utah Central) was completed to Salt Lake City. Two years later the gas works were located on the block immediately west of the depot block; coal yards were also opened and a general business stir was felt throughout the whole Ward. Many improvements of a more private character were made in rapid succession in the vicinity of the depot.

The Ward was first organized in February, 1849, Elder Isaac Higbee being ordained Bishop Feb. 22nd of that year; but he only acted a short time, as Shadrach Roundy was ordained Bishop April 14, 1849. His Counselors were John S. Higbee and Levi W. Jackman.

At the October Conference 1849, Counselor Higbee was called on a mission to Europe, and Joseph Fielding was chosen to fill the vacancy caused thereby, being appointed to act as second Counselor, while Levi W. Jackman took the position of first Counselor.

At the General Conference in April, 1856, Frederick Kesler was nominated for Bishop of the Sixteenth Ward. He was ordained Oct. 19, 1856. Geo. C. Riser and William Derr were ordained and set apart to be his Counselors Dec. 9, 1856.

In 1862, Counselor Derr was succeeded by Elnathan Eldredge, who was ordained second Counselor to Bishop Kesler Feb. 13, 1862. Counselor Eldredge died Oct. 27, 1871, and Theodore McKean was ordained Counselor in his stead shortly afterwards.

The Ward was reorganized June 26, 1877. Frederick Kesler was continued as Bishop, and Henry Emery was ordained a High Priest and set apart to act as first Counselor, instead of Geo. C. Riser who had removed from the Ward. Theodore McKean was continued as second Counselor.

Counselor Emery died June 24, 1881, after which Theodore McKean was promoted to the position of first Counselor and James W. Phippen was called to officiate as second Counselor. These changes were effected at the quarterly Stake conference held in Salt Lake City, July 9, 1881. In 1884 Elder McKean was released from acting as Counselor because of his position as a member of the High Council. Consequently Francis Cope was ordained a High Priest and set apart to act as second Counselor Dec. 18, 1884. After this change Elder Phippen became first Counselor.

The first building erected for meeting and school purposes in the Ward was built in 1849, on the block lying immediately north of the depot block. It was a small log building. In the summer of 1854 a larger house was built on the present ward house site. This was finally removed to make room for the present meeting house which was erected in 1872, first opened for meetings in January 1873, and dedicated March 30th of that year.

The Sixteenth Ward Square, also known as Union Square, was for a number of years the favorite camping ground for immigrant trains arriving from the plains. The whole block was often literally covered with tents and wagons.

In 1857 a Relief Society was organized with Sophia Burgess as President and Sophia Tripp and Olive Walker as Counselors. In 1875 a Young Men's Mutual Improvement Association was organized in the Ward with Walter J. Lewis as President, and Theodore McKean, jun., and Eli A. Folland, Counselors. There had been associations of a similar character in the Ward before, but this was the first one perfected under the direction of the authorities of the Church. This association drew a good attendance from its commencement and has accomplished much good in past years; many of its members have filled succesful missions to foreign lands.

—SEVENTEENTH WARD is separated from the Nineteenth Ward on the north by 2nd North Street, from the Eighteenth Ward on the east by East Temple Street, from the Fourteenth Ward on the south by South Temple Street and from the Sixteenth Ward on the west by 2nd West Street. It comprises nine blocks, including the Temple Block. The district school house, situated on 1st North Street, between West Temple and 1st West Streets, is used for meeting and other Ward purposes. It is a fine two-story brick building, 60x36 feet. There is also a Relief Society Hall in the Ward and a number of fine residences. Most of the inhabitants are Latter-day Saints. Apostle John Henry Smith resides in this Ward.

Heywood and John Murdock to act as a Counselor to Bishop Heywood; and at a meeting held in the house of Bishop Heywood, March 1, 1849, Father John Smith was set apart as second Counselor to Bishop Heywood, under the hands of C. C. Rich, Joseph L. Heywood and Lorin Farr. At that meeting also it was voted that the Ward should be fenced entire, that the fence should be finished by the 1st of April following, that there should be a road around each block, two rods in width, that Lorin Farr and Wm. Clayton should act as a committee to assign to the owners or representatives of lots their quota of fence and the place where the same should be set, etc. At another meeting held March 15, 1845, it was decided "that the Ward should fence in so much of the Temple Block as lies north of City Creek, and that Joseph L. Heywood have the privilege of cultivating that portion of the block the ensuing season."

April 15, 1849, the members of the Ward met at the "Bill Post", and voted that a school house should be established and sustained by a direct tax on the Ward in proportion to the value of property. The Bishop and his Counselors were authorized to procure a room and engage a teacher. The meeting also decided that no cattle should be driven through the Ward after it was fenced. It was concluded to keep up prayer meetings every Thursday, etc.

July 19, 1849, Aaron F. Farr was set apart (under the hands of Joseph L. Heywood and Albert Carrington) to act as second Counselor to Bishop Heywood, in the place of John Smith, Patriarch, who desired to be released in consequence of infirmity.

Elder Heywood being absent on a trip to Carson Valley, was succeeded by Thomas Callister, who was ordained Bishop Sept. 17, 1855. Nathan Davis and Martin H. Peck (both ordained Aug. 26, 1856) were chosen as his Counselors.

Bishop Callister being called to the position of Presiding Bishop in Millard County, Counselor Nathan Davis succeeded him as Bishop of the Seventeenth Ward, and was ordained to that position December 15, 1861. April 10, 1862, Alfred Randall and George Morris were ordained to be his Counselors. Subsequently Elder Randall removed to Weber County, and Martin H. Peck was set apart to act as first Counselor to Bishop Davis May 12, 1870.

In 1875 Bishop Davis resigned and John Henry Smith, his successor (ordained Nov. 22, 1875), entered on the duties of his office as Bishop Jan. 1, 1876. John Tingey and Geo. Dunford were ordained High Priests and set apart to act as his Counselors, April 20, 1876.

When the Ward was reorganized June 26, 1877, Albert Wesley Davis was set apart as second Counselor to Bishop Smith, instead of Geo. Dunford, who was called to preside in Malad, Idaho.

John Henry Smith having been promoted to the Apostleship, Counselor John Tingey was ordained Bishop of the Ward, Nov. 6, 1880. The same day Albert W. Davis and Alonzo Eugene Hyde were set apart to act as his Counselors.

The first Sabbath School in the Seventeenth Ward was organized April 16, 1854, with William Jackson as superintendent.

—EIGHTEENTH WARD is bounded on the north by the mountains, separated from the Twentieth Ward on the east by C Street, from the Thirteenth Ward on the south by South Temple Street and from the Seventeenth and Nineteenth Wards on the west by East Temple Street and Arsenal Hill. It had 617 inhabitants in 1880. The Ward is located on both sides of City Creek and contains a large number of very fine residences. The general Church offices and Tithing Office, the Deseret News Office, etc., are located in this Ward, also the Church blacksmith shop, the Deseret Silk Factory, Pioneer Flour Mills, etc. The public buildings within the limits of the Ward are the beautiful ward house, or chapel, located on the hill on A Street, between Second and Third Streets, east of City Creek. It is a brick building, 52x33 feet, and has a fine steeple on the east end. Immediately south of it is the "Independent School House", a two-story brick building, 60x33 feet, recently erected. There is also the late Pres. Young's private school house, near the Eagle Gate, which was used for meetings and all kinds of public gatherings previous to the erection of the present ward house. Apostle George Teasdale and Brigham Young reside in this Ward.

In May, 1887, the presiding authorities of the Ward stood as follows:

Bishopric—Orson F. Whitney, Bishop; Robert Patrick and William B. Barton, Counselors.

Deacons' Quorum—John Y. Robbins, Pres.

Sunday School—James Saville, supt.; Douglas A. Swain and Rulon S. Wells, assistants; S. B. Clawson, secretary.

Relief Society—Ellen Barton, Pres.

Y. M. & Y. L. M. I. A.—Rulon S. Wells, Pres.; James Saville and James M. Barlow, Counselors; B. S. Young, secretary.

HISTORY—The Ward was first settled by Pres. Brigham Young, Heber C. Kimball and Newel K. Whitney in the spring of 1849. These were about the only three families in the Ward for several years; and it was not until the bench east of Pres. Young's gardens was opened for settlers, at a later day, that the Ward began to assume itself. In October, 1853, there were 241 souls in the Ward. When G. S. L. City was divided into Nineteen Wards, Feb. 14, 1849, Presiding Bishop N. K. Whitney was appointed Bishop of the Eighteenth Ward, but no regular Ward organization was effected at that time, there being but a very few inhabitants. In April, 1851, Lorenzo D. Young was appointed Bishop. He acted for some time without Counselors, and also resided in the Sugar House Ward until 1854. John Whitney was chosen as one of his Counselors at an early day, but did not act in that capacity. John Sharp was subsequently chosen as one of his Counselors and acted in that position until October, 1856, when the Twentieth Ward was organized, comprising what was formerly the east part of the Eighteenth Ward. Gradually the latter became practically extinct, being merged into the Twentieth, but was by Pres. Brigham Young revived in February, 1876, when, by him, the Bishopric was reorganized, by the selection of David O. Calder and John Nicholson as Counselors to Bishop Lorenzo D. Young. The boundaries of the Ward were then prescribed as they now exist. The meetings were held in President Young's school house, near the Eagle Gate.

In the spring of 1876, David O. Calder was selected to be first Counselor to Pres. Angus M. Cannon in the Presidency of the Salt Lake Stake of Zion, and in consequence was necessarily released from his position in the Bishopric of the Eighteenth Ward. On the 3rd of July, 1877, John Nicholson was set apart as first and William B Barton as second Counselor to Bishop Young.

In June, 1873, another change occurred by the resignation of Bishop Young, who had removed his residence to the First Ward, and for the next few weeks the Ward was placed in charge of John Nicholson as presiding High Priest. The latter was called the following July 7th, to go on a mission to Europe, and on July 14, 1878, Orson F. Whitney was ordained Bishop, with Robert Patrick and William B. Barton as his Counselors. They still occupy these positions.

In June, 1880, the building of the new chapel, by donation of the Saints, was begun. It was duly completed and, on Jan. 14, 1883, was dedicated, Pres. Joseph F. Smith offering the dedicatory prayer and Pres. John Taylor delivering a discourse on the occasion. It was resolved to build an independent school house, in which the children of the Latter-day Saints could be taught; the necessary ground was purchased adjacent to the chapel, and a commencement made Oct. 4, 1884. It is a comely and convenient building, two stories high, and is nearly finished. The Ward has within the last five years especially been built up more rapidly than any other part of the city, as it originally contained more vacant desirable sites for residences than any other locality, and these have been largely appropriated.

—NINETEENTH WARD comprises the north-western part of Salt Lake City, is bounded on the north by the limits of the city, east by the mountains and Arsenal Hill, which separates it from the Eighteenth Ward, separated from the Seventeenth and Sixteenth Wards on the south by 2nd North Street and on the west by the river Jordan. It contains over one hundred 10-acre blocks, besides a number of small irregular blocks on the Arsenal Hill slope, and had 1,585 inhabitants in 1880. The ward house, an adobe building, 61x30 feet, is situated on the corner of 4th North and 2nd West Streets. Joining it is two school houses, one on the north and one on the south side. The northern part of the Ward is but sparsely settled, there being only a few residents north of 7th North Street.

Among the home industries of this Ward may be mentioned the Soap Factory, which produces as fine qualities of common and fancy soaps as any imported articles. The Deseret Knitting Factory, on 6th North Street (Wm. Pearson, proprietor) was opened in 1885. It employs 25 hands and turns out on an average 30 dozen pair of stockings per day. There are also two tanneries, a glass factory, three lime kilns, a brick yard, salt works, etc. The famous Warm Springs, on 2nd West Street, and the Hot Springs further north, are within the limits of the Ward. Apostle John W. Taylor resides in this Ward.

In May, 1887, the presiding officers of the Ward stood as follows;

Bishopric—James Watson, Bishop; Henry Arnold and A. W. Carlson, Counselors; Alexander Edwards, ward clerk.

Deacons' Quorum—There are five quorums presided over by John Edwards, John Holmes, Daniel Bath, Wm. Neal and Julius Billeter.

Sunday School—Wm. Asper, supt.; Alfred Solomon and Alexander Edwards, assistants; John South, secretary.

Relief Society—Rachel Whipple, Pres.; Ann E. Neal and Ann Player, Counselors; Adelaide Ridges, sec.

Y. M. M. I. A.—Wm. O. Lee, Pres.; John L. Nebeker and Fred. Rich, Counselors; Edward J. Wood, secretary.

Y. L. M. I. A.—Mary E. Irvine, Pres.; Mary E. Dean, Elizabeth Bowman and Alice Kimball, Counselors; Rachel Hamlin, secretary.

Primary Association—Rebecca Noall, Pres.; Ella Nebeker and Lizzie Bowman, Louisa C. Lee, Counselors;

HISTORY—Among the first settlers of the Ward were James Hendrix, A. H. Raleigh, Wm. M. Lemmon, John and Peter Nebeker, Christopher Merkley, Samuel B. Moore and others. In October, 1853, there were 572 inhabitants in the Ward, and in December, 1856, it contained 539 souls, 84 houses, 30 carriages and wagons and 28 teams.

The Ward was first organized in 1849, with James Hendrix as Bishop. He was ordained Feb. 22, 1849. On July 13, 1851, A. H. Raleigh and Sydney A. Knowlton were set apart as his Counselors.

Bishop Hendrix continued as Bishop until the April Conference, 1856, when Counselor A. H. Raleigh was voted to be Bishop of the Ward. He was ordained to that position by Bishop Edward Hunter May 6th. following. His Counselors were Sylvester H. Earl and Jos. H. Hovey. Elder Earl was called to go to Cache Valley and Elder Hovey to southern Utah as settlers, after which Bishop Raleigh acted without Counselors for several years, only calling to his assistance such help as he needed from time to time in trying cases in Bishop's court, etc. In the fall of 1869 Bishop Raleigh was called on a mission to the States. During his absence Henry Grow had temporary charge of the Ward. Bishop Raleigh returned from his mission in the spring of 1870, and soon afterwards he chose William Asper and Henry Arnold as his Counselors.

In the fall of 1876 a petition signed by a few dissatisfied residents of the Ward was forwarded to Pres. Brigham Young, praying for the removal of Bishop Raleigh. To counteract this, the following signed by the Bishop's Counselors, 21 of the 22 Ward Teachers and several hundred others was prepared, but, however, never presented to Pres. Young:

"We the undersigned inhabitants of the Nineteenth Ward, Salt Lake City, are satisfied that Alonzo H. Raleigh was chosen of the Lord to be our Bishop and that He has sustained him, and we feel to continue to sustain him as such. And we further believe that whoever seeks to supplant him or impair his influence to do good in that capacity are promotors of dissension, rebellion and division and are not impelled or inspired by the spirit of the Lord."

The Ward was reorganized July 2, 1877. On that occasion Richard V. Morris was sustained as Bishop; Wm. Asper and Henry Arnold were again chosen as Counselors. They were all set apart by Pres. Daniel H. Wells.

May 8, 1881, Elder A. W. Carlson was ordained a High Priest and set apart as second Counselor. Elder Asper, who had been called to the Southern States on a mission, was succeeded by Henry Arnold as first Counselor.

Bishop Morris died March 12, 1882, and at a meeting held in the ward house, June 4, 1882, at which Pres. Joseph F. Smith, Apostle W. Woodruff, the Stake Presidency and others were present, James Watson was ordained a High Priest and set apart as Bishop of the Ward by Pres. Jos. F. Smith. June 11, 1882, Henry Arnold was set apart as first and A. W. Carlson as his second Counselor.

The first public house in the Ward was built in 1851 on the site of the present ward house. It was a small adobe building. The main part of the present ward house was dedicated Feb 6, 1866. It is also used for school purposes. Since then two wings have been added, one on the north and another on the south side.

A Sunday School was organized in the Nineteenth Ward April 21, 1867, with Paul Lechtenberg as superintendent. Wm. Asper, R. V. Morris, Peter Nebeker, Jos. Shaw and Philip Pugsley were among the first teachers. Means towards the buying of books for the commencement of a Sunday School library was furnished by Bishop A. H. Raleigh, R. V. Morris, Henry Grow, Philip Pugsley, Joseph Shaw, Henry Arnold and others.

—TWENTIETH WARD is bounded on the north by the mountains, separated from the Twenty-first Ward on the east by H Street, from the Twelfth Ward on the south by South Temple Street and from the Eighteenth Ward on the west by C Street. It contains 60 2½-acre blocks and had 1,112 inhabitants in 1880. The ward house, a fine brick building, 70x35 feet, is situated on the corner of Second and D Streets, and was erected in 1883. The old ward house, with adjoining school house, both adobe bnildings, are lying on the same block. Apostle George Teasdale resides in this Ward.

In May, 1887, the presiding authorities of the Ward stood as follows:

Bishopric—Wm. E. Bassett, Bishop; George Romney and Geo. F. Gibbs, Counselors; Levi W. Richards, ward clerk.

Deacons' Quorums—Edgar Simmons, Pres.; Alexander Lyon and Charles J. Ross, Counselors.

Sunday School—Wm. Salmon, supt.; Heber J. Romney and Wm. H. Tovey, assistants; Orson D. Romney, secretary.

Relief Society—Jane Miller, Pres.; Rhoda Owen and Elizabeth Barton, Counselors.

Twentieth Ward Institute (Y. M. M. I. A.)—Charles W. Stayner, Pres.; Oliver Hodgson and A. B. Simmons, Counselors; Peter Elliot, secretary.

Y. L. M. I. A.—Lula G. Richards, Pres.; Cecelia Sharp and Eilen V. Romney, Counselors.

Primary Association — Emma Toone, Pres.; Margaret Sharp and Alice Phillips, Counselors.

HISTORY—At the semi-annual conference of the Church held in G. S. L. City, Oct. 6, 1856, the Ward was first organized out of the east part of what then comprised the Eighteenth Ward. John Sharp was ordained Bishop of the new Ward, with Wm. C. Dunbar and Wm. L. N. Allen as Counselors. This Bishopric stood unchanged for more than twenty years.

At the time of the reorganization in 1877, when the Ward was divided and the eastern part organized into a new Ward (the Twenty-first Ward), Henry Puzey was appointed second Counselor to Bishop Sharp, instead of Elder Allen, who, after the change, became a resident of the new Ward.

In 1885 Bishop Sharp resigned, after which Counselor Wm. C. Dunbar had temporary charge of the Ward until Aug. 27, 1886, when the present Bishopric was ordained and set apart, consisting of Wm. E. Bassett as Bishop and George Romney and George Francis Gibbs as Counselors.

—TWENTY-FIRST WARD, comprising the north-east part of Salt Lake City, is bounded on the north by the mountains, on the east by the Fort Douglas Military Reservation, separated from the Eleventh Ward on the south by South Temple Street, and from the Twentieth Ward on the west by H Street. It contains 168 2½-acre blocks and had 1,027 inhabitants in 1880. The ward house, a brick building, 64x28 feet, is situated on First Street, between J and K Streets.

In May, 1887, the presiding authorities of the Ward stood as follows:

Bishopric—Wm. L. N. Allen, Bishop; Herbert J. Foulger and Marcellus S. Woolley, Counselors; Robert Aveson, ward clerk.

There is a Priests' Quorum, presided over by the Bishopric, and a quorum of ordained Teachers under the presidency of W. S. Higham, Willard Allen and Wallace C. Castleton.

Deacons' Quorum—1st Quorum: Albert Adkins, Pres.; James T. Shore and Ralph Snowball, Counselors. 2nd quorum: Counselors Amos Cardwell and W. P. Affleck, jun., presiding.

Sunday School—Wm. D. Owen, jun., Pres.; Robert Aveson and Joseph W. Maynes, Counselors; Wm. G. Westwood, secretary.

Relief Society—Ann Olivia Burt, Pres.; Hannah Allen and Susannah Foulger, Counselors; Elizabeth Matthews, secretary.

Y. M. M. I. A.—Walter W. Williams, Pres.; Thomas Moss and Marcellus S. Woolley, Counselors.

Y. L. M. I. A.—Harriet Longmore, Pres.; Isabella Muir and Helena Barton, Counselors; Martha Picknell, secretary.

Primary Association—Mary Davis, Pres.; Annie Steers and Eliza Schutte, Counselors; Eva Barfoot, secretary.

HISTORY—The Ward was first organized July 5, 1877, out of the east part of the Twentieth Ward. On that occasion Andrew Burt was set apart as Bishop by Orson Pratt, Herbert J. Foulger as first Counselor by Daniel H. Wells, and Wm. L. N. Allen as second Counselor by Apostle John Taylor.

Bishop Burt was killed Aug. 25, 1883, while on duty in Salt Lake City, after which Counselors Foulger and Allen had temporary charge of the Ward until Oct. 21, 1883, when a new Bishopric was ordained and set apart, consisting of Wm. L. N. Allen as Bishop, and H. J. Foulger and Andrew F. Macfarlane, as Counselors.

Counselor Macfarlane died Sept. 20, 1886, and Marcellus Simmons Woolley was ordained a High Priest and set apart by Pres. Angus M. Cannon as second Counselor to Bishop Allen, Jan. 16, 1887.

SANDY PRECINCT is bounded on the north by West Jordan and Union Precincts, east by Granite Precinct, south by Draperville Precinct and west it is separated from the South Jordan and West Jordan Precincts by the river Jordan. It contains nine square miles of farming land. The population in 1880 was 488. About two-thirds of the entire population are "Mormons" and fully one half of Scandinavian descent, mostly Swedish. Near the centre of the precinct is located the village of SANDY which is also a station on the Utah Central Railway and Alta Branch of the D. & R. G. Ry., 12 miles south of Salt Lake City, the county seat. It contains two steam sampling works, two smelters, seven stores, five saloons, one brewery, two boarding houses and a number of shops. Ore and general farm products are the principal shipments. The town site covers 160 acres of land. Although a small town, it is one of considerable importance. A large portion of the ores from the Cottonwoods and Bingham Canyon are shipped there for sampling. After being tested, much of the ore remains in Sandy until sold, and the business of handling, transferring and shipping ores is the principal enterprise of the inhabitants. Considerable tame hay and grain are raised within the limits of the precinct, notwithstanding the sandy and light character of the soil.

HISTORY—Sandy derives its name from the sandy soil on which it is located. The Utah Southern Railway Company selected the site for a station because of its altitude, it being the highest point, from which a branch road could be built to the mouth of Little Cottonwood Canyon. This was done in 1871, the Utah Central Railway completing its track to that point Sept. 23, 1871.

In the winter of 1871-72 a post office was established at Sandy with Isaac Harrison as postmaster.

Isaac Harrison built the first hotel and Charles Decker the first store. The railroad company soon afterwards built a fine depot with an adjoining hotel, which were destroyed by a disastrous fire, July 13, 1880. A town site was surveyed and building lots sold at a high figure, and for several months, while Sandy was the terminus of the Utah Central Railway, a vast amount of shipping was done to and from points south-east and west, especially from the mines at Pioche, Bingham and Little Cottonwood.

In 1873 Sandy was made a voting precinct, and Isaac Harrison was elected the first justice of the peace. This year, also, the Wasatch and Jordan Valley Railway (now known as the Alta Branch of the D. & R. G. Ry.) was completed between Sandy and Fairfield Flat in Little Cottonwood Canyon, a distance of eight miles.

Soon after the opening of the Utah Central Railway a smelter (the Saturn) was built a short distance south of the station and commenced operations; the Flagstaff was the next one. It was built on an elevated piece of ground directly east of the town. Afterwards the Mountain Chief, (later known as the Mingo), which is now the only smelter in operation at Sandy, was built near the site of the Saturn, the latter having previously closed down. Teaming to and from the mines and the opening of these smelters brought in a large number of "roughs" from various parts of the country, and in consequence thereof Sandy was made the scene of several unpleasant affairs, in which a number of men lost their lives. One of these affairs took place in June, 1874, when the news of the passage of the Poland Bill by the U. S. Congress reached Sandy. The non-Mormon element immediately grew excited and having organized for the purpose, they marched through town visiting nearly every "Mormon" family and gave, at each place where they called, three cheers for Robert N. Baskin (the "Ring" candidate for delegate to Congress) and the Poland Bill, and three groans for Geo. Q. Cannon, the "Peoples" candidate. At the following election (Aug. 3, 1874) the "roughs" picked a quarrel with the "Mormons" who came forward to vote, during which John W. Sharp was severely beaten and would perhaps have been killed, had it not been for the timely aid of Conductor Wm. Hiskey, who came in with the north bound train in the evening. He armed himself with two six-shooters and scattered the mobbers in all directions. For several days afterwards a number of armed men watched the train for the purpose of killing the conductor, in which, however, they were not successful. Only a few months afterwards the business at Sandy became stagnant, and most of the parties who participated in the riot left for Montana. After a few years nearly all the transient characters had removed to other parts, and only the farming population, which consisted chiefly of "Mormons," and which now comprises nearly two-thirds of the population, remained. That the "Liberal Party" gained the victory at the election for school trustee in 1887 was largely due to the fact that a large number of the people are foreigners, (mostly Scandinavians) who have not yet secured their naturalization papers, and consequently could not vote.

SANDY WARD is coextensive with Sandy Precinct.

In May, 1887, the presiding authorities of the Ward stood as follows:

Bishopric—Ezekiel Holman, Bishop; Emil Hartviksen and Andrew Olsen Gaelte, Counselors; Wm. W. Wilson, ward clerk.

There is a Teachers' Quorum presided over by Martin Gunderson.

Deacons' Quorums—Alfred Andersen and Richard Cowley preside over the 1st and 2nd Quorums.

Sunday School—Isaac Harrison, supt.; Heber Goff and Wm. R. Scott, assistants; N. H. Halstrøm and N. M. Nielson. secretaries.

Relief Society—Wilhelmine Olsen, Pres.; Harriet Wilson and Catherine Harrison, Counselors; Mary Jane Scott and Hilda Larson, secretaries.

Y. M. & Y. L. M. I. A.—Wm. R. Scott, Pres.; B. H. Bowen and Hannah Shaw, Counselors; Elisha Shaw and Mary Jane Lewis, secretaries.

Primary Association—Hannah Shaw, Pres.; Jane Clark and Mary Jane Lewis, Counselors; Ruth Lewis and John E. Hartvikson, secretaries.

HISTORY—The few Saints who first located at Sandy attended meetings in the surrounding Wards until the fall of 1873, when they hired a hall of Mr. Geo. Parker for $15 per month and commenced to hold meetings for themselves. Isaac Harrison was the first presiding Elder, under the direction of the Bishopric of the South Cottonwood Ward. Later, meetings were held in a room of the Utah Central Railway depot, until Andrew O. Gaelte opened his private house free of charge for meeting purposes. Finally, Wm. Newell, Isaac Harrison, Wm. R. Scott, A. O. Gaelte and others bought a small lumber building and moved it on rails from a point near the Utah Central track to the vicinity of where the Sandy meeting house now stands. In that house regular meetings were held for a number of years. In the meantime Elder Harrison was succeeded in the presidency of the branch by Wm. Newel who, in turn, was succeeded by Elder Harrison. The latter presided until 1877, when the Union Ward was organized and Sandy became a branch of the same, under the presidency of John W. Sharp, who was called to act as presiding Elder of the Sandy Branch July 1, 1877. Being at that time absent on a preaching mission, from which he did not return until fall, he was not set apart to his position until July 7, 1878. Before his return Thomas Smart and Henry Russell had temporary charge, and later, when Elder Sharp occasionally was absent, Elders Henry Russell, Isaac Harrison and Wm. Lewis presided in the meetings.

At an early day a Sunday School was organized by Isaac Harrison and Wm. R. Scott. This was frequented by both "Mormons" and "Gentiles" alike for a long time until finally the non-Mormons opened a school of their own in a vacant building belonging to the Saturn Smelting Company. The Latter-day Saint Sunday School was thoroughly reorganized Nov. 2, 1879, by Elder John W. Sharp.

A mutual improvement association for both sexes was organized in the fall of 1881, with Wm. Lewis as President. Before the close of the year it had sixty members enrolled.

Elder Sharp continued in charge of the branch until Sept. 3, 1882, when the Sandy branch was organized into a separate Ward, with Ezekiel Holman as Bishop and Emil, Hartviksen and A. O. Gaelte as Counselors. Wm. W. Wilson was appointed ward clerk. This Bishopric still stands unchanged.

Nov. 4, 1882, a Relief Society was organized with Wilhelmine Olsen as President, Harriet Wilson and Catherine Lewis, Counselors, and Mary E. L. Neff, secretary.

Soon after the organization of the Ward, steps were taken to build a meeting house, the small school building in which the Saints hitherto had met for religious worship being inadequate to accommodate all. Consequently, a neat frame building, 26x40 feet, was erected in the winter of 1882-83, and meetings held in it for the first time in January, 1883.

SILVERTON PRECINCT, established June 6, 1871, contains about thirty-five square miles of mountain country, bounded on the north by East Mill Creek Precinct, east by the summit of the Wasatch Mountains, which separates it from Summit County, south by Little Cottonwood Precinct, and west by Butler Precinct. It contains all that section of the Wasatch Mountains, which is drained by the head-waters of the Big Cottonwood Creek. Population in 1880, 121. This precinct is included in the Granite Ward.

SOUTH COTTONWOOD PRECINCT, established July 21, 1863, is bounded on the north by Mill Creek Precinct, east by Big Cottonwood and Butler Precincts, south by Union and West Jordan Precincts, and west it is separated from the North Jordan Precinct by the river Jordan. It contains about twelve square miles of country. Population in 1880, 1,288.

This precinct comprises four school districts, numbered respectively, 24

25, 26 and 45. There are three fine brick school houses, one in each of the three first-named districts. One of these buildings is located near Swen M. Lovendahl's residence, near by the Utah Central Railway track, another on the State Road, near Francklyn Station, and a third one on the county road, near Nathan Tanner's residence.

SOUTH COTTONWOOD WARD is coextensive with the precinct of the same name. The ward house, situated a mile east of the State Road, on rising ground north of the South Cottonwood Creek, is about ten miles south-east from the Temple Block, Salt Lake City. South Cottonwood is noted for its excellent tame hay, mostly lucern, clover and timothy. A fine quality of peas is also produced.

The Germania and Horn Silver Smelters are located in the lower part of the Ward. About one-third of the population of the Ward are "Gentiles."

In May, 1887, the presiding officers of the Ward were as follows:

Bishopric Joseph S. Rawlins, Bishop; Wm. Boyce and Thos. A. Wheeler, Counselors; Richard Howe. ward clerk.

There is a Teachers' Quorum, presided over by Henry J. Brown, and three Deacons' Quorums.

Sunday School—Louis A. Kelsch, supt.; Richard Howe and Charles Walter, assistants; Wm. Bradford, secretary.

Relief Society—Mary Rawlins, Pres.; Ann Wheeler and Phoebe Boyce, Counselors; Harriet Ann Walker, secretary.

Y. M. M. I. A.—Louis A. Kelsch, Pres.; John G. Labrun and Chr. H. Steffensen, Counselors: Jacob Tipton, secretary.

Y. L. M. I. A.—Isabella Eriksen, Pres.; Ann E. Labrun and Annie M. Thompson, Counselors; Rose Kelsch, secretary.

Primary Association.—Elizabeth Davis, Pres.; Margaret Carruth and Sarah Ann Wootton, Counselors; Emily Brinton, secretary.

HISTORY—When Apostle Amasa M. Lyman arrived in Great Salt Lake Valley with his company of Saints, in October, 1848, he located part of them (mainly a number of families from the State of Mississippi (at a point between the two Cottonwood Creeks, about ten miles south-east from the Great Salt Lake City fort. A tract of country, consisting of about one mile square, was surveyed and divided into 10-acre lots for the convenience of the settlers, among whom were Amasa M. Lyman, Wm. Crosby, Daniel Clark, James M. Flake, John Tanner and sons (Sidney and Nathan), Daniel M. Thomas, John Brown, John H. Bankhead, Wm. H. Lay and others, with their respective families. The place of their location was subsequently known as the "Amasa Survey."

During the fall and winter of 1848 a few houses were built of logs, which the brethren hauled from near the mouth of Big Cottonwood and Mill Creek Canyons, but most of the people lived in their tents and wagons until spring, when a number of other houses were built. The first adobe house was erected by John Brown in the summer of 1849.

In the meantime water had been taken out of the two Cottonwood Creeks, and other improvements made. The number of settlers were also increased by several families locating on various points along the creeks. A Ward organization, known originally as the Cottonwood Ward but which afterwards changed name to South Cottonwood, was finally effected with William Crosby as Bishop; James M. Flake was one of his Counselors.

During the year 1849 a small crop of wheat was raised, but it grew so scattered and short that when harvest came, most of it had to be pulled up by hand. The little colony, however, was very industrious. The crickets were fought vigorously, and immense numbers of them killed; but notwithstanding this, the crops would, no doubt, have been destroyed, had not the gulls put in their appearance. At first, when the colonists saw these birds coming down from beyond the Great Salt Lake, they feared they were a new plague, but when their extraordinary appetite for crickets became known, the farmers retired to their houses, leaving the fields of grain and the crickets to the gulls. It was soon discovered that the birds were far more successful than human labor.

In 1848-50 the little colony grew steadily, and prospered as well as any neighborhood in Utah at that time.

The first meeting house built in the Ward was a small adobe building, known as Jonathan C. Wright's school house. It was erected in 1851. Previous to this all meetings had been held in private houses. As the settlers increased in number, other school houses were built, and the first ward house was erected in 1856. It consisted of a substantial adobe building, and was at the time of its completion the finest meeting house outside of Salt Lake City. The present commodious ward house, also an adobe building, 60 x 40 feet, was erected in 1869.

In the fall of 1851 the majority of the people accompanied Amasa M. Lyman and Charles C. Rich to southern California, where they located at San Bernardino, after which the "Amasa Survey" was transferred to the Church. Bishop Crosby being among those who went to California, Jonathan C. Wright was appointed Bishop in his stead, with Levi Stewart and Charles Bird as Counselors. He presided until the fall of 1852, when Abraham O. Smoot, who had been appointed by the First Presidency to take charge of the Church property known as the "Amasa Survey," succeeded him as Bishop. Elder Smoot's Counselors were Jonathan C. Wright and Levi Stewart. During the temporary absence of Bishop Smoot Counselor Wright had charge of the Ward.

March 14, 1854, Andrew Cahoon was ordained a High Priest and set apart to act as Bishop of the Ward, Elder Smoot having removed to the Sugar House Ward. Geo. W. Gibson and Wm. Carruth acted as Bishop Cahoon's Counselors. Afterwards Wm. Boyce became a Counselor in the place of Elder Carruth. Counselor Gibson removed to southern Utah in 1861, when William Boyce became first Counselor and Matthew Rowan was chosen as second Counselor. Counselor Rowan died Jan. 7, 1866, and Richard Maxfield became second Counselor in his stead. After these changes Elders Boyce and Maxfield continued as Counselors until Bishop Cahoon apostatized and was discontinued as Bishop in 1872.

June 6, 1872, Joseph Sharp Rawlins was ordained a Bishop by Pres. Brigham Young, and appointed to preside over the Ward. He retained the former Counselors, Elders Boyce and Maxfield, until the latter was dropped in 1873, and Thomas A. Wheeler was appointed second Counselor in his stead. During the absence of Elder Wheeler on a mission to England in 1875-77, Elder Ishmael Phillips acted as temporary Counselor.

At a meeting held in the South Cottonwood ward house, July 1, 1877, at which Prests. Daniel H. Wells, Angus M. Cannon, David O. Calder and Joseph E. Taylor were present, the South Cottonwood Ward was divided into three Wards, the west part only being continued under the former name, while the Union and Granite Wards were created of the east part. Joseph S. Rawlins was sustained as Bishop and William Boyce and Thomas A. Wheeler as his Counselors. Bro. Wheeler not having returned from his mission to England, and Ishmael Phillips having been appointed Bishop of the Union Ward, Elder Wm. G. Young was appointed to act as temporary Counselor until Elder Wheeler's return. Wm. Boyce and Wm. G. Young were set apart by Pres. D. H. Wells.

In October, 1877, Elder Wheeler returned home, and he was ordained a High Priest and set apart as second Counselor the following November, at a Priesthood meeting held in Salt Lake City.

During the temporary absence of Counselor Boyce, Elder John G. Labrun has acted as second Counselor to Bishop Rawlins.

In early times the land in the upper part of the South Cottonwood Ward was considered worthless and unproductive, but through the perseverance of the settlers in battling patiently with the elements and reclaiming the desert lands, it is now quite productive, and all kinds of grain are raised; also fine fruits and vegetables.

SOUTH JORDAN PRECINCT, established May 13, 1867, is bounded on the north by West Jordan Precinct, separated on the east from Sandy and Draper Precincts by the River Jordan, bounded on the south by Riverton Precinct, and west by Herriman Precinct. It contains about fourteen square miles of farming country. Pop. in 1880, 738.

SOUTH JORDAN WARD is coextensive with the South Jordan Precinct. The ward house, situated on rising ground, about one mile west of the river Jordan, is sixteen miles south from the Temple Block, Salt Lake City, and four miles southwest of Sandy, the nearest railway station. Farming and sheep-raising are the principal industries of the people, who are nearly all Latter-day Saints. Water for irrigation purposes is had from the Beckstead Ditch (made in 1859) and the South Jordan and Utah & Salt Lake Canals.

In May, 1887, the presiding authorities of the Ward stood as follows:

Bishopric—William A. Bills, Bishop; Jesse Vincent and Henry Beckstead, Counselors; Edwin D. Holt, ward clerk.

There is a Priest's Quorum, presided over by the Bishopric, and also a number of ordained Teachers and Deacons.

Sunday School.—Isaac J. Wardle, supt.; Albert Holt and Matthew Holt, assistants; James A. Oliver, secretary.

Relief Society.—Ann Holt, Pres.; Emily G. Beckstead and Emmeline Bills, Counselors; Emma Holt, secretary.

Y. M. M. I. A.—Henry B. Beckstead, Pres.; O. K. Okeson and Isaac J. Wardle, jun., Counselors; Peter Winward, secretary.

Y. L. M. I. A.—Maria Holt, Pres.; Elizabeth Stocking and Rose A. Holt, Counselors; Loretta Beckstead, secretary.

Primary Association.—Naomi V. Oliver, Pres.; Mary H. Beckstead and Elizabeth Stocking, Counselors; Edward H. Holt, secretary.

HISTORY—That part of West Jordan which is now included in the South Jordan Ward was first settled by Isaac J. Wardle and Samuel Alexander Beckstead, who on March 1, 1859, located on the bottom land on the west side of the river Jordan, at a point nearly a mile south of the present South Jordan ward house. Other settlers located on various bends of the river in the following November. Among them were James Oliver, N. G. Soffe, James Wood and Thos. Allsop.

In 1863 the South Jordan Saints were organized into a branch of the West Jordan Ward, with James Woods as President. William A. Bills succeeded him in 1867, Pres. Woods having apostatized and joined the Josephites. Elder Bills presided for about ten years. Meetings were held for a number of years in private houses, even before there was a branch organization. In 1864 the first school house, an adobe building, 18x14 feet, was erected about a quarter of a mile south-west of the site of the present ward house. At that time there were only nine families in the branch. This house was finally sold to a private party, and in 1873 the present ward house, a two-story structure, 46x20 feet, built partly of rocks and partly of adobes, was erected.

About the year 1876, when the South Jordan Canal was finished, the population increased rapidly, and new farms were opened on the bench. Later, when the Utah & Salt Lake Canal was completed, a still greater increase of population and prosperity was had, and at the present time all kinds of tame hay, etc., are raised with great success.

At a special meeting held in the West Jordan ward house, June 17, 1877, the South Jordan Ward was organized, with Wm. A. Bills as Bishop, and Ensign I Stocking and Henry Beckstead as his Counselors. Elders Bills and Beckstead were ordained and set apart by Pres. Daniel H. Wells at the time, and Elder Stocking at Draper, June 24, 1877, also by Pres. Wells.

Aug 4, 1883, Jesse Vincent was set apart to act as first Counselor to Bishop Bills by Geo. Q. Cannon, instead of Counselor Stocking, deceased.

SUGAR HOUSE PRECINCT, established July 21, 1863, is bounded on the north by Salt Lake City corporation limit (Roper Street) and Davis County, east by Mountain Dell Precinct, south by East Mill Creek and Mill Creek Precincts, and west by Farmers Precinct. It contains about twenty-two square miles of valley and mountain country, lying in the shape of an L. Pop. in 1880, 738. It includes School Districts Nos. 29 and 58.

SUGAR HOUSE WARD is coextensive with Sugar House Precinct. The unfinished ward house, a fine brick building, 63x32 feet, is beautifully situated on high ground, near the building known as the Old Paper Mill, about four miles south-east of the Temple Block, Salt Lake City. A majority of the inhabitants are Latter-day Saints. Within the limits of this Ward is the Utah Penitentiary, where so many of the Elders have suffered for conscience' sake. There are two school houses, one of which is situated near the unfinished ward house, and is used also for meeting purposes; the other is located near the foot of the mountains.

Bishopric.—Apollos G. Driggs, Bishop; James Johnston and Peter Hansen, Counselors; Martin Garn, ward clerk.

There are two quorums of Deacons.

Sunday School.—Paul A. Elkins, supt.; James R. Smith and Horace Eldredge, assistants; Annie R. McGhie and Eleanor Staker, secretaries.

Relief Society—Sarah B. Gibson, Pres.; Catherine Staker and Esther S. Hardy, Counselors; Betty Bolwinkle, secretary.

Y. M. M. I. A.—George Crismon, Pres.; Jacob Garn and Nephi Hansen, Counselors; Apollos P. Driggs, secretary.

Y. L. M. I. A.—Louie Siddoway, Pres.; Carrie Richards and Maggie Harris, Counselors; Minnie Garn, secretary.

Primary Association.—Isabella McGhie, Pres.

HISTORY—Ira Eldredge was the first farmer on Canyon Creek, within the present limits of the Sugar House Ward. In the spring of 1848 he conducted water from the creek unto a piece of land about half a mile south-east of the present site of the Territorial Penitentiary and raised a crop of wheat, Indian corn and potatoes that season. In the fall Charles Crismon built the first house near the creek on the spot where the residence of the late Ira Eldredge now stands. Among the first settlers on Canyon Creek were also Charles Kennedy, Joseph Fisher, Lorenzo D. Young, John Eldredge, Norman Bliss, Albert Griffin and others, who located at various places on the creek in 1849-50. Pres. Brigham Young built a grist mill on the creek in an early day.

In 1852 the population was considerably increased by the arrivals of immigrants from the East, and in 1853 the settlers on Canyon Creek assisted the Mill Creek Saints in building a small fort on Mill Creek, about two miles south of Canyon Creek.

The first school house on Canyon Creek, a small log building, was erected in 1852, on the north side of the creek, a few rods below where the Old Paper Mill now stands. For several years schools were taught and meetings held in that building. A school district was organized June 8, 1852, by the county court.

The necessary machinery for a sugar factory was imported from England in 1852 by the Church, and in the fall of that year an unsuccessful attempt was made to manufacture sugar in Great Salt Lake City, the imported machinery being put up for that purpose on the Temple Block. In the spring of 1853 it was removed to Provo, where another fruitless attempt was made to manufacture sugar from beets. Early in 1854 the machinery was taken back to Salt Lake County and put up on Canyon Creek, where the building now known as the Old Sugar House or Paper Mill was erected by the Church in 1854-55, under the direction of Abraham O. Smoot. In the latter part of 1855 the machinery was put in running order in the new building, and a quantity of good molasses made from beets, the sugar business still proving a complete failure. About three hundred acres were planted with beets in 1855. It is estimated that the Church lost about one hundred thousand dollars by these experiments. The machinery imported for the purpose of making sugar is now scattered all over the country, the greater portion of it, however, being stored under sheds in the Tithing Yard, Salt Lake City. Many years ago the building was turned into a paper factory, but also the industry of making paper, which proved more profitable than the manufacture of sugar, was abandoned for the lack of sufficient water to run the heavy machinery, the creek proving inadequate for both irrigation and mill purposes.

At a council of the presiding authorities of the Church, held in G. S. L. City, Feb. 16, 1849, it was decided to organize all that portion of the Great Salt Lake Valley embraced in the original Five Acre Survey into a Ward, to be known as the Canyon Creek Ward. It appears, however, that no such Ward was ever organized. The few Saints on Canyon Creek attended meetings in the city for a number of years, and Bishop Reuben Miller, of Mill Creek, and Peter McCue, of the First Ward (Great Salt Lake City), held jurisdiction alternately, until it was decided that Bishop Miller should have exclusive jurisdiction. A presiding Elder, who acted under the direction of Bishop Miller, took charge of the meetings and local affairs generally.

April 23, 1854, the Saints on Canyon Creek were first organized into a Ward, called the Sugar House Ward, after the Sugar House, which was then in course of erection. Abraham O. Smoot, who had been called away from Cottonwood by Pres. Brigham Young, to superintend the erection of the aforesaid building and to take charge of the adjacent Forest Farm, was appointed Bishop of the new Ward, April 23. 1854. His Counselors were Ira Eldredge and Henry Wilde, who were both ordained and set apart to their positions April 30, 1854.

During the temporary absence of Bishop Smoot and Counselor Eldredge, who both went east after emigrants, Henry Wilde and Wm. C. A. Smoot had temporary charge of the Ward. Subsequently Henry Wilde removed to Coalville, Summit County, and Wm. C. A. Smoot acted as second Counselor for a short time.

In the spring of 1857 Bishop Smoot, who had been elected mayor of Great Salt Lake City, to fill the unexpired term of the late Jedediah M. Grant, removed to the city, and Counselor Ira Eldredge was appointed Bishop in his stead. William C. A. Smoot and Charles Griffin were chosen as his Counselors. Afterwards Charles Griffin removed to Coalville, Summit Co., when Charles I. Robson was chosen as second Counselor.

At the time of the move in 1858 the Sugar House Ward people settled temporarily at Provo, Salem and Spanish Fork. Nearly all returned to their homes after peace was established.

Bishop Ira Eldredge died Feb. 6, 1866, at Coalville, Summit Co., and Counselor Wm. C. A. Smoot became acting Bishop in his stead. His Counselors were Charles Innes Robson and Alexander C. Pyper. When Counselor Pyper removed from the Ward Jacob Gibson became Counselor in his stead.

Bishop Wm. C. A. Smoot presided until July 23, 1877, when the Ward was reorganized with Apollos G. Driggs as Bishop and James Johnston and Elnathan Eldredge as his Counselors. These three brethren were ordained and set apart the same day by Pres. Daniel H. Wells.

In 1883 Counselor Eldredge was released, and Peter Hanson was appointed second Counselor in his stead.

The Sugar House Ward originally embraced the Five Acre Survey and all the country lying east of it up to the foot of the mountains; westward it extended to the river Jordan. Subsequently the southern boundary line was moved about one mile south. The present boundary lines were established Jan. 3, 1883, when the Presidency of the Stake decided that all that portion of the Sugar House Ward lying north of Roper Street should belong to the Salt Lake City Wards. This change transferred a good number of families from the Sugar House Ward to the First Ward, Salt Lake City.

About the year 1868 a post office, known as the Paper Mill post office, was opened on Canyon Creek, with Wm. C. A. Smoot as postmaster.

TAYLORSVILLE is the post-office name for North Jordan.

TRAVERSE MOUNTAINS is the name given to the low range of mountains running east and west from the Wasatch to the Oquirrh ranges, which separates Salt Lake from Utah County. The river Jordan cuts clear through them, thus making an open gap between the two valleys (Salt Lake and Utah). The noted landmark known as the "Point of the Mountain South," is on the east side of the river.

TWIN PEAKS, two of the highest mountain peaks in the Wasatch Range, point their lofty tops heavenward at an altitude of about 11,400 feet above sea level. They are located between the two Cottonwood Canyons, near the valley. From the Temple Block to the summit of the west peak the air line distance is about thirteen miles. On the north side of the peaks, near the top, can be seen snow all the year around.

HISTORICAL—The first visit made by white men to the summit of the Twin Peaks is thus described by Elder John Brown:

"On Friday, Aug. 20, 1847, in company with Albert Carrington, Wm. W. Rust and two other men, I went to the foot of what we supposed to be the highest peak in the mountains east of the valley, called the Twin Peaks. We camped at the mouth of Big Cottonwood Canyon. Next morning (Aug. 21st), at eight o'clock, four of us (Carrington, Brown, Wilson and Rust) commenced to ascend the mountain, leaving a guard with our horses. After toiling about eight hours and being very much fatigued, three of us reached the summit of the west peak; one of our party (Dr. Rust) had given out and laid down near a snow-bank to rest. We had brought along a barometer, a thermometer and compass, with which we made some observations and learned that the peak was 11,219 feet above the sea. The temperature at five o'clock in the evening was 55 degrees above zero, while on the same day, at noon, it stood 101 degrees in the city. At 5:30 p.m, we commenced deseending; we came down on the west side of the peak, passed through a beautiful grove of timber, and followed the course of a small creek. We had not gone far when darkness came on, and as we had expected to get back to camp about the middle of the afternoon, we were unprovided with bedding, coats or any kind of arms, wishing to go as lightly loaded as possible, the day being very warm. But now, when night came on, we found it quite cold in the mountains. While climbing over the rocks, after feeling our way with our hands in order to escape death by falling over a precipice, we became separated, and only Brother Carrington and I remained together. At 10 p.m. we laid down under a scrubby tree, being so tired that further progress was impossible, and we knew not where the two other men had gone. At length we found a place between the rocks large enough to lay down. Our bed, however, was by no means horizontal; it had a slope of something like 45 degress. Instead of feathers we had pebbles for pillows, and coarse sands, which were yet warm from the heat of the sun, for bedding; we kept them warm by our bodies during the remainder of the night. At five o'clock the next morning we arose, being somewhat sore, and we continued our journey down the mountain side. Hungry and faint, having had neither supper nor breakfast, we scrambled over the rocks as best we could. After we had gone about half a mile we heard a man's voice in the canyon below, and on going a little further we saw one of our men (Doctor Wm. W. Rust) on our left, standing on a large rock. He called for help, saying that he was tired out. As we were precisely in the same fix we could not render him any assistance. We reached our camp at 7:30 a.m, where we found our other companion who had made his way in at 10 o'clock the night previous. We then returned to the city, satisfied with our first attempt at climbing mountains."

Only a few men have undertaken to climb to the summit of the Twin Peaks since 1847. A scientific party who made the ascent a few years ago, however, found the altitude to be greater than that given by the first visitors.

UNION PRECINCT, established Dec. 15, 1877, and organized of a part of South Cottonwood Precinct, is bounded on the north by South Cottonwood Precinct, east by Butler and Granite Precincts, south by Sandy Precinct, and west by West Jordan Precinct. It contains six square miles of a good farming district. Pop. in 1880, 484.

—UNION WARD is coextensive with the Union Precinct. The ward house is situated one mile east of the State Road, and 12 miles southeast of the Temple Block, Salt Lake City.

In May, 1887, the presiding authorities of the Ward stood as follows:

Bishopric—Ishmael Phillips, Bishop; Marion H. Brady and James L. James, Counselors; John Oborn, ward clerk.

Deacons' Quorums—Albert I. Walker, Charles Evans, John W. Richards and Isaac M. Shaw, with their respective Counselors, preside over the 1st, 2nd, 3rd and 4th quorums.

Sunday School—John H. Walker, supt.; Thomas H. Smart and John A. Berrett, assistants; Andrew Phillips, secretary.

Y. M. M. I. A.—John H. Walker, Pres.; Thomas H. Smart and Chas. Evans, Counselors; John A. Berrett, secretary.

Y. L. M. I. A.—Sarah Buxton, Pres.; Della A. Brady and Sarah A. Forbush, Counselors; A. M. E. B. Sharp, secretary.

Relief Society—Elizabeth Richards, Pres.; Ann Griffiths and Philinda Cole, Counselors; Mary A. Smart, secretary.

Primary Association—Mary A. Smart, Pres.; Mary A. Ball and Elizabeth Richardson, Counselors; Lellie S. Moreton, secretary.

HISTORY—Union was known as Little Cottonwood Ward from the time of its first settlement until 1854. Among the first settlers who located on the south side of the Little Cottonwood Creek, in the spring of 1849, was John Cox, who built a house on the present site of Union Fort and commenced farming. A brother Elmer located about two miles further up the creek. In the fall Silas Richards, who had just arrived in the valley, bought out Elmer's improvements and settled down, together with a number of other families who had crossed the plains in his company. In the fall of 1850 the number of families was nearly doubled by immigration. During that year a comfortable school house was built, about 1½ miles east of the present site of Union Fort. In this building Bishop Richards taught the first school in the Ward during the winters of 1850-51 and 1851-52.

In 1853, agreeable to counsel from Pres. Brigham Young, the Saints on the Little Cottonwood, who now numbered 273 souls, went to work and built a fort, as a protection against the Indians, who at that time were hostile and did considerable stealing and killing in various parts of the Territory. The settlers on the Cottonwoods, however, were never molested by the natives. John Cox gave up 10 acres of his farming land for a fort site, around which a wall, 12 feet high and 6 feet thick at the bottom, tapering off to one foot thick at the top, was built of rocks, adobes and clay. Port holes were made a few yards apart and bastions built on two of the four corners. The people called their little fortified village Union, a name suggestive of the energy and unity which characterized the Saints in their labors at the time. Nearly every house which had been built on the various farming claims along the creek was pulled down and removed to the fort, where the little colony was soon comfortably situated and lived together very peaceably.

In 1854 a large two-story school-house was built, of adobes, in the fort. A few years later, when the Indian difficulties were supposed to be over so far as Great Salt Lake Valley was concerned, the fort walls were gradually torn down, and a number of the people again located on their respective farms. But ever since that time the popular name of the Ward has been Union Fort.

Toward the close of 1849, a few weeks after the arrival of Silas Richards on Little Cottonwood Creek, he was appointed to preside as Bishop over the few families located on the south side of the creek. He acted in that capacity without Counselors, until July 13, 1851, when he was ordained to the position of Bishop. John Cox was set apart to act as his first Counselor at the same time. Subsequently Henry H. Wilson was chosen as second Counselor. In the spring of 1860 Elder Cox removed to Sanpete County, when Henry H. Wilson became first Counselor and Thomas S. Terry was chosen as second Counselor. Counselors Wilson and Terry were both called to "Dixie" in 1862, after which Wm. P. Smith and Norman G. Brimhall acted as Counselors as long as Silas Richards continued Bishop.

Elder Richards having been called at the October Conference, 1864, to assist the new settlers in southern Utah, resigned his position as Bishop of the Union Ward, and started on his mission the following December. Counselors Smith and Brimhall then took temporary charge for a few weeks, but in the beginning of 1865 the Union or Little Cottonwood Ward was amalgamated with the South Cottonwood Ward, under Bishop Andrew Cahoon. Thus it remained for the next thirteen years, during which time a temporary district organization was kept up at Union, with a presiding Elder in charge, who acted under the direction of the South Cottonwood Bishopric. In this capacity Richard Taylor acted for a short time; he was succeeded by Ishmael Phillips. During these years district meetings were held occasionally. Otherwise the Union Saints attended Sabbath meetings at the South Cottonwood meeting-house.

At a meeting held in the South Cottonwood ward house, July 1, 1877, the Union Ward, composed of the Union and Sandy Districts of the South Cottonwood Ward, was organized with Ishmael Phillips as Bishop, and Marion H. Brady and Otis L. Terry as his Counselors. These brethren were ordained and set apart by Daniel H. Wells.

Counselor Terry having removed to Sanpete County, James L. James was chosen second Counselor in his stead in the spring of 1887.

WARM SPRINGS. Of the varieties of warm springs in Utah the most noted and the best known are the Warm Springs within the corporate limits of Salt Lake City. The waters are limpid and smell strongly of sulphureted hydrogen, and are charged with gas, as combined with the mineral basis and as absorbed by the waters themselves. Dr. Gale is authority for the assertion that it is a "Harrowgate water abounding in sulphur." Three fluid ounces of water, on evaporation to entire dryness, in a platina capsule, will give 8¼ grains of solid, saline matter. It is slightly charged with hydro-sulphuric acid gas, and is a pleasant, saline mineral water, having the valuable properties belonging to saline sulphur springs. It issues from the mountain side in large volume, at a point about a quarter of a mile north of the Warm Springs bath houses. It has a temperature of 95 degrees to 104 degrees, and is conveyed in wooden pipes into three bathing houses, containing plunge, shower and tub baths, and dressing and waiting rooms. The water is very efficacious in the cure of many diseases, notably paralytic, rheumatic and scrofulous.

The bath houses are situated in the Nineteenth Ward, on 2nd West Street, between 8th and 9th North Streets. The property is owned by the city, with which it is connected by the street cars.

HISTORICAL—The Warm Springs bath-house was first opened Nov. 27, 1850, on the block lying immediately south of the present bath house. It was under the care of James Hendrix. Subsequently J. C. Little opened a hotel on the premises and did considerable business. In 1866 the present bath house was built under the direction of the Great Salt Lake City council, and Henry Arnold was appointed superintendent of the property. Under his supervision a flourishing business was done at the Springs during the following ten years. In 1876 the property was leased to a Dr. Monroe, who, however, failed to comply with his contract with the city council, in consequence of which, James Townsend became the leaseholder, and had charge until his death, April 2, 1886. Since then his widow, Mrs. Rosanna Townsend, has had charge of the property.

WASATCH, a postoffice and railway station on the Alta Branch of the D. & R. G. Ry., has a romantic location in Little Cottonwood Canyon, about 1½ miles up from its mouth, 7½ miles west of Alta, 8½ east of Sandy, and 21 south-east of Salt Lake City. It consists of a few small station buildings and a boarding-house for the Church quarrymen on the north side of the Little Cottonwood Creek, while opposite, on the south side of the stream, and connected with the north side by a narrow foot-bridge, is situated what is known as the Quarrymen's Summer Quarters, consisting of a number of tents, bowers and summer-houses, surrounded by beautiful lawns and flower gardens. The grounds, covering a few acres, are beautifully laid out in walks and alleys, the whole camp nestling under the shade of fine trees and shrubbery. Water has been conducted from the creek in ditches and flows through the camp in pipes and flumes in almost every conceivable shape, thus making it easy of access for both culinary and irrigation purposes. A fresh canyon breeze, which generally commences at 2 o'clock p.m., and continues until dark, makes the place healthy and cool in the summer, and as a suitable place for rest and rustication, away from the bustle and business of the city, the place is becoming more popular every year. Quite a number of the finest places in the camp have been prepared by people from Salt Lake City, who spend part of the hot season there. During the winter season, however, the locality is cold and dreary, the mountain tops on the south being so lofty and in such close proximity to the camp, that they shut out the sunshine for several months of the year. The surrounding scenery is grand and lovely. From almost every nook and crevice of them ountain cliffs, which rise to the height of several thousand feet (at certain places almost perpendicular), on both sides of the canyon, grow small pines, cedars, ferns and mosses, which, together with the gray granite walls, castellated mountains, rippling creek, pure air and golden sun present a picture of rare beauty.

Just above Wasatch on the north side of the creek, away up on a projecting cliff, 1,000 feet above the road, stands a granite column which measures 66⅔ feet in height, from the pedestal-like cliff on which it stands. On each side of this column and receeding from its base is a little grotto-park filled with nature's evergreen, and surrounded on three sides and on the top with rocks of every size and shape.

Wasatch is the terminus of the steam railway, and from here passengers continue their journey to Alta on the tramway, on which large mules haul up passengers and freight on small, suitable cars. In going westward neither mules nor steam power is necessary, as the rolling stock is propelled forward without artificial means agreeable to the laws of gravitation.

Wasatch is particularly noted for its fine stone quarries, it being the place where all the granite is got out for the Temple in Salt Lake City. The stone is supposed to be the best in the Territory, being of close fine grain, of light gray color and of beautiful birdseye appearance.

Among the thirty men who are engaged at present in quarrying rock for the Temple, at the stone quarry near Wasatch are David Cameron (foreman at the quarry), David Norris, Leroy Young, Wm. J. Wilson, Daniel Crump, Theodore Powell, Richard Ashdown, Edward Shepherd, Wm. Cameron, James Barnard, Robert Shepherd, Robert Snedden, Andrew Hansen, David Benson, Joseph Thatcher, F. Bedham, David Muir, Charles C Livingston, James A. Muir, James Willard, T. W. Livingston and John Robertson.

A regular camp discipline, something similar to that which used to exist in emigrant trains crossing the plains years ago, is kept up. James C. Livingston is captain or superintendent of the whole camp. Alexander Gillispie officiates as chaplain and conducts the general meetings. At the ringing of the bell at 6 o' clock every morning the men rise; they eat breakfast at 6:30 a. m., commence work at 7 o' clock, eat dinner at 12 m., then work again from 1 to 6 p. m. and eat supper at 6: 30. At 7: 30 the camp assemble for prayer. Meetings are held every second Sunday during the summer season, and in the winter months twice a week. There is also a Y. M. M. I. A. It was first organized Oct. 30, 1883, and regular meetings are held every Tuesday evening from October to April. They are generally well attended. David Cameron is the President, Thos. W. Livingston and David Norris, Counselors, and Chas. C. Livingston, secretary.

HISTORY—A Church quarry was first opened at the mouth of Little Cottonwood Canyon about the year 1859, when work was resumed on the Temple after the move south. Since then a regular force of men have been kept steadily at work getting out rock for that grand edifice, and as rocks easy of access became scarce the quarries have been moved further up the canyon until they are now worked about half a mile above the present camp. Granite, at the mouth of the canyon, was for a number of years the quarrymen's camping place, but when Wasatch Station was located and the Alta and Jordan Valley Railway was completed in 1872, the men selected the site they now occupy for their camp.

The summer camp was first established in the spring of 1878, when James C. Livingston and a few others pitched their tents on the south side of the creek and erected a temporary bowery. Others followed the next year. The superfluous undergrowth and shrubbery was removed, some of the large boulders were rolled away, and others covered with soil taken from the mountain side. Water was brought on the grounds from the creek, trees planted wherever needed for shade, and other improvements inaugurated, all of which has been going on every year since. At present the Quarrymen's Summer Quarters are considered one of the most beautiful spots in the mountains.

WEST JORDAN PRECINCT, established in 1852, is bounded on the north by North Jordan Precinct, east by Union and Sandy Precincts, south by South Jordan, Herriman and Bingham Precincts, and separated from Tooele County on the west by the summit of the Oquirrh Mountains. It contains about forty-eight square miles of valley and mountain country, of which three square miles lies on the east side of the river Jordan. Pop. in 1880, 857.

WEST JORDAN WARD is coextensive with the West Jordan Precinct. The ward house, a substantial rock building, located on the left bank of the river Jordan, is about twelve miles south-west of the Temple Block, Salt Lake City. Within the limits of the Ward is a smelter, a woolen mill, a flouring mill, several stores and a few fine private residences. There are also two brick school houses, one on the west and one on the east side of the river.

In May, 1887, the presiding authorities of the Ward stood as follows:

Bishopric—Archibald Gardner, Bishop; James Turner and John Hill, Counselors; Joseph J. Williams, ward clerk.

There are three Deacons' quorums, with a Presidency over each.

Sunday School—Hyrum Goff, supt.; James Glover and George M. Webster, assistants; Mary H. Jenkins, secretary.

Relief Society—Louisa Egbert, Pres.; Agnes Cutler and Betsey Jenson, Counselors; Delila Gardner, secretary.

Y. M. M. I. A.—James Dennis, Pres.; Samuel W. Egbert and Alexander Dahl, Counselors; E. G. Spratling, secretary.

Y. L. M. I. A.—Delila Gardner, Pres.; Elizabeth Cutler and Rachel Hill, Counselors; Elizabeth Bateman, secretary.

Primary Association—Mary Bird, Pres.; Maria T. Goff and Mary Ann Turner, Counselors; Rhoda Anu Turner, secretary.

HISTORY—The first settler in Salt Lake Valley west of the river Jordan was Joseph Harker, who built the first log house at a point opposite the Church farm. This was in the beginning of December, 1848. Early the following spring a number of others, including Samuel Bennion, John Bennion, Thomas Mackey, Thomas Turbett, Wm. Blackhurst, Wm. Farr, John Robinson and James Taylor, located farms along the river around the spot where Elder Harker first settled. An attempt was made to bring water onto their farming lands from the river Jordan, but the undertaking being too laborious, the settlers changed their location and moved south about a mile, locating near a bend of the river opposite the point where the Big Cottonwood Creek empties into the river. There the nine families, of which the little settlement consisted, made a farm conjointly, conducted water onto it from Bingham Creek and raised a small crop that year. Later in 1849 a number of Welsh Saints who had arrived in the Valley that year, in charge of Elder Dan Jones, founded what was known as the Welsh Settlement (See Brighton). Not being successful in their irrigation operations, they finally abandoned their camp and moved away.

In 1850 Archibald and Robert Gardner built a saw-mill on the site where the West Jordan Mills now stands, having first made a mill-race, 2¾ miles long, which was the first canal of any importance ever dug in Utah. The same year a number of families located farms at various points on the river, both above and below the Gardner mill-site.

In January, 1852, the first Ward organization was effected with John Robinson (ordained Jan. 19, 1852) as Bishop, and Joseph Harker (set apart Jan. 28, 1852) and Reese Williams as Counselors. The following year Bishop Robinson was called on a mission to Nova Scotia, and Counselors Harker and Williams took charge of the Ward during his absence, calling John Bennion to their assistance. When Bishop Robinson returned from his mission, he again took charge of the Ward for a few months, and then removed to Ogden. After this Elder Harker once more presided with John Bennion and McGee Harris, of Herriman, as Counselors.

In October, 1853, the West Jordan Ward contained a population of 361 souls. The settlement had been strengthened that year by the arrival of other families, including David O. Calder.

In the spring of 1854 the settlers went to work to bring water out of the river Jordan, making what is now known as the North Jordan Canal, a continuation of the original Gardner mill-race. The same year a small fort was commenced near the mills, and in the fall another fort was started below, on the grounds now occupied by the North Jordan graveyard. This forting was done as a means of protection against the Indians. The upper fort was never completed, while the lower one, containing about thirty rods square, was built within a short time of commencing it. A meeting house, 30x20 feet, an adobe building, was erected in the centre of the fort, and the majority of the people, some thirty families, moved in from their farms and spent one winter within the inclosure. Previous to the building of the meeting house in the fort, religious services had been held in private houses.

About this time the name of Taylorsville was given to that part of the Ward now embraced in North Jordan. A post-office was also established, but this was subsequently discontinued for a number of years and then reopened under the name of Taylorsville.

In 1856 a number of families removed from the Ward to Rush Valley, Tooele Co.

During the absence of Elder Harker on a mission to the Salmon River country in the summer of 1856, and again in 1857, John Bennion had temporary charge of the Ward.

In 1858, most of the West Jordan Saints moved in a body to Pondtown and Spanish Fork, Utah Co., where they remained a few weeks, after which they located temporarily on the shore of the Utah Lake, between the mouths of Spanish Fork River and Peteetneet Creek. In July they returned to their farms on the river Jordan, peace having been established between Utah and the Federal government. In May, 1858, while the West Jordan Saints were encamped at Pondtown, Wm. A. Hickman was chosen as Counselor to acting Bishop Harker, instead of McGee Harris.

After the move a log school house was built near the spot where the present North Jordan ward house stands. This served for all school and meeting purposes until 1866, when it gave way for a more substantial rock building, which is still standing.

Elder Harker presided until the fall of 1858, when Archibald Gardner was ordained Bishop of the Ward, with D. R. Allen and Royal B. Cutler as Counselors. Before this change in the Bishopric, there was a branch organization at the upper part of the Ward, comprising that tract of country now included in the West Jordan, South Jordan and other Wards. The present West Jordan ward house was built in 1864 and dedicated in 1867.

Counselors Allen and Cutler removed to Utah County, to fill the vacancies caused thereby. James Turner and John Hill were ordained High Priests and set apart as Counselors to Bishop Gardner, Jan. 7, 1866.

At a special meeting held in the West Jordan ward house, June 17, 1877, the West Jordan Ward was divided into four Wards, the middle part only being retained and reorganized under the original name. Archibald Gardner was continued as Bishop with James Turner and John Hill as Counselors. The new Wards organized at the same time were North Jordan, South Jordan and Herriman Wards.

WILLOW CREEK, a small mountain stream, rises in the Wasatch Mountains east of Draper. It flows in a westerly direction through a small canyon until it emerges into Salt Lake Valley above Draper, where the people utilizes its water for irrigation purposes. Originally it emptied into the river Jordan.

THE TWELVE APOSTLES.

JOHN HENRY SMITH,

A son of the late Pres. George A. Smith and Sarah Ann Libby, was born at Carbunca, near Kanesville (now Council Bluffs), Pottawattamie Co., Iowa, September 18, 1848. His grandfather, Patriarch John Smith, was one of the seven sons of Asahel and Mary Smith (see page 89). His mother was the daughter of Nathaniel Libby (and Tirzah Lord), who was the son of Captain Charles Libby (and Sarah Pray), who was the son of Charles Libby (and Abigail Hilton), who was the son of Deacon Benjamin Libby (and Sarah Stone), who was the son of John Libby and Agnes. John was the son of John Libby, the immigrant, who was born in England, about the year 1602, came to America in 1630, and was employed for a number of years at Scarborough, Maine.

At the time of John Henry's birth his parents were fleeing before the bigotry and intolerance of their countrymen. In 1847 his father came with the Pioneers to G. S. L. Valley, returned to the Missouri River the same fall, and went to work to prepare for the removal of his family to Utah. June 22, 1849, he started with his family for his new home in the mountains and reached G. S. L. City, October 27, 1849.

John Henry's mother, who had been an invalid for years, died June 12, 1851, of consumption. The boy was then put into the care of his mother's sister, Hannah Maria, who was also his father's wife. To her he owes very largely the success he has attained so far in life. She was an industrious, high-spirited woman, ever ambitious to be advancing in everything that was good. Her faith in the Gospel was as firm as the rocks. At that time she had a son of her own, Charles Warren, four months younger than the subject of this sketch. The father was absent from home when John Henry's mother died.

In July, 1852, his father moved his wives Lucy and Hannah to Provo, and here John Henry lived under the watch-care of two good Christian mothers, who both tried their best to guard him and keep him in the path of honor. His father's family were at that time widely scattered, some resided in Salt Lake City, others in Provo, and some in Parowan. The head of the family spent but a very small portion of his time at home, the duties of his Apostleship demanding almost his entire attention. The schools in these days were poor, but an effort was made to give each child as good an education as possible. Sept. 18, 1856, John Henry was baptized and confirmed a member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints by his father. His grandfather, Patriarch John Smith, gave him an inspired Patriarchal blessing, Jan. 18, 1852, which has been the guiding star of his subsequent life. He attended school at Provo and Salt Lake City, and obtained a moderately good education for the times.

While residing at Provo, he had a very miraculous escape from drowning in the Provo River during the very high water of 1862. On June 8th, of that year, he together with Thomas and George M. Brown were crossing the river in a small boat which capsized, John Henry became entangled in some driftwood and was kept under water for some time. People who were standing on the shore had given him up for lost, when suddenly an unseen power seemed to lift him bodily onto the bank. It was afterwards learned that at that very time his father had become forcibly impressed with the feeling that his son was in extreme danger, and he went and robed himself in his Priestly apparel and prayed the Lord to save his son, which was done in the manner named.

Oct. 20, 1866, John Henry married Sarah Farr, daughter of Lorin Farr and Nancy Chase, of Ogden. After their marriage the young couple moved to Provo, where John Henry worked as a telegraph operator. Sometime during the summer of 1867 he was chosen by Bishop W. A. Follet, in connection with H. C. Rodgers, to be his Counselor, and aid him in the government of the Fourth Ward, Provo. He remained in this position until the time the Pacific Railroad was nearly completed, when he left Provo and hired out to Benson, Farr and West, aiding them in the building of two hundred miles of the Central Pacific Railway. When this work was completed, he was offered a good situation in Sacramento, Cal., by Governor Leland Stanford, but his father requested him to come home to Salt Lake City and labor with him. This he did and spent a number of years in his employ.

During the session of the Territorial Legislature of 1872, John Henry was assistant clerk of the House of Representatives; he also acted as assistant clerk in the Constitutional Convention. Among the members were George Q. Cannon, Frank Fuller, T. C. Akers. David E. Buell, Thomas Fitch and many others of all shades of faith. A constitution was drafted and adopted having a minority representation clause in it.

John Henry traveled in various parts of the Territory with his father, and by this means became acquainted with many people. He also became intimate with Pres. Brigham Young and asked him many questions in regard to Church government. Among other things Pres. Young told him that it was the right of the senior Apostle (in order of ordination) to preside in case of his (Pres. Young's) death, but no man that had ever faltered or turned back could lead.

At the General Conference of the Church held in May, 1874, John Henry was called to go on a mission to Europe; his father gave him a blessing and Apostle John Taylor set him apart for his mission. He was also ordained a Seventy by Pres. Joseph Young, and set apart to preside as one of the Counsel over the 65th Quorum of Seventies. In the latter capacity he, however, never acted, as some mistake had been made, the quorum being already full. He left Ogden to fulfil his mission June 29, 1874, and reached New York City July 4th. He paid a visit to his uncles (mother's brothers) in New Hampshire. They received him kindly. July 14, 1874, in company with David McKenzie and L. John Nuttall, he sailed from New York in the steamship Idaho, and landed at Liverpool July 26th. He visited a few days with his cousin, Pres. Joseph F. Smith, and wss appointed to labor in the Birmingham Conference, under the direction of Elder Richard V. Morris. Subsequently he visited most of the conferences in Great Britain, and in 1875, in company with Pres. Joseph F. Smith, F. M. Lyman, E. N. Freeman and M. H. Hardy, visited Denmark, Germany, Switzerland and France.

His father being taken very sick, John Henry was ordered home in July, 1875. He arrived in time to spend fifteen days at his father's bedside, who died Sept. 1, 1875.

After this John Henry was in the employ of the Utah Central Railway Company for several years. Nov. 22, 1875, he was ordained a High Priest and Bishop by President Brigham Young, Geo. Q. Cannon and Joseph F. Smith, Pres. Young being mouth, and set apart to preside over the Seventeenth Ward of Salt Lake City. He chose John Tingey and George Dunford for his Counselors. In this position he was sustained by the people of the Ward, and enjoyed his labors very much.

At the city election in February, 1876, he was elected a member of the city council from the Third Precinct. He was re-elected twice and served six years altogether. In Aug., 1882, he was elected a member of the Territorial Legislature. During the excitement attending the passage of the first Edmunds law, he and Moses Thatcher were sent to Washington, D. C., to labor with Elder George Q. Cannon, using their influence against the passage of that law. They found it impossible to approach public men owing to the excitement, and after about a month's sojourn at the Capital they returned home.

In April, 1877, John Henry yielded obedience to the principle of plural marriage by marrying Josephine Groesbeck, a daughter of Elder Nicholas Groesbeck.

He was ordained an Apostle Oct. 27, 1880, President Woodruff being mouth, in answer to prayer.

After the October Conference in 1882, he was sent to preside over the European Mission, and was away from home two years and five months, during which time he traveled extensively in England, Scotland, Ireland and Wales. He also visited the Isle of Man, Denmark, Sweden, Norway, France, Germany, Switzerland and Italy. Since his return from this mission abroad, and during the excitement incident to the execution of the Edmunds law, he has labored incessantly among the Saints in Utah and surrounding Territories. He was arrested in July, 1885, on the charge of unlawful cohabitation, and was discharged by the Commissioner.

In connection with Apostle John W. Taylor he organized the Uintah Stake of Zion, May 9, 1887.

GEORGE TEASDALE

Was born in London, England, Dec. 8, 1831, and was baptized into the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints Aug 8, 1852. The following synopsis of his life is taken from an article published in the Millenial Star, Vol. 48, No. 50:

After being baptized Brother Teasdale was associated with the Somers Town Branch, in the city of London, where he took his degrees in the Priesthood, until, as an Elder, he presided over that branch of the London Conference in 1855-56. In 1857 he was appointed to preside over the Cambridge Conference and in 1858 to the charge of the South Pastorate, comprising the South, Wiltshire and Land's End Conferences. In 1859 he left that field of labor to preside over the Churches in Scotland—the Edinburgh, Glasgow and Dundee Conferences—where he labored until the year 1861, when he emigrated to Utah, crossing the ocean in the ship Underwriter.

On his arrival in Florence, Nebraska, he was called to assist Elder Jacob Gates in keeping the accounts, etc., of the emigration, owing to which he did not leave there until the last company of the season arrived, then he crossed the plains in Captain Sextus E. Johnson's company, which arrived in Salt Lake Valley Sept. 27, 1861. Here he found a new experience, and for the first six months taught school in the Twentieth Ward, Salt Lake City. He also became associated with the Tabernacle choir, under the leadership of Brother James Smithies. In 1862 he was engaged to take charge of President Brigham Young's Merchandise Store, by which he had the privilege of becoming familiar with that excellent man and his family. In the fall of 1867 he took charge of the General Tithing Store, and in 1868 was appointed on a mission to England. He crossed the plains with mule teams, and on his arrival in New York stayed to assist in that season's emigration, at the close of which he crossed the ocean in the steamship City of Antwerp, with Elder Albert Carrington, who was on his first mission to England, and Jesse N. Smith, who was appointed to the charge of the Scandinavian Mission. On his arrival in Liverpool, Sept. 9, 1868, he was appointed to labor in the Millenial Star office.

The next year, being called to assist Elder William C. Staines in the emigration business at New York, he crossed the ocean in the steamship Colorado, and remained there until the close of that season's emigration, returning home in the fall of 1869. Zion's Co-operative Mercantile Institution was then being started, and he obtained employment in that institution, from one responsibility to another, until he had charge of the produce department.

In 1875 he was appointed on a mission to the Southern States, and labored in Tennessee, North Carolina and Virginia. On being released in the fall of 1876, he returned home by way of Philadelphia, visited the Centennial Exhibition and the Niagara Falls. On reaching Salt Lake City, after resting awhile, he was again employed in Zion's Co-operative Institution.

In 1877 he was called to the charge of the Juab Stake of Zion. This caused him to resign an excellent position in Z. C. M. I., but he soon found suitable ways and means by which he could comfortably sustain his family, and enjoyed many positions of trust and responsibility in the town of Nephi, where he made many friends. In his ministerial duties he exceedingly enjoyed laboring in the Sunday Schools, as Superintendent of the Stake. It was a labor of love in which he was very much interested.

In October, 1882, he was called into the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles, by revelation, being ordained Oct. 16, 1882. In 1883 he took a six months' mission to the Indian Territory, returning to Salt Lake City in October, 1883. In 1884 his labors were chiefly among the Saints from Snake River, Idaho, north, to St. George, Washington Co., Utah, south. He also visited the Temples of Logan and St. George, attending to work in ordinances for the dead, etc.

In January, 1885, he left home on a visit to the Saints in the southern country, in Nevada and Arizona. From there he went to Old Mexico, and assisted in forming a colony in that land. From there he was called on a mission to Europe, to assist Pres. Daniel H. Wells, and afterwards to succeed him in the Presidency of the European Mission. He arrived in Liverpool Nov. 30, 1886, and after traveling quite extensively in the various conferences of Great Britain, he entered upon the responsible duties of his office as President of the mission in February, 1887.

HEBER JEDDIE GRANT,

A son of the late President Jedediah M. Grant, was born in Salt Lake City, Utah, Nov. 22, 1856, a few days before his father's death. He received a common school education and was baptized into the Church June 22, 1864, when nearly eight years old. While yet very young he went into business and at once became very successful in all his financial enterprises. For a number of years he figured as a prominent insurance agent, and is at present the leading spirit in a number of business corporations in Salt Lake City.

When the first Young Men's Mutual Improvement Association was organized in the Thirteenth Ward, Salt Lake City, June 10, 1875, Heber J. Grant was chosen as one of the Counselors to Elder H. A. Woolley, the President of the association. In 1880 he was called to succeed Elder F. M. Lyman as President of the Tooele Stake of Zion, a position which he occupied until he was called by revelation to be one of the Twelve Apostles. To this responsible position he was ordained Oct. 16, 1882; since then he has spent most of his time in the ministry.

JOHN WHITTAKER TAYLOR,

At present the junior member of the Quorum of the Twelve, is a son of the late President John Taylor and Sophia Whittaker, and was born May 15, 1858, in Provo, Utah Co., Utah. At the age of 14 years he was ordained to the office of a Deacon, and two years later to that of a Teacher; in the latter capacity he labored in the Fourteenth Ward of Salt Lake City, about three years. When 18 years old he was ordained an Elder, received his endowments, and was called on a mission to the Southern States, where he labored as a Traveling Elder and performed a good work, returning to his mountain home in 1882, after about two years' absence. He was a member of the Fourteenth Ward Y. M. M. I. A. from the time of its organization, and acted as Counselor to Joseph H. Felt, President of all the young men's associations in the Salt Lake Stake of Zion, until he was called to the Apostleship in the spring of 1884. At the time of his ordination, which took place in Salt Lake City, April 9, 1884, the First Presidency and all the members of the Twelve, except John Henry Smith, were present.

THE SCOTCH MISSION,

Or the Introduction of the Fulness of the Gospel into Scotland.

Elder Samuel Mulliner and Alexander Wright arrived at Glasgow as the first Latter-day Saint missionaries from America to Scotland, Dec. 20, 1839. On the following day they continued their journey to Edinburgh, where Elder Mulliner's parents resided. These were overjoyed to see their son, and made him and his missionary companion as comfortable as possible. After a few days rest Elder Wright left for the north of Scotland to spend the holidays with his relatives, while Elder Mulliner remained with his parents and friends in Edinburgh and vicinity until Jan. 7, 1840, when he started out to commence his missionary labor. Conceiving the idea of beginning operations on one side of the country and then work through it, he proceeded to Bishopton, a village six miles west of the city of Paisley, where a brother from England by the name of James Lea was employed as a time-keeper for a railway company. This brother introduced Elder Mulliner to a family by the name of Hay, to whom he proclaimed the fulness of the Gospel. This was on the 9th of January, and in the evening of the 10th he preached to a good-sized audience in a large room which he had procured for the purpose. This was the first public preaching done by any Latter-day Saint Elder in Scotland.

In the evening of Jan. 14, 1840, Elder Mulliner baptized Alexander Hay and his wife, Jessie Hay, in the river Clyde, as the first fruits of preaching the fulness of the Gospel in Scotland. On the 19th the newly baptized couple were confirmed by the laying on of hands for the reception of the Holy Ghost. Bro. Hay's children were also blessed, and the sacrament administered for the first time in Scotland by divine authority in this dispensation. On that occasion Elder Mulliner received the gift of tongues, a blessing which he had long-desired, but never received until that evening.

In the meantime opposition to the truth began to manifest itself, and several clergymen offered objections in public to the doctrines advanced by Elder Mulliner. A Mr. Crowley also challenged him for a public discussion, which came off in the evening of Jan. 24th, and resulted in victory to the cause of truth. That evening Elder Mulliner received a letter from his missionary companion, Elder Wright, who desired to join him. Consequently Elder Mulliner took a temporary leave of his new converts at Bishopton, and proceeded on a canal-boat to Edinburgh, where he met Elder Wright on the 31st. The two Elders continued their missionary labors together, and while holding a private meeting at Edinburgh, in the evening of Feb. 2nd, two young men, Mr. Gillispie and Mr. McKenzie, from Leith, who were present, rose up and testified that they were convinced of the truth advocated by the Elders, and that same evening they were both baptized by Bro. Mulliner in the sea near Leith harbor. About the middle of February Elder Mulliner, accompanied by Bro. Wright, returned to Bishopton, where he baptized Sister McKenzie on the 15th. Next, they commenced operations in the towns of Paisley, Kilpatrick, Johnstone, Houston, Bridge-of-Weir and other places. At Paisley they hired a hall, situated on one of the principal streets of the town, where they commenced to hold public meetings. At one of these Mrs. Grace McMaster became acquainted with the Elders and invited them home. She subsequently opened her house for holding meetings on Wednesday evenings, and finally was baptized by Elder Mulliner, March 26, 1840, together with others, as the first fruits of the Gospel in the city of Paisley. In the town of Kilpatrick the missionaries were attacked by a mob who pelted them with stones and rubbish and forced them to leave the town. At other places they were opposed by the clergymen, who tried to stir up the people against the truth by relating wicked falsehoods concerning the Saints in America, etc. Notwithstanding this the brethren continued their labors, which were crowned with much success. Among the number baptized was the late Wm. A. McMaster, who afterwards became a successful missionary in the Church.

In the beginning of May, 1840, Apostle Orson Pratt arrived in Paisley, and on the 8th of that month he, assisted by Elders Mulliner and Wright, organized a branch of the Church at Paisley. Robert McArthur was ordained to be the presiding Elder of the branch. Alexander Hay and Andrew Robertson were ordained Elders; David Wilkie, John Welsh and Gibson Elwood, Priests; George McKenzie, Francis Sprowle and John Souden, Teachers. George Ritchie was ordained a Deacon and Thomas Watson appointed clerk. This was the first branch of the Church organized in Scotland. Up to May 17, 1840, the following named individuals (80 in all) had been baptized by Elders Mulliner and Wright in Scotland:

On May 18, 1840, Elders Pratt and Mulliner proceeded to Edinburgh to introduce the fulness of the Gospel in that city. They hired a hall for six months, and in the evening of the 24th Bro. Pratt preached the first public discourse in that city. The preaching done previous to this by Elders Mulliner and Wright was done in private houses. Soon afterward they began to baptize; and before autumn a conference, called the Edinburgh Conference and containing several branches, was organized by Elder Pratt at Edinburgh. While laboring in that city Elder Pratt lived with Elder Mulliner's parents, who were among the number baptized.

On May 26th Elder Reuben Hedlock, agreeable to the desires of Elder Pratt, arrived in Paisley, where he found Elder Alexander Wright engaged in the ministry alone, Bro. Mulliner having left the city to accompany Elder Pratt to Edinburgh. Elder Hedlock writes:

"The spirit of inqury was very general in this place (Paisley) and the adjoining villages. Many came to hear. Some of the preachers said we were not worth minding when we first began to preach, but soon their hearers began to leave them: then they began to sound the tocsin of war; the people were exhorted not to come and hear us. A master in a cotton mill threatened to turn out of his employment any of his work people who went to hear us, but the truth fastened on the hearts of the people with such power that many were determined to sacrifice all things for the sake of it. I found in Paisley and the adjoining villages about sixty-five members of the Church. I commenced preaching in this region in company with Elder A. Wright, who is a faithful laborer in the Gospel, until about the last of August, when he left me alone, and went into Banffshire, in the north of Scotland. I organized the branch of the Church in Bridge-of Weir on the 6th of June, consisting of 27 members, including at this time the brethren in Johnstone. Feeling led by the spirit to preach in the city of Glasgow, I went into the city on the 12th of June to procure a place to preach in. I first went to the house of Mr. John McAuley, who received me very kindly, and assisted me to look for a place to preach in. After looking at several places, we finally agreed for the large hall in the Anderson University. I told the trustees I had no means to pay for the hall only what I collected at the door; I was a stranger, and could not give them security, but if they would let me have the hall I would pledge my word that they should have their rent; this they did, though it was the first time they had let it on such conditions. Having procured a place to preach in, I put up bills through the city that an angel of God had appeared and restored the everlasting Gospel again to the earth. This excited the curiosity of about one hundred people to come and hear. After the first Sabbath my hearers dwindled to about twenty in number, but having agreed for the hall for five months I was determined to preach my time out, If I had only two hearers. I soon began to baptize."

At the General Conference held in Manchester, England, July 6, 1840, 5 branches, 6 Elders, 5 Priests, 3 Teachers, 2 Deacons and 106 members were represented by Elder Mulliner in the regions round about Glasgow. At that conference Elder Hiram Clark was appointed on a mission to Scotland to assist Reuben Hedlock.

Elder Clark arrived in Scotland in July and immediately commenced preaching, together with Elder Hedlock, on Glasgow Green and other places, also baptizing some who were ready to render obedience to the truth. Elder Clark preached in Glasgow, Paisley, Bridge-of-Weir and other places, and having finished his labors in Scotland he sailed from Glasgow, Sept. 2, 1840, on board the steamship Archilles, together with Elder Walter Crane, wife and child, of Glasgow, and Sister Isabel Begg, of Paisley, who started on their journey to the gathering place of the Saints in America, being the first Saints who emigrated from Scotland.

In the meantime Elder Mulliner continued his labors with Apostle Pratt in Edinburgh, suffering part of the time from ague. He also visited his relatives, a number of whom joined the Church. He finally returned to Paisley, where he and Elders Reuben Hedlock, Hiram Clark and Alexander Wright, attended a conference on the 1st of August.

After this conference Elder Mulliner continued his labors in Paisley and surrounding country, preaching baptizing and exhorting the Saints to faithfulness. The power of God was manifested on various occasions and in different ways, which strengthened the Saints in the faith. A young sister by the name of Beaumon, who had suffered from what was termed a leprosy in her ears for fifteen years, was miraculously healed under the administration of Elders Mulliner and David Wilkie.

Elder Mulliner left Glasgow on his return to America, Oct. 2, 1840, having performed a good mission.

Elder Reuben Hedlock, who in the meantime had continued his labors in Glasgow and vicinity, organized a branch of the Church, numbering 12 members, in that city, Aug. 8, 1840. After this he commenced preaching in Greenock, 23 miles from Glasgow, where he baptized two, but in consequence of ill health he was obliged to confine his labors to Glasgow, occasionally visiting the other branches in the neighborhood.

At the General Conference held at Manchester, England, Oct. 6, 1840, Elder Mulliner represented 8 Elders 7 Priests, 5 Teachers, 3 Deacons and 193 members in the Glasgow Conference (including Glasgow and the regions round about), and Orson Pratt represented 2 Priests and 43 members in the Edinburgh Conference.

Orson Pratt wrote to the editor of the Millenial Star, Oct. 17, 1840, as follows: "The work is progressing slowly in Edinburgh. Some are baptized every week. The Church here numbers 74 members * * *. We preach about seven times on every Sabbath in the streets. When the weather will permit, large congregations gather round us eager to hear. During our last three meetings in the street we disposed of something like eighty printed addresses."

During the following winter, through the labors of Elder Pratt and fellow-missionaries, the Church in Edinburgh and vicinity increased to over two hundred members.

After attending the October Conference at Manchester, England, Elder Hedlock returned to his field of labor in Scotland. On Jan. 31, 1841, he organized a branch of the Church in Greenock, where subsequently Elder Speakman and others continued the work successfully.

At the General Conference held in Manchester, April 6, 1841, Reuben Hedlock represented six branches of the Church, namely, Glasgow with 94 members; Paisley with 115 members; Bridge-of-Weir with 62 members; Johnstone with 44 members; Greenock with 31 members; and Thorney Bank with 18 members – or a total in the Glasgow Conference of 12 Elders, 15 Priests, 13 Teachers, 11 Deacons and 317 members. Total, 368. Elder Pratt also represented 6 Elders, 9 Priests, 6 Teachers, 2 Deacons and 203 members (total 226) in the Edinburgh Conference. At that conference Elder John McAuley was appointed to preside over the Glasgow Conference, instead of Reuben Hedlock, who had been released to return to his home in America, and Geo. D. Watt was appointed President of the Edinburgh Conference.

SAMUEL MULLINER was born in Haddington, East Lothian, Scotland, Jan. 15, 1809. He spent his boyhood days at Dunbar, where he also learned the shoemaker's trade. He married Catherine Nisbet Dec. 4, 1830, and shortly afterward decided to emigrate to Australia, but finding himself short of means, he changed his plans and emigrated to America in 1832, settling near the city of Toronto, in Canada, where he first heard the fulness of the Gospel proclaimed, and was baptized by Theodore Turley Sept. 10, 1837, together with his wife. In the following spring he started with his family for Missouri and arrived in Springfield, Ill., on his way thither, July 30, 1838. There his family remained while he performed his mission to Scotland. Owing to the temporary location of a number of families from Kirtland, Ohio, in 1838, a branch of the Church was organized at Springfield, Nov. 4, 1838, in which Elder Mulliner officiated as a Teacher. Later, a Stake of Zion was organized there. Bro. Mulliner was ordained to the office of an Elder March 10, 1839, and to that of a Seventy May 6, 1839. On the latter date he was advised to prepare for a foreign mission, which he did and left his family at Springfield, July 16, 1839, and started in company with an Elder Snider for New York, where they arrived Aug. 10th. After preaching in the neighborhood of that city and having made a visit to Kirtland, Ohio, he sailed from New York, in company with Elders Hiram Clark and Alexander Wright, Nov. 6, 1839. They arrived in Liverpool, England, Dec. 3rd. On the 7th they started for Preston, where they arrived on the 8th. There they spent about ten days very pleasantly with Willard Richards and the Saints. On the evening of Dec. 19th, Elders Mulliner and Wright started for Scotland, and arrived at Glasgow on the 20th. After a successful mission Elder Mulliner took an affectionate leave of the Saints in Scotland and sailed from Glasgow Oct. 2, 1840, on his way back to America. After visiting among the Saints at Liverpool, he attended a General Conference at Manchester and then engaged passage for a small company of Saints from Scotland on board the ship Isaac Newton, which sailed from Liverpool on the 15th. This was the first company of emigrants who went by way of New Orleans, where the company arrived Dec. 2nd, after a pleasant voyage of 48½ days. For years afterwards the favorite route of emigration from Great Britain to Nauvoo, Ill., was via New Orleans. Elder Mulliner's little company of Scotch Saints continued their travel from New Orleans by steamboat up the Mississippi River to St. Louis, Mo., where Elder Mulliner left the company and traveled by stage to Springfield, Ill., where he was again united with his family on Dec. 19, 1840. Some time after his return home Elder Mulliner removed with his family to Nauvoo Ill., from which place he was sent on a mission in November, 1842. In crossing the Lake from Chicago to Buffalo, a terrible storm came up which wrecked nearly every vessel on the Lake except the one Elder Mulliner and a fellow-missionary (James Houston) was on. In parting with the captain of the vessel (Mr. Walker) at Buffalo, Elder Mulliner made him a present of some Church books and thanked him for bringing him safe across. The captain replied with emphasis: "Elder Mulliner, don't thank me; it is I who am under obligation to you for a safe voyage, for I am fully convinced that had it not been for you Mormon Elders being on board, the ship would have gone to the bottom. And I wish you, when you get back home, to tell your brethren that if any of your Elders wish to cross these lakes, let them enquire for Captain Walker, and they shall have a free passage." From Buffalo the missionaries walked to Lewiston, on the Niagara River, where they commenced preaching and baptizing. Elder Mulliner organized a branch at Cambria, Niagara Co., N. Y., April 27, 1843. Among those baptized by him in that part of the country was Geo. A. Neal, a wealthy farmer, and others, who afterward became known as faithful members of the Church. He also crossed the river into Canada and preached at St. Catherine, where the people became so interested in the principles he advocated that they offered to build him a chapel, send for his family and pay him a salary, if he would consent to settle down and remain with them to preach; provided, however, that he would agree not to say anything about Joseph Smith and the "Golden Bible." From this important mission Elder Mulliner returned to Nauvoo, arriving there July 2, 1843, having traveled all the way from Cambria, N. Y., in 24 days with a light horse and buggy. Soon afterwards he located as a shoemaker at Monmouth, Warren Co., Ill., where he remained doing good business until the following spring, when he returned to Nauvoo. At the October Conference, 1845, he was called to act as one of the Presidents of the 12th quorum of Seventies, and subsequently received his endowments in the Nauvoo Temple. In 1846, at the time of the exodus, he prepared an outfit with which to travel west, but the authorities of the Church asked him to remain a little longer and let some one else have the use of his outfit. Elder Mulliner readily consented to do this, returned to Monmouth, where he during the following winter earned another outfit, with which he traveled to Winter Quarters in the spring of 1847. There he was asked a second time to part with his animals and wagons for the benefit of others, which he did as willingly as the first time. He then took his family to Savannah, Mo., where he remained one year and then started for the valley once more. In passing through Kanesville, he met Apostle Orson Hyde who desired him to remain with him. Immediately Elder Mulliner bought a house at Kanesville, left his teams and wagons at Bro. Hyde's disposal, and went to work to earn another outfit to go west the next year, but when the spring of 1849 came, Elder Mulliner was sent on a business mission to the East, from which, however, he returned the same year; and in 1850, having earned another good outfit to cross the plains with, he came on to Great Salt Lake Valley with his family. He bought a lot in G. S. L. City for $500—the lot now occupied by Walker Brothers' Store and adjacent buildings—started a tannery and shoe shop and built a comfortable dwelling house. In 1858, during the time of the move, he bought a mill at American Fork, and also built a mill on Spring Creek, between that town and Lehi, where he resided until quite recently. A few years ago he removed part of his family to Orderville, Kane Co., where he spent some two years, and then returned to Utah County. He now lives a retired life with his children at Lehi, Utah Co.

JOSEPH SMITH, THE PROPHET

Compiled in part from the history of Joseph Smith, published in the Millennial Star, and from Geo. Q. Cannon's writings about Joseph, the Prophet, as published in the Juvenile Instructor.

CHAPTER 1.

Parentage of Joseph Smith.—Early education.—Religious impressions.—First vision.—Visit of the Angel Moroni.—Received the records with the Urim and Thummim and the Breastplate.

Joseph Smith, the great Prophet and Seer of the Nineteenth Century, was the fourth child of Joseph Smith and Lucy Mack, and was born in Sharon, Windsor County, Vermont, Dec. 23, 1805. His parents (See Joseph Smith, sen., page 89) were good and honest people and taught their children to be moral, truthful and industrious. They also instructed them about God and religion, so far as their own knowledge went in this direction, but as their means were very limited, they were not able to give their children more than a common school education. The advantages which Joseph had for acquiring scientific knowledge were thus exceedingly small, being limited to a slight acquaintance with two or three of the common branches of learning. He could read without difficulty and write a very imperfect hand; and he also had a very limited understanding of the elementary rules of arithmetic. These were his only scholastic attainments; while the rest of those branches so universally taught in the common schools throughout the United States were entirely unknown to him.

When he was about seven years old, he came near losing his leg through a fever sore, but by opening the leg, and extracting several pieces of affected bone, amputation was avoided. In this excruciating operation he exhibited that courage which, united with tender feeling, always marks the character of the great and good. In 1816, Joseph being then about ten years old, his parents removed with their family from Vermont to Palmyra, Ontario (now Wayne) County, New York. A few years later they removed to Manchester, in the same county.

"Some time in the second year after our removal to Manchester," writes Joseph, "there was in the place where we lived an unusual excitement on the subject of religion. It commenced with the Methodists, but soon became general among all the sects in that region of country; indeed the whole district of country seemed affected by it, and great multitudes united themselves to the different religious parties, which created no small stir and division amongst the people, some crying, 'Lo here,' and some, 'Lo there'; some were contending for the Methodist faith, some for the Presbyterian, and some for the Baptist. For notwithstanding the great love which the converts to these different faiths expressed at the time of their conversion, and the great zeal manifested by the respective clergy, who were active in getting up and promoting this extraordinary scene of religious feeling, in order to have everybody converted, as they were pleased to call it, let them join what sect they pleased—yet when the converts began to file off, some to one party, and some to another, it was seen that the seemingly good feelings of both the priests and the converts were more pretended than real, for a scene of great confusion and bad feeling ensued — priest contending against priest, and convert against convert, so that all the good feelings one for another, if they ever had any, were entirely lost in a strife of words, and a contest about opinions..

"I was at this time in my fifteenth year. My father's family was proselyted to the Presbyterian faith, and four of them joined that church, namely, my mother, my brothers Hyrum and Samuel Harrison, and my sister Sophronia.

"During this time of great excitement, my mind was called up to serious reflection and great uneasiness; but though my feelings were deep and often pungent, still I kept myself aloof from all these parties, though I attended their several meetings as often as occasion would permit; but in process of time my mind became somewhat partial to the Methodist sect, and I felt some desire to be united with them, but so great was the confusion and strife among the different denominations, that it was impossible for a person, young as I was, and so unacquainted with men and things, to come to any certain conclusion who was right, and who was wrong. My mind at different times was greatly excited, the cry and tumult was so great and incessant. The Presbyterians were most decided against the Baptists and Methodists, and used all the powers of both reason or sophistry to prove their errors, or, at least, to make the people think they were in error. On the other hand the Baptists and Methodists, in their turn, were equally zealous in endeavoring to establish their own tenets and disprove all others.

"In the midst of this war of words and tumult of opinions, I often said to myself, What is to be done? Who of all these parties are right? Or, are they all wrong together? If any one of them be right, which is it, and how shall I know it?

"While I was laboring under the extreme difficulties, caused by the contests of these parties of religionists, I was one day reading the Epistle of James, first chapter, and fifth verse, which reads, 'If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, that giveth unto all men liberally and upbraideth not, and it shall be given him.' Never did any passage of Scripture come with more power to the heart of man than this did at this time to mine. It seemed to enter with great force into every feeling of my heart. I reflected on it again and again, knowing that if any person needed wisdom from God, I did; for how to act I did not know, and unless I could get more wisdom than I then had, I would never know; for the teachers of religion of the different sects understood the same passage so differently as to destroy all confidence in settling the question by an appeal to the Bible. At length I came to the conclusion that I must either remain in darkness and confusion, or else I must do as James directs, that is, ask of God. I at length came to the determination to ask of God, concluding that if he gave wisdom to them that lacked wisdom, and would give liberally and not upbraid, I might venture. So, in accordance with this my determination to ask of God, I retired to the woods to make the attempt. It was on the morning of a beautiful, clear day, early in the spring of eighteen hundred and twenty. It was the first time in my life that I had made such an attempt, for amidst all my anxieties I had never as yet made the attempt to pray vocally.

"After I had retired into the place where I had previously designed to go, having looked around me and finding myself alone, I kneeled down and began to offer up the desires of my heart to God. I had scarcely done so, when immediately I was seized upon by some power which entirely overcame me, and had such astonishing influence over me as to bind my tongue so that I could not speak. Thick darkness gathered around me, and it seemed to me for a time as if I were doomed to sudden destruction. But, exerting all my powers to call upon God to deliver me out of the power of this enemy which had seized upon me, and at the very moment when I was ready to sink into despair and abandon myself to destruction—not ot an imaginary ruin, but to the power of some actual being from the unseen world, who had such marvelous power as I had never before felt in any being—just at this moment of great alarm, I saw a pillar of light exactly over my head, above the brightness of the sun, which descended gradually until it fell upon me. It no sooner appeared than I found myself delivered from the enemy which held me bound. When the light rested upon me, I saw two personages, whose brightness and glory defy all description, standing above me in the air. One of them spake unto me, calling me by name, and said (pointing to the other), THIS IS MY BELOVED SON, HEAR HIM.

"My object in going to inquire of the Lord was to know which of all the sects was right, that I might know which to join. No sooner, therefore, did I get possession of myself, so as to be able to speak, than I asked the personages who stood above me in the light, which of all the sects was right (for at this time it had never entered into my heart that all were wrong), and which I should join. I was answered that I must join none of them, for they were all wrong, and the personages who addressed me said that all their creeds were an abomination in his sight; that those professors were all corrupt; that: 'They draw near to me with their lips, but their hearts are far from me; they teach for doctrine the comandments of men, having a form of godliness, but they deny the power thereof.'"

The Holy Being again forbade Joseph to join any of these churches, and he promised that the true and everlasting gospel should be revealed to him at some future time. Joseph continues:

"Many other things did he (the Christ) say unto me which I cannot write at this time. When I came to myself again, I found myself lying on my back, looking up into heaven.

"Some few days after I had this vision, I happened to be in company with one of the Methodist preachers, who was very active in the before mentioned religious excitement, and conversing with him on the subject of religion, I took occasion to give him an account of the vision which I had had. I was greatly surprised at his behavior; he treated my communication not only lightly, but with great contempt, saying it was all of the devil, that there were no such things as visions or revelations in these days; that all such things had ceased with the Apostles, and that there never would be any more of them.

"I soon found, however, that my telling the story had excited a great deal of prejudice against me among professors of religion, and was the cause of great persecution, which continued to increase; and though I was an obscure boy, only between fourteen and fifteen years of age, and my circumstances in life such as to make a boy of no consequence in the world, yet men of high standing would take notice sufficient to excite the public mind against me, and create a bitter persecution, and this was common among all the sects; all united to persecute me.

"It has often caused me serious reflections, both then and since, how very strange it was that an obscure boy, of a little over fourteen years of age, and one, too, who was doomed to the necessity of obtaining a scanty maintenance by his daily labor, should be thought a character of sufficient importance to attract the attention of the great ones of the most popular sects of the day, so as to create in them a spirit of the most bitter persecution and reviling. But strange or not, so it was, and was often cause of great sorrow to myself. However, it was, nevertheless, a fact, that I had had a vision. I have thought since, that I felt much like Paul when he made his defense before King Agrippa, and related the account of the vision he had when he saw a light and heard a voice, but still there were but few who believed him; some said he was dishonest, others said he was mad, and he was ridiculed and reviled; but all this did not destroy the reality of his vision. He had seen a vision, he knew he had, and all the persecution under heaven could not make it otherwise; and though they should persecute him unto death, yet he knew, and would know unto his latest breath, that he had both seen a light, and heard a voice speaking to him, and all the world could not make him think or believe otherwise.

"So it was with me; I had actually seen a light, and in the midst of that light I saw two personages, and they did in reality speak unto me; and though I was hated and persecuted for saying that I had seen a vision, yet it was true; and while they were persecuting me, reviling me and speaking all manner of evil against me, falsely, for so saying, I was led to say in my heart, Why persecute me for telling the truth? I have actually seen a vision, and who am I that can withstand God? Or why does the world think to make me deny what I have actually seen? For I had seen a vision. I knew it, and I knew that God knew it, and I could not deny it, neither dare I do it, at least I knew that by so doing I would offend God and come under condemnation.

"I had now got my mind satisfied so far as the sectarian world was concerned, that it was not my duty to join with any of them, but continue as I was until further directed; I had found the testimony of James to be true, that a man who lacked wisdom might ask of God, and obtain and not be upbraided. I continued to pursue my common avocations in life until the twenty-first of September, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-three, all the time suffering severe persecution at the hands of all classes of men, both religious and irreligious, because I continued to affirm that I had seen a vision.

"During the space of time which intervened between the time I had the vision and the year eighteen hundred and twenty-three (having been forbidden to join any of the religious sects of the day, and being of very tender years, and persecuted by those who ought to have been my friends, and to have treated me kindly, and if they supposed me to be deluded to have endeavored, in a proper and affectionate manner, to have reclaimed me), I was left to all kinds of temptations, and mingling with all kinds of society, I frequently fell into many foolish errors, and displayed the weakness of youth, and the corruption of human nature, which I am sorry to say led me into divers temptations, to the gratification of many appetites offensive in the sight of God. In consequence of these things I often felt condemned for my weakness and imperfections.

"On the evening of the above mentioned twenty-first of September, after I had retired to my bed for the night, I betook myself to prayer and supplication to Almighty God, for forgiveness of all my sins and follies, and also for a manifestation to me, that I might know of my state and standing before him; for I had full confidence in obtaining a divine manifestation, as I had previously had one.

"While I was thus in the act of calling upon God, I discovered a light appearing in the room, which continued to increase until the room was lighter than at noonday, when immediately a personage appeared at my bedside, standing in the air, for his feet did not touch the floor. He had on a loose robe of most exquisite whiteness. It was a whiteness beyond anything earthly I had ever seen; nor do I believe that any earthly thing could be made to appear so exceedingly white and brilliant; his hands were naked, and his arms also, a little above the wrist; so, also, were his feet naked, as were his legs, a little above the ankles. His head and neck were also bare. I could discover that he had no other clothing on but this robe, as it was open so that I could see into his bosom.

"Not only was his robe exceedingly white, but his whole person was glorious beyond description, and his countenance truly like lightning. The room was exceedingly light, but not so very bright as immediately around his person. When I first looked upon him I was afraid, but the fear soon left me. He called me by name and said unto me that he was a messenger sent from the presence of God to me, and that his name was Moroni; that God had a work for me to do, and that my name should be had for good and evil among all nations, kindreds, and tongues; or that it should be both good and evil spoken of among all people. He said there was a book deposited, written upon gold plates, giving an account of the former inhabitants of this continent, and the source from whence they sprang. He also said that the fulness of the everlasting gospel was contained in it, as delivered by the Savior to the ancient inhabitants. Also, that there were two stones in silver bows (and these stones, fastened to a breastplate, constituted what is called the Urim and Thummim) deposited with the plates, and the possession and use of these stones was what constituted Seers in ancient or former times, and that God had prepared them for the purpose of translating the book.

"After telling me these things, he commenced quoting the prophecies of the Old Testament. He first quoted part of the third chapter of Malachi, and he quoted also the fourth or last chapter of the same prophecy, though with a little variation from the way it reads in our Bibles. Instead of quoting the first verse as it reads in our books, he quoted it thus: 'For behold, the day cometh that shall burn as an oven, and all the proud, yea, and all that do wickedly shall burn as stubble, for they that come shall burn them, saith the Lord of Hosts, that it shall leave them neither root nor branch.' And again, he quoted the fifth verse thus: 'Behold, I will reveal unto you the Priesthood, by the hand of Elijah the Prophet, before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord.' He also quoted the next verse differently: 'And he shall plant in the hearts of the children the promises made to the fathers, and the hearts of the children shall turn to their fathers; if it were not so, the whole earth would be utterly wasted at his coming.'

"In addition to these, he quoted the eleventh chapter of Isaiah, saying that it was about to be fulfilled. He quoted, also, the third chapter of Acts, twenty-second and twenty-third verses, precisely as they stand in our New Testament. He said that that Prophet was Christ, but the day had not yet come when they who would not hear his voice should be cut off from among the people, but soon would come.

"He also quoted the second chapter of Joel, from the twenty-eighth to the last verse. He also said that this was not yet fulfilled, but was soon to be. And he further stated that the fulness of the Gentiles was soon to come in. He quoted many other passages of Scripture, and offered many explanations which cannot be mentioned here. Again, he told me that when I got those plates of which he had spoken (for the time that they should be obtained was not yet fulfilled), I should not show them to any person, neither the breastplate with the Urim and Thummim, only to those to whom I should be commanded to show them; if I did, I should be destroyed. While he was conversing with me about the plates, the vision was opened to my mind that I could see the place where the plates were deposited, and that so clearly and distinctly, that I knew the place again when I visited it.

"After this communication, I saw the light in the room begin to gather immediately around the person of him who had been speaking to me, and it continued to do so, until the room was again left dark, except just around him, when instantly I saw, as it were, a conduit open right up into heaven, and he ascended until he entirely disappeared, and the room was left as it had been before this heavenly light had made its appearance.

"I lay musing on the singularity of the scene, and marvelling greatly at what had been told me by this extraordinary messenger, when, in the midst of my meditation, I suddenly discovered that my room was again beginning to get lighted, and in an instant, as it were, the same heavenly messenger was again by my bedside. He commenced, and again related the very same things which he had done at his first visit, without the least variation, which having done, he informed me of great judgments which were coming upon the earth, with great desolations by famine, sword, and pestilence, and that these grievous judgments would soon come on the earth in this generation. Having related these things, he again ascended as he had done before.

"By this time, so deep were the impressions made on my mind, that sleep had fled from my eyes, and I lay overwhelmed in astonishment at what I had both seen and heard; but what was my surprise when again I beheld the same messenger at my bedside, and heard him rehearse or repeat over again to me the same things as before, and added a caution to me, telling me that Satan would try to tempt me (in consequence of the indigent circumstances of my father's family) to get the plates for the purpose of getting rich. This he forbade me, saying that I must have no other object in view in getting the plates but to glorify God, and must not be influenced by any other motive but that of building his kingdom, otherwise I could not get them. After this third visit, he again ascended into heaven as before, and I was again left to ponder on the strangeness of what I had just experienced, when almost immediately after the heavenly messenger had ascended from me the third time, the cock crew, and I found that day was approaching, so that our interviews must have occupied the whole of that night. I shortly after arose from my bed, and, as usual, went to the necessary labors of the day, but, in attempting to labor as at other times, I found my strength so exhausted as rendered me entirely unable. My father, who was laboring along with me, discovered something to be wrong with me, and told me to go home. I started with the intention of going to the house, but, in attempting to cross the fence out of the field where we were, my strength entirely failed me, and I fell helpless on the ground, and for a time was quite unconscious of anything. The first thing that I can recollect, was a voice speaking unto me calling me by name; I looked up and beheld the same messenger standing over my head, surrounded by light, as before. He then again related unto me all that he had related to me the previous night, and commanded me to go to my father and tell him of the vision and commandments which I had received.

"I obeyed, I returned back to my father in the field and rehearsed the whole matter to him. He replied to me that it was of God, and to go and do as commanded by the messenger. I left the field and went to the place where the messenger had told me the plates were deposited, and owing to the dinstinctness of the vision which I had had concerning it, I knew the place the instant I arrived there."

Convenient to the village of Manchester, and about four miles from Palmyra, Wayne County, in the western part of the State of New York, stands a hill of considerable size, and the most elevated of any in the neighborhood. This hill was called Cumorah by the Nephites and Ramah by the Jaredites. Since the records were taken from the hill, the people in the neighborhood have named it "Mormon Hill." On the west side of this hill, not far from the top, under a stone of considerable size, lay the plates, deposited in a box, which was made of square flat stones, all carefully cemented together to prevent the moisture from entering. This box was sufficiently large to admit a breastplate, such as was used by the ancients to defend the chest or other parts of the body from the arrows and weapons of enemies. In the bottom of the box were laid two stones crossways, upon which lay the "plates and the other things with them. While the top stone, covering the box, was flat underneath, it was thick and rounding in the middle on the upper side, and thinner toward the edges, so that the middle part of it was visible above the ground, when Joseph first visited the place, but the edges all around were covered with earth. By this it is plainly seen that however deep the box might have been placed at first, the time had been sufficient to wear the earth, so that it was easily discovered when once directed, and yet not enough to make a perceivable difference to the passer by." Joseph removed the earth, and by the use of a lever, which he inserted under the edge of the stone, he raised it with but little exertion, "and," writes the Prophet, "I looked in and there, indeed, did I behold the plates, the Urim and Thummim and the breastplate, as stated by the messenger."

While viewing and contemplating this sacred treasure with wonder and astonishment, the angel of the Lord, who had previously visited him, again stood in his presence, and his soul was again enlightened as it had been the evening before. He was filled with the Holy Ghost; the heavens were opened, and the glory of the Lord shone round about and rested upon him. While he thus stood gazing and admiring, the angel said, "Look!" And as he thus spake Joseph beheld the prince of darkness, surrounded by his innumerable train of associates. All this passed before him, and the heavenly messenger said: "All this is shown, the good and the evil, the holy and impure, the glory of God and the power of darkness, that you may know hereafter the two powers and never be influenced or overcome by the wicked one. Behold, whatsoever entices and leads to good and to do good, is of God, and whatsoever does not is of that wicked one; it is he that filleth the hearts of men with evil, to walk in darkness and blaspheme God; and you may learn from henceforth, that his ways are to destruction, but the way of holiness is peace and rest. You cannot at this time obtain this record; for the commandment of God is strict, and if ever these sacred things are obtained, it must be by prayer and faithfulness in obeying the Lord. They are not deposited here for the sake of accumulating gain and wealth for the glory of this world: they were sealed by the prayer of faith, and because of the knowledge which they contain; they are of no worth among the children of men, only for their knowledge. On them is contained the fulness of the gospel of Jesus Christ, as it was given to his people on this land, and when it shall be brought forth by the power of God it shall be carried to the Gentiles, of whom many will receive it, and after will the seed of Israel be brought into the fold of their Redeemer by obeying it also. Those who kept the commandments of the Lord on this land, desired this at his hand, and through the prayer of faith obtained the promise, that if their descendants should transgress and fall away, a record should be kept, and in the last days come to their children. These things are sacred, and must be kept so, for the promise of the Lord concerning them must be fulfilled. No man can obtain them if his heart is impure, because they contain that which is sacred. * * * By them will the Lord work a great and marvelous work; the wisdom of the wise shall become as nought, and the understanding of the prudent shall be hid, and because the power of God shall be displayed, those who profess to know the truth but walk in deceit, shall tremble with anger; but with signs and with wonders, with gifts and with healings, with the manifestations of the power of God, and with the Holy Ghost, shall the hearts of the faithful be comforted. You have now beheld the power of God manifested and the power of Satan: you see that there is nothing desirable in the works of darkness; that they can not bring happiness; that those who are overcome therewith are miserable, while on the other hand the righteous are blessed with a place in the kingdom of God, where joy unspeakable surrounds them. There they rest beyond the power of the enemy of truth, where no evil can disturb them. The glory of God crowns them, and they continually feast upon his goodness and enjoy his smiles.

"Behold, notwithstanding you have seen this great display of power, by which you may ever be able to detect the evil one, yet I give unto you another sign, and when it comes to pass, then know that the Lord is God, and that he will fulfill his purposes, and that the knowledge which this record contains will go to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people under the whole heaven. This is the sign: when these things begin to be known, that is, when it is known that the Lord has shown you these things, the workers of iniquity will seek your overthrow; they will circulate falsehoods to destroy your reputation, and also will seek to take your life; but remember this, if you are faithful, and shall hereafter continue to keep the commandments of the Lord, you shall be preserved to bring these things forth; for in due time he will give you a commandment to come and take them. When they are interpreted, the Lord will give the holy Priesthood to some, and they shall begin to proclaim this gospel and baptize by water, and after that they shall have power to give the Holy Ghost by the laying on of hands. Then will persecution rage more and more; for the iniquities of men shall be revealed, and those who are not built upon the rock will seek to overthrow the Church; but it will increase the more it is opposed, and spread further and further, increasing in knowledge till they shall be sanctified and receive an inheritance where the glory of God will rest upon them; and when this takes place, and all things are prepared, the ten tribes of Israel will be revealed in the north country, whither they have been for a long season; and when this is fulfilled will be brought to pass that saying of the Prophet: 'And the Redeemer shall come to Zion, and unto them that turn from transgression in Jacob, saith the Lord.' But notwithstanding the workers of iniquity shall seek your destruction, the arm of the Lord will be extended, and you will be borne off conqueror, if you keep all his commandments.

"Your name shall be known among the nations, for the work which the Lord will perform by your hands shall cause the righteous to rejoice and the wicked to rage; with the one it shall be had in honor, and with the other in reproach; yet, with these it shall be a terror because of the great and marvelous work which shall follow the coming forth of this fulness of the gospel. Now, go thy way, remember what God has done for thee, and be diligent in keeping his commandments, and he will deliver thee from temptations and all the arts and devices of the wicked one. Forget not to pray, that thy mind may become strong, that when he shall manifest unto thee, thou mayest have power to escape the evil, and obtain these precious things."

Many more instructions were given Joseph by the mouth of the angel, but the most important items are contained in the foregoing. Joseph made an attempt to take the plates out of the box in which they were deposited. but the angel forbade him, and informed him again that the time for bringing them forth had not yet arrived, but that four years must pass away before he could obtain them. He was further commanded to come to the same place precisely in one year from that time, and he (the messenger) would then meet him there. And this he should continue to do every year until the time came for him to obtain the plates.

Joseph writes: "Accordingly, as I had been commanded, I went at the end of each year, and at each time I found the same messenger there, and received instruction and intelligence from him at each of our interviews, respecting what the Lord was going to do, and how and in what manner his kingdom was to be conducted in the last days.

"As my father's worldly circumstances were very limited, we were under the necessity of laboring with our hands, hiring out by day's work and otherwise as we could get opportunity; sometimes we were at home and sometimes abroad, and by continued labor were enabled to get a comfortable maintenance.

"In the year 1824, my father's family met with a great affliction, by the death of my eldest brother, Alvin.

"In the month of October, 1825, I hired with an old gentleman, by the name of Josiah Stoal, who lived in Chenango County, State of New York. He had heard something of a silver mine having been opened by the Spaniards, in Harmony, Susquehanna County, State of Pennsylvania, and had, previous to my hiring to him, been digging, in order, if possible, to discover the mine. After I went to live with him he took me with the rest of his hands, to dig for the silver mine, at which I continued to work for nearly a month without success in our undertaking, and finally I prevailed with the old gentleman to cease digging after it. Hence arose the very prevalent story of my having been a money digger.

"During the time that I was thus employed, I was put to board with a Mr. Isaac Hale, of that place; it was there that I first saw my wife (his daughter) Emma Hale. On the 18th of Jan., 1827, we were married while I was yet employed in the service of Mr. Stoal.

"Owing to my continuing to assert that I had seen a vision, persecution still followed me, and my wife's father's family were very much opposed to our being married. I was therefore under the necessity of taking her elsewhere, so we went and were married at the house of Squire Tarbill, in South Bainbridge, Chenango County, New York. Immediately after my marriage, I left Mr. Stoal's and went to my father's and farmed with him that season.

"At length the time arrived for obtaining the plates, the Urim and Thummim, and the breastplate. On the 22nd day of September, 1827, having gone, as usual, at the end of another year, to the place where they were deposited, the same heavenly messenger delivered them up to me with this charge, that I should be responsible for them; that if I should let them go carelessly, or through any neglect of mine, I should be cut off; but that if I would use all my endeavors to preserve them, until he (the messenger) should call for them, they should be protected."

These records were engraved on plates, which had the appearance of gold. Each plate was nearly seven by eight inches in width and length, being not quite as thick as common tin. They were filled on both sides with engravings in Egyptian characters, and bound together in a volume as the leaves of a book, and fastened at one edge with three rings running through the whole. This volume was something near six inches in thickness, a part of which was sealed. The characters or letters upon the unsealed part were small and beautifully engraved. The whole book exhibited many marks of antiquity in its construction, as well as much skill in the art of engraving. With the records was found "a curious instrument, called by the ancients the Urim and Thummim, which consisted of two transparent stones, clear as crystal, set in the two rims of a bow. This instrument was used in ancient times by the seers, and through it they received revelations of things distant, or of things past and future." (See Ex. 28:30. Lev. 8:8. Num. 27:21. Deut. 33:8. 1 Sam. 28:6. Ezra 2:63. Neh. 7:65.)

These holy treasures were buried in the hill Cumorah by Moroni, a Prophet of God, about 420 years after the birth of Christ. He hid them there agreeable to the commandments of God, that they might be preserved from falling into the hands of the wicked; but the Lord had promised that they should come forth in the latter days to enlighten the children of men, and especially the Lamanites. This promise now began to be fulfilled, over fourteen hundred years after it was given to Moroni. The records were written by Mormon, another Prophet of God, and completed by his son Moroni—the same who buried them in the earth centuries before and who delivered them to Joseph Smith. To him, the great Prophet of the Nineteenth Century, it was given, by the gift and power of God, to translate that part of the records which was not sealed into the English language, and which subsequently was published under the name of the Book of Mormon.

In the next chapter we will further describe the circumstances connected with the translation, and only state here that Joseph, after having completed the work which the Lord had entrusted him with, delivered the records back to Moroni, who still has them in charge. The Lord has promised that the sealed part of the records shall, in his own due time, be given to his people in this dispensation, together with other sacred records and instruments of antiquity, the hiding place of which is not yet known.

CHAPTER 2.

Joseph is persecuted on account of the Records. —Removes to Pennsylvania. — Commences translating.—Martin Harris sent to New York with some of the hieroglyphics.—Joseph continues the translation.——Loses the manuscript.—Is visited by Oliver Cowdery.—Both are ordained to the Aaronic Priesthood.—The translation is continued and finished, and the Book of Mormon published.

In the meantime Joseph soon found out the reason why he had received such strict charges to keep the records safe, and why the messenger had said that when he (Joseph) had done what was required of him, he (the messenger) would call for them; for no sooner was it known that Joseph had the records in his possession, than the most strenuous efforts were made to get them away from him; every stratagem that could be invented was resorted to for that purpose. On the very day that he first received the sacred treasure and was going home through the wilderness and fields, he was waylaid by two ruffians, who had secreted themselves for the purpose of robbing him of the records. One of them struck him with a club before he perceived them; but, being a strong man and large in stature, with great exertion he cleared himself from them and ran towards home, being closely pursued until he came near his father's house, when his pursuers, for fear of being detected, turned and fled the other way. The house, in which he lived, was frequently beset by mobs and evil designing persons. Several times he was shot at and very narrowly escaped with his life. Consequently, being continually in danger of being murdered by a gang of abandoned wretches, he at length concluded to leave the place and go to Pennsylvania. He packed up his goods, putting the plates into a barrel of beans, and proceeded on his journey. He had, however, not gone far, before he was overtaken by an officer with a search-warrant, who flattered himself with the idea that he should surely obtain the plates; but after searching very diligently he was sadly disappointed in not finding them. Joseph then drove on, but before he got to his journey's end, he was again overtaken by an officer on the same business, and after ransacking the wagon very carefully, he went his way as much chagrined as the first, at not being able to discover the object of his research. Without any further molestation Joseph pursued his journey, until he arrived in the village of Harmony, near the Susquehanna River, in northern Pennsylvania, where his father-in-law resided.

Soon after his arrival in Pennsylvania in the month of December, 1827, he commenced copying the characters of the plates, and by means of the Urim and Thummim he also translated some of them. Being a poor writer, he was under the necessity of employing a scribe to write the translation as it came from his mouth.

In February, 1828, Martin Harris, a respectable farmer who resided in Palmyra Township, Wayne County, New York, visited Joseph in Pennsylvania. This man, who afterwards became one of the Three Witnesses to the Book of Mormon, had previously befriended Joseph in various ways, and had in one instance made him a present of $50, which enabled him to remove to Pennsylvania. Martin Harris got the characters which Joseph had drawn from the plates and started with them to New York City. When he returned he reported as follows to Joseph:

"I went to the city of New York, and presented the characters which had been translated, with the translation thereof, to Professor Anthon, a gentleman celebrated for his literary attainments. Professor Anthon stated, that the translation was correct, more so than any he had before seen translated from the Egyptian. I then showed him those which were not yet translated, and he said that they were Egyptian, Chaldaic, Assyriac, and Arabic, and he said that they were true characters. He gave me a certificate, certifying to the people of Palmyra that they were true characters, and that the translation of such of them as had been translated was also correct. I took the certificate and put it into my pocket, and was just leaving the house, when Mr. Anthon called me back, and asked me how the young man found out that there were gold plates in the place where he found them. I answered that an angel of God had revealed it unto him.

"He then said to me, 'Let me see that certificate.' I accordingly took it out of my pocket and gave it to him, when he took it and tore it to pieces, saying, that there was no such thing now as ministering of angels, and that if I would bring the plates to him, he would translate them. I informed him that part of the plates were sealed, and that I was forbidden to bring them. He replied, 'I cannot read a sealed book.' I left him and went to Dr. Mitchell, who sanctioned what Professor Anthon had said, respecting both the characters and the translation."

Martin Harris, having returned from New York City, took leave of the Prophet and went to his own home in Palmyra, arranged his affairs and returned again to Pennsylvania for the purpose of assisting the Prophet with the translation. He arrived there about the 12th of April, and commenced writing for Joseph as the latter translated from the plates; thus they employed their time until June 14th, by which time 116 pages of manuscript had been written on foolscap paper. After much importuning on the part of Martin Harris, Joseph finally consented to let him take these 116 pages of manuscript with him home, with permission to show them to certain individuals; but by this means the translation was lost and has not since been recovered. (See page 213.)

"In the meantime," writes Joseph, "while Martin Harris was gone with the writings, I went to visit my father's family, at Manchester. I continued there for a short season, and then returned to my place in Pennsylvania. Immediately after my return home, I was walking out a little distance, when, behold, the former heavenly messenger appeared and handed to me the Urim and Thummim again—for it had been taken from me in consequence of my having wearied the Lord in asking for the privilege of letting Martin Harris take the writings which he lost by transgression."

It was sometime in the month of July, 1828, that the angel again delivered the Urim and Thummim back to Joseph, who forthwith, through that holy instrument, inquired of the Lord and received the first revelation recorded in the Book of Doctrine and Covenants. It was given in Harmony, Susquehanna County, Pennsylvania. (See Doc. & Cov., Sec. 3.)

After receiving this revelation both the plates and the Urim and Thummim were again taken away from Joseph, but only for a few days, at the end of which the messenger once more made Joseph their custodian. Soon afterwards, the Lord revealed unto him His mind and will concerning the lost manuscript. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 10.) Joseph was forbidden to produce anew what he had formerly translated, because of the designs and evil intentions of the wicked who had got the manuscript in their possession, and now, through the temptation of the devil, had undertaken to alter the translation; and if Joseph should bring forth the same words in a new translation, these wicked schemers would produce the first manuscript in its altered state and thus attempt to defame Joseph as an impostor, as they would say that he could not translate the same thing twice alike, and consequently did not possess that divine gift to translate which he professed to have. The Lord, therefore, said it was wisdom not to translate the same account a second time, in order that the wicked might be confounded and their plans and evil designs be overthrown. Instead, Joseph was commanded to translate from the small plates of Nephi. These contained nearly the same account as the first translation, and besides, gave a fuller account of the gospel, which the Lord especially desired to make plain to the children of men. The account on the lost manuscript was a translation from the plates of Lehi mentioned in the Book of Mormon. (1 Nephi, 1: 16, 17.)

Joseph did not immediately continue his work of translation, but labored with his hands on a small farm which he had purchased of his father-in-law, in order to provide for his family. In February, 1829, he was visited by his father from Manchester, and about the same time he received two revelations which constitute the 4th and 5th sections of the Doctrine and Covenants. In the latter Martin Harris was considerably chastened and the Three Witnesses to the Book of Mormon were mentioned for the first time.

On the 5th of April, 1829, Oliver Cowdery came to pay Joseph a visit in Pennsylvania. He had been teaching school in the neighborhood where Joseph's father resided, and had boarded for a season in his house, he (Joseph Smith, sen.) being one of those who sent children to his school. While there the Smith family related to Mr. Cowdery how Joseph had obtained the plates, and he accordingly decided to visit Joseph in order to learn more about them from his own mouth. April 7th, two days after Mr. Cowdery's arrival, Joseph began to translate the Book of Mormon with Oliver Cowdery as scribe. From that time Joseph received numerous revelations concerning the work of the Lord which was commenced, and the fulness of the gospel which the Lord was about to send forth to the nations of the earth. By this means the young Prophet received much light and intelligence which prepared him for the position he afterwards occupied. And as the full meaning of some of these revelations will better be understood when the circumstances under which they were given are known, we will, wherever it may be deemed necessary, explain the incidents which often called them forth, and in some instances where the revelation is immediately connected with the Prophet's life, or the history of the Church, briefly allude to the contents.

Some time after Oliver Cowdery had commenced to write for Joseph, the revelation known as Section 6 of the Doctrine and Covenants was given, and when Joseph and Oliver subsequently, during a conversation, expressed a difference of opinion in regard to what is written about John, the Apostle and Disciple of Jesus, in the New Testament (John 21:22), Joseph inquired of the Lord through the Urim and Thummim and received a revelation, in which they were told that John, according to his own desire, was permitted to live in the flesh until Christ again should come to the earth (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 7).

While continuing the work of translation during the month of April, 1829, Oliver Cowdery became very anxious to have the power to translate bestowed upon him, and in relation to his desire two revelations were given, in the last of which the Lord commanded him to continue his work as Joseph's scribe. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 8 and 9.)

Joseph writes: "We still continued the work of translation, when, in the ensuing month (May, 1829), we on a certain day went into the woods to pray and inquire of the Lord respecting baptism for the remission of sins, that we found mentioned in the translation of the plates. While we were thus employed, praying and calling upon the Lord, a messenger from heaven descended in a cloud of light, and having laid his hands upon us, he ordained us, saying:

" 'Upon you, my fellow servants, in the name of Messiah, I confer the Priesthood of Aaron, which holds the keys of the ministering of angels, and of the gospel of repentance, and of baptism by immersion for the remission of sins; and this shall never be taken again from the earth, until the sons of Levi do offer again an offering unto the Lord in righteousness.'

"He said this Aaronic Priesthood had not the power of laying on of hands for the gift of the Holy Ghost, but that this should be conferred on us hereafter, and he commanded us to go and be baptized, and gave us directions that I should baptize Oliver Cowdery, and afterwards that he should baptize me.

"Accordingly, we went and were baptized, I baptized him first, and afterwards he baptized me, after which I laid my hands upon his head and ordained him to the Aaronic Priesthood; afterwards he laid his hands on me and ordained me to the same Priesthood—for so were we commanded.

"The messenger who visited us on this occasion, and conferred this Priesthood upon us, said that his name was John, the same that is called John the Baptist in the New Testament, and that he acted under the direction of Peter, James and John, who held the keys of the Priesthood of Melchizedek, which Priesthood he said would in due time be conferred on us, and that I should be called the first Elder of the Church, and he (Oliver Cowdery) the second. It was on the 15th day of May, 1829, that we were ordained under the hand of this messenger, and baptized.

"Immediately on our coming up out of the water, after we had been baptized, we experienced great and glorious blessings from our heavenly Father. No sooner had I baptized Oliver Cowdery, than the Holy Ghost fell upon him, and he stood up and prophesied many things which should shortly come to pass. And again, as soon as I had been baptized by him, I also had the spirit of prophecy, when, standing up, I prophesied concerning the rise of this Church, and many other things connected with the Church and this generation of the children of men. We were filled with the Holy Ghost, and rejoiced in the God of our salvation.

"Our minds being now enlightened, we began to have the Scriptures laid open to our understandings, and the true meaning of their more mysterious passages revealed unto us in a manner which we never could attain to previously, nor ever before had thought of. In the meantime we were forced to keep secret the circumstances of having received the Priesthood and our having been baptized, owing to a spirit of persecution which had already manifested itself in the neighborhood. We had been threatened with being mobbed, from time to time, and this, too, by professors of religion. And their intentions of mobbing us were only counteracted by the influence of my wife's father's family (under Divine Providence), who had become friendly to me, and who were opposed to mobs, and willing that I should be allowed to continue the work of translation without interruption; and therefore offered and promised us protection from all unlawful proceedings as far as in them lay.

"After a few days, however, feeling it to be our duty, we commenced to reason out of the Scriptures with our acquaintances and friends, as we happened to meet with them. About this time my brother Samuel H. Smith came to visit us. We informed him what the Lord was about to do for the children of men, and to reason with him out of the Bible. We also showed him that part of the work which we had translated, and labored to persuade him concerning the gospel of Jesus Christ, which was now about to be revealed in its fulness. He was not, however, very easily persuaded of these things, but after much inquiry and explanation he retired to the woods, in order that by secret and fervent prayer he might obtain, of a merciful God, wisdom to enable him to judge for himself. The result was, that he obtained revelation for himself sufficient to convince him of the truth of our assertions to him; and on the fifteenth day of that same month, in which we were baptized and ordained, Oliver Cowdery baptized him; and he returned to his father's house greatly glorifying and praising God, being filled with the Holy Spirit. Not many days afterwards, my brother Hyrum Smith came to us to inquire concerning these things, when, at his earnest request, I inquired of the Lord through the Urim and Thummim, and received for him the following revelation. * * * (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 11.)

"About the same time came an old gentleman to visit us, of whose name I wish to make honorable mention—Mr. Joseph Knight, sen., of Colesville, Broome County, New York, who, having heard of the manner in which we were occupying our time, very kindly and considerately brought us a quantity of provisions, in order that we might not be interrupted in the work of translation by the want of such necessaries of life; and I would just mention here, as in duty bound, that he several times brought us supplies, a distance of at least thirty miles, which enabled us to continue the work which otherwise we must have relinquished for a season. Being very anxious to know his duty as to this work, I inquired of the Lord for him, and obtained the following revelation." (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 12.)

In June, 1829, David Whitmer came to Harmony and desired Joseph and Oliver to go with him to his father's place in Fayette, Seneca County, New York, promising that the family would assist Joseph in his labors. Joseph complied with the invitation and remained with the Whitmers in Fayette until the translation of the Book of Mormon was completed. (See page 206.)

"In the meantime," writes Joseph, "David, John and Peter Whitmer, jun., became our zealous friends and assistants in the work, and being anxious to know their respective duties, and having desired with much earnestness that I should inquire of the Lord concerning them, I did so, through the means of the Urim and Thummim, and obtained for them in succession the following revelations. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 14, 15 and 16.)

"We found the people of Seneca County in general friendly, and disposed to inquire into the truth of these strange matters which now began to be noised abroad; many opened their houses to us, in order that we might have an opportunity of meeting with our friends for the purpose of instruction and explanation. We met with many from time to time who were willing to hear us, and who desired to find out the truth as it is in Christ Jesus, and apparently willing to obey the gospel when once fairly convinced and satisfied in their own minds; and in this same month of June, my brother Hyrum Smith, David Whitmer and Peter Whitmer, jun., were baptized in Seneca Lake, the two former by myself, the latter by Oliver Cowdery. From this time forth many became believers, and some were baptized, whilst we continued to instruct and persuade as many as applied for information.

"In the course of the work of translation, we ascertained that three special witnesses were to be provided by the Lord, to whom he would grant that they should see the plates from which this work (the Book of Mormon) should be translated, and that these witnesses should bear record of the same, as will be found recorded in the Book of Mormon, Ether 5:2-4.

"Almost immediately after we had made this discovery, it occurred to Oliver Cowdery, David Whitmer and the afore-mentioned Martin Harris, who had come to inquire after our progress in the work, that they would have me inquire of the Lord to know if they might not obtain of him to be these three special witnesses, and finally they became so very solicitous, and urged me so much to inquire, that at length I complied, and through the Urim and Thummim I obtained of the Lord for them the following revelation." (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 17.)

Not many days after this revelation was given, Joseph Smith, Oliver Cowdery, David Whitmer and Martin Harris retired into the woods, where an angel of God showed the plates to the Three Witnesses. (See pages 195 and 196.) They also had the privilege of seeing the breastplate, which was in the box with the plates, and the sword of Laban, mentioned in the Book of Mormon (1 Nephi 8: 9.), and the Urim and Thummim. Eight other witnesses, namely, Christian Whitmer, Jacob Whitmer, Peter Whitmer jun., John Whitmer, Hiram Page, Joseph Smith sen., Hyrum Smith and Samuel H. Smith, also gave their testimony, which, together with the testimony of the Three Witnesses, is published in the Book of Mormon. The Eight Witnesses testified that Joseph showed them the plates and that they handled them. These, including Joseph, made twelve men who were witnesses to the Book of Mormon.

Joseph writes: "Meantime, we continued to translate, at intervals, when not necessitated to attend to the numerous inquirers who now began to visit us—some for the sake of finding the truth, others for the purpose of putting hard questions, and trying to confound us. Among the latter class were several learned priests, who generally came for the purpose of disputation; however, the Lord continued to pour out upon us his Holy Spirit, and as often as we had need he gave us in that moment what to say; so that, although unlearned and inexperienced in religious controversy, yet were we able to confound those learned priests of the day, whilst at the same time we were enabled to convince the honest in heart that we had obtained, through the mercy of God, the true and everlasting gospel of Jesus Christ; so that almost daily we administered the ordinance of baptism for the remission of sins to such as believed."

The work of translation being nearly complete, Joseph and Oliver went to Palmyra, Wayne County, New York, and agreed with Mr. Egbert B. Grandin to print five thousand copies of the Book of Mormon for the sum of three thousand dollars. They also secured the copyright.

While Joseph almost continually, during the time he labored on the translation, had been exposed to persecution, the same opposition manifested itself in various forms while the book was in the hands of the printer. People who were avowed enemies of the Prophet, held secret meetings with a view to devise means and plans for the destruction of the manuscript, and they also tried to persuade Mr. Grandin to stop the printing. A certain individual even went so far as to issue a paper, in which he commenced to publish extracts of the Book of Mormon in a mutilated form, mixed with the basest of lies and accusations against Joseph and the origin of the book. Through the copyright, which he had secured, Joseph succeeded in stopping this wicked man in his work, and we will briefly state, that all the plans laid and all the attempts made by the enemies of the work to destroy it, proved unsuccessful, and the first edition of the Book of Mormon, consisting of 5,000 copies, was published in the beginning of the year 1830.

"I wish to mention here," says Joseph, "that the title page of the Book of Mormon is a literal translation, taken from the very last leaf, on the left hand side of the collection or book of plates, which contained the record which has been translated, the language of the whole running the same as all Hebrew writing in general; and that said title page is not by any means a modern composition, either of mine or of any other man's who has lived or does live in this generation. Therefore, in order to correct an error which generally exists concerning it, I give below that part of the title page of the English version of the Book of Mormon which is a genuine and literal translation of the title page of the original Book of Mormon, as recorded on the plates:

THE BOOK OF MORMON

"An account written by the hand of Mormon upon Plates, taken from the Plates of Nephi.

"Wherefore it is an abridgement of the record of the people of Nephi, and also of the Lamanites; written to the Lamanites, who are a remnant of the house of Israel; and also to Jew and Gentile; written by way of commandment and also by the spirit of prophecy and of revelation.

"Written and sealed up, and hid up unto the Lord, that they might not be destroyed—to come forth by the gift and power of God unto the interpretation thereof—sealed by the hand of Moroni, and hid up unto the Lord, to come forth in due time by the way of the Gentile—the interpretation thereof by the gift of God.

"An abridgement taken from the Book of Ether, also, which is a record of the people of Jared, who were scattered at the time the Lord confounded the language of the people when they were building a tower to get to heaven; which is to show unto the remnant of the house of Israel what great things the Lord hath done for their fathers; and that they may know the covenants of the Lord, that they are not cast off forever; and also to the convincing of the Jew and Gentile that Jesus is the Christ, the eternal God, manifesting himself unto all nations. And now, if there are faults, they are the mistakes of men; wherefore condemn not the things of God, that ye may be found spotless at the judgment-seat of Christ.

"The remainder of the title page is of course modern."

The Book of Mormon has since been translated and published in the Danish, Italian, Welsh, French, German, Hawaiian, Swedish and Spanish languages. The translations into the Dutch and Hindustani tongues have not yet been published.

CHAPTER 3.

Restoration of the Melchizedek Priesthood by Peter, James and John.—The Church is organized at Fayette with six members.—The first public sermon.—The first miracle.—The first conference of the Church.—Manifestations of the power of God.—Persecution in Colesville.—Joseph is arrested twice.—Is tried and acquitted.—He again visits Colesville.—False Revelations.—The second conference of the Church.

Joseph continues: "We now became anxious to have that promise realized to us, which the angel that conferred upon us the Aaronic Pristhood had given us, viz., that provided we continued faithful, we should also have the Melchizedek Priesthood, which holds the authority of the laying on of hands for the gift of the Holy Ghost. We had for some time made this matter a subject of humble prayer, and at length we got together in the chamber of Mr. Whitmer's house, in order more particularly to seek of the Lord what we now so earnestly desired; and here, to our unspeakable satisfaction, did we realize the truth of the Savior's promise, 'Ask, and you shall receive; seek and you shall find; knock and it shall be opened unto you; for we had not long been engaged in solemn and fervent prayer, when the word of the Lord came unto us in the chamber, commanding us that I should ordain Oliver Cowdery to be an Elder in the Church of Jesus Christ, and that he also should ordain me to the same office, and then to ordain others as it should be made known unto us from time to time. We were, however, commanded to defer this our ordination until such times as it should be practicable to have our brethren, who had been, and who should be, baptized, assembled together, when we must have their sanction to our thus proceeding to ordain each other, and have them decide by vote whether they were willing to accept us as spiritual teachers or not; when also we were commanded to bless bread and break it with them, and to take wine, bless it, and drink it with them; afterward proceed to ordain each other according to commandment; then call out such men as the Spirit should dictate and ordain them; and then attend to the laying on of hands for the gift of the Holy Ghost, upon all those whom we had previously baptized, doing all things in the name of the Lord."

About the same time (June, 1829) a revelation was given to Joseph Smith, Oliver Cowdery and David Whitmer, in which the nature of their calling to the Priesthood was made known, and it was also revealed to them that twelve Apostles should be called and ordained in this dispensation. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 18.) A short time after this, Joseph and Oliver Cowdery were visited by the Apostles Peter, James and John, who according to the holy order of the Priesthood ordained them to the Apostleship, or the Melchizedek Priesthood. It was, however, not until quite a while afterwards that the fulness of this Priesthood was conferred on other brethren.

By the spirit of revelation and prophesy, the exact day on which they, according to the mind and will of God, should organize his Church on the earth was made known unto them, and many instructions were given them concerning the organization and government of the Church, such as the proper mode of baptism, the administering of the Sacrament, and the duties of the various officers and members, etc. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 20.) This revelation was given in March, 1830, and about the same time Section 19 of the Doctrine and Covenants, a revelation to Martin Harris, was given through the Prophet. Being thus instructed and having had the authority of the holy Priesthood conferred upon them, they were now prepared to organize the Church and only had to wait until the day which the Lord had appointed arrived.

On Tuesday the 6th day of April, 1830, the following named brethren, who had been baptized, assembled in the house of Peter Whitmer sen. in Fayette, Seneca County, New York, viz., Joseph Smith, Oliver Cowdery, Hyrum Smith, Peter Whitmer, jun., Samuel H. Smith and David Whitmer. With these six members the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints was organized on that day.

"Having opened the meeting by solemn prayer to our heavenly Father," writes Joseph, "we proceeded, according to previous commandment, to call on our brethren to know whether they accepted us as their teachers in the things of the kingdom of God, and whether they were satisfied that we should proceed and be organized as a Church according to said commandment which we had received. To these they consented by an unanimous vote. I then laid my hands upon Oliver Cowdery and ordained him an Elder of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; after which he ordained me also to the office of an Elder of said Church. We then took bread, blessed it, and brake it with them; also wine, blessed it, and drank it with them. We then laid our hands on each individual member of the Church present, that they might receive the gift of the Holy Ghost, and be confirmed members of the Church of Christ. The Holy Ghost was poured out upon us to a very great degree—some prophesied, whilst we all praised the Lord, and rejoiced exceedingly. Whilst yet together, I received the following revelation." (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 21.)

Thus was a true and living Church again organized upon the earth, a Church which God could call his own and in which his powers, gifts and blessings could be manifested.

There were at that time a number of persons who desired to unite with the Church without rebaptism, as they had previously been baptized into one of the sects of the day. In consequence of this the following revelation, showing the Lord's will in this regard, was given through the Prophet:

"Behold, I say unto you, that all old covenants have I caused to be done away in this thing, and this is a new and everlasting covenant, even that which was from the beginning. Wherefore, although a man should be baptized a hundred times, it availeth him nothing, for you cannot enter in at the straight gate by the law of Moses, neither by your dead works; for it is because of your dead works that I have caused this last covenant, and this Church to be built up unto me, even as in days of old; wherefore, enter ye in at the gate, as I have commanded, and seek not to counsel your God. Amen."

Oliver Cowdery, Hyrum Smith, Samuel H. Smith and Joseph Knight "being anxious to know of the Lord what might be their respective duties" in relation to the work of God, Joseph inquired of the Lord and received a revelation for them. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 23.)

On Sunday, April 11, 1830, Oliver Cowdery preached the first public discourse delivered by any member of the Church in this dispensation. The meeting was held in the house of Peter Whitmer sen. in Fayette, and was attended by a large number of people. On the same day Hiram Page, Catherine Page, Christian Whitmer, Anne Whitmer, Jacob Whitmer and Elizabeth Whitmer were baptized. Peter Whitmer, sen., Mary Whitmer, Wm. Jolly, Elizabeth Jolly, Vincent Jolly, Richard Z. Peterson and Elizabeth Anne Whitmer were baptized on the 18th. They were baptized by Oliver Cowdery in Seneca Lake.

About this time the first miracle was wrought in the Church by the power of God. About this Joseph writes as follows:

"During this month (April, 1830) I went on a visit to the residence of Mr. Joseph Knight, of Colesville, Broome County, New York, with whom and his family I had been previously acquainted, and whose name I have above mentioned as having been so kind and thoughtful towards us while translating the Book of Mormon. Mr. Knight and his family were Universalists, but were willing to reason with me upon my religious views, and were, as usual, friendly and hospitable. We held several meetings in the neighborhood; we had many friends, and some enemies. Our meetings were well attended, and many began to pray fervently to Almighty God, that he would give them wisdom to understand the truth. Amongst those who attended our meetings regularly was Newel Knight, son of Joseph Knight. He and I had many serious conversations on the important subject of man's eternal salvation; we had got into the habit of praying much at our meetings, and Newell had said that he would try and take up his cross, and pray vocally during meeting; but when we again met together, he rather excused himself. I tried to prevail upon him, making use of the figure, supposing that he should get into a mud-hole, would he not try and help himself out? and that we were willing now to help him out of the mud-hole. He replied, that provided he had got into a mud-hole through carelessness, he would rather wait and get out himself than have others to help him; and so he would wait until he could get into the woods by himself, and there he would pray. Accordingly, he deferred praying until next morning, when he retired into the woods; where, according to his own account afterwards, he made several attempts to pray, but could scarcely do so, feeling that he had not done his duty, but that he should have prayed in the presence of others. He began to feel uneasy, and continued to feel worse both in mind and body, until upon reaching his own house his appearance was such as to alarm his wife very much. He requested her to go and bring me to him. I went and found him suffering very much in his mind, and his body acted upon in a very strange manner. His visage and limbs distorted and twisted in every shape and appearance possible to imagine, and finally he was caught up off the floor of the apartment and tossed about most fearfully.

"His situation was soon made known to his neighbors and relatives, and in a short time as many as eight or nine grown persons had got together to witness the scene. After he had thus suffered for a time, I succeeded in getting hold of him by the hand, when almost immediately he spoke to me, and with a very great earnestness requested of me that I should cast the devil out of him, saying that he knew he was in him, and that he also knew that I could cast him out. I replied, 'If you know that I can, it shall be done;' and then almost unconsciously I rebuked the devil, and commanded him in the name of Jesus Christ to depart from him, when immediately Newel spoke out and said that he saw the devil leave him and vanish from his sight.

"The scene was now entirely changed, for as soon as the devil had departed from our friend, his countenance became natural, his distortions of body ceased, and almost immediately the Spirit of the Lord descended upon him, and the visions of eternity were opened to his view. He afterwards related his experience as follows:

"'I now began to feel a most pleasing sensation resting upon me, and immediately the visions of heaven were opened to my view. I felt myself attracted upward, and remained for some time enwrapt in contemplation, insomuch that I knew not what was going on in the room. By and by I felt some weight pressing upon my shoulder and the side of my head, which served to recall me to a sense of my situation, and I found that the Spirit of the Lord had actually caught me up off the floor, and that my shoulder and head were pressing against the beams.'

"All this was witnessed by many, to their great astonishment and satisfaction, when they saw the devil thus cast out, and the power of God and his Holy Spirit thus made manifest. So soon as consciousness returned, his bodily weakness was such that we were obliged to lay him upon his bed, and wait upon him for some time. As may be expected, such a scene as this contributed much to make believers of those who witnessed it, and, finally, the greater part of them became members of the Church."

Soon after this occurrence Joseph returned to Fayette, Seneca County. The Book of Mormon (or the stick of Joseph in the hands of Ephraim) had then already been published for some time, and, as an ancient Prophet had predicted of it, "It was accounted as a strange thing." Joseph writes that no small stir was created by its appearance; great opposition and much persecution followed the believers of its authenticity; but it had now come to pass that truth had sprung out of the earth, and, righteousness had looked down from heaven, so that Joseph and the little flock which had received the gospel, feared not their opponents, knowing that they had both truth and righteousness on their side, for they had the doctrines of Christ and abided in them. They, therefore, continued to preach and give information to all who were willing to hear.

During the last week of May the above named Newel Knight came to Fayette, to visit the brethren, and was there baptized by David Whitmer.

On the 1st of June, the Church held its first conference. About thirty members were present, besides a number of others who were either believers or anxious to learn. "Having opened by singing and prayer," writes Joseph, "we partook together of the emblems of the body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ. We then proceeded to confirm several who had lately been baptized, after which we called and ordained several to the various offices of the holy Priesthood. Much exhortation and instruction was given, and the Holy Ghost was poured out upon us in a miraculous manner; many of our number prophesied, whilst others had the heavens opened to their view, and were so overcome that we had to lay them on beds or other convenient places; among the rest was brother Newel Knight, who had to be placed on a bed, being unable to help himself. By his own account of the transaction, he could not understand why we should lay him on the bed as he felt no sensibility of weakness. He felt his heart filled with love, with glory, and pleasure unspeakable, and could discern all that was going on in the room; when, all of a sudden, a vision of futurity burst upon him. He saw there represented, the great work which through my instrumentality was yet to be accomplished. He saw heaven opened, and beheld the Lord Jesus Christ seated at the right hand of the Majesty on high, and had it made plain to his understanding that the time would come when he would be admitted into his presence to enjoy his society for ever and ever. When their bodily strength was restored to these brethren, they shouted 'Hosannas to God and the Lamb,' and rehearsed the glorious things which they had seen and felt whilst they were yet in the spirit.

"Such scenes as these were calculated to inspire our hearts with joy unspeakable, and fill us with awe and reverence for that Almighty being by whose grace we had been called to be instrumental in bringing about for the children of men the enjoyment of such glorious blessings as were now poured out upon us. To find ourselves engaged in the very same order of things as observed by the holy Apostles of old; to realize the importance and solemnity of such proceedings; and to witness and feel with our own natural senses the like glorious manifestations of the power of the Priesthood, the gifts and blessings of the Holy Ghost, and the goodness and condescension of a merciful God unto such as obey the Everlasting Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ, combined to create within us sensations of rapturous gratitude, and inspire us with fresh zeal and energy in the cause of truth.

"Shortly after this conference David Whitmer baptized the following persons in Seneca Lake, viz.,John Poorman, John Jolly, Julia Anne Jolly, Harriet Jolly, Jerusha Smith, Catherine Smith, Wm. Smith, Don C. Smith, Peter Rockwell, Caroline Rockwell and Electa Rockwell."

Immediately after this conference, Joseph again returned to his own home in Pennsylvania, and from thence, accompanied by his wife and Oliver Cowdery, John Whitmer and David Whitmer, he visited Joseph Knight at Colesville, Broome County, New York. They found many in that neighborhood who believed and were anxious to be baptized. Joseph writes:

"We appointed a meeting for the Sabbath, and on the afternoon of Saturday we erected a dam across a stream of water, which was convenient for the purpose of there attending to the ordinance; but during the night a mob collected and tore down our dam, which hindered us from attending to the baptism on the Sabbath.

"We afterwards found out that this mob had been instigated to this act of molestation by certain sectarian priests of the neighborhood, who began to consider their craft in danger, and took this plan to stop the progress of the truth, and the sequel will show how determinedly they prosecuted their opposition, as well as to how little purpose in the end.

"The Sabbath arrived, and we held our meeting. Oliver Cowdery preached, and others of us bore testimony to the truth of the Book of Mormon, the doctrine of repentance, baptism for the remission of sins, and the laying on of hands for the gift of the Holy Ghost, etc., etc. Amongst our audience were those who had torn down our dam, and who seemed desirous to give us trouble, but did not until after the meeting was dismissed, when they immediately commenced talking to those whom they considered our friends, to try to turn them against us and our doctrines.

"Amongst the many present at this meeting was one Emily Coburn, sister to the wife of Newel Knight. The Rev. Mr. Shearer, a divine of the Presbyterian faith, who had considered himself her pastor, came to understand that she was likely to believe our doctrine, and had a short time previous to this meeting come to labor with her; but having spent some time with her without being able to persuade her against us, he endeavored to have her leave her sister's house and go with him to her father's, who lived at a distance of at least ten miles off. For this purpose he had to recource to stratagem; he told her that one of her brothers was waiting at a certain place desirous to have her go with him; he succeeded thus in getting her a little distance from the house, when, seeing that he brother was not in waiting for her, she refused to go any further with him; upon which he got hold of her by the arm to force her along, but her sister was soon with them; the two women were too many for him, and he was forced to sneak off without his errand, after all his labor and ingenuity. Nothing daunted, however, he went to her father, representing to him something or other which induced the old gentleman to give him a power of attorney, which, as soon as our meeting was over, on the above-named Sunday evening, he immediately served upon her, and carried her off to her father's residence by open violence against her will. All his labor was in vain, however, for the said Emily Coburn, in a short time afterwards, was baptized and confirmed a member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.

"However, early on Monday morning we were on the alert, and before our enemies were aware, we had repaired the dam and proceeded to baptize, when the following thirteen persons were baptized, under the hands of Oliver Cowdery, viz., Emma Smith, Hezekiah Peck and wife, Joseph Knight and wife, William Stringham and wife, Joseph Knight, jun., Aaron Culver and wife, Levi Hall, Polly Knight and Julia Stringham. Before the baptism was entirely finished, the mob began again to collect, and shortly after we had retired, they amounted to about fifty men. They surrounded the house of Mr. Knight, where we had retired, raging with anger, and apparently wishful to commit violence upon us. Some asked us questions, others threatened us, so that we thought it wisdom to leave and go to the house of Newel Knight.

"There also they followed us, and it was only by the exercise of great prudence on our part, and reliance on our heavenly Father, that they were kept from laying violent hands upon us; and so long as they chose to stay we were obliged to answer them various unprofitable questions, and bear with insults and threatenings without number.

"We had appointed a meeting for this evening, for the purpose of attending to the confirmation of those who had been the same morning baptized. The time appointed had arrived, and our friends had nearly all collected together, when, to my surprise, I was visited by a constable, and arrested by him on a warrant, on charge of being a disorderly person, of setting the country in an uproar by preaching the Book of Mormon, etc., etc. The constable informed me, soon after I had been arrested, that the plan of those who had got out the warrant, was to get me into the hands of the mob, who were now lying in ambush for me, but that he was determined to save me from them, as he had found me to be a different sort of person from what I had been represented to him. I soon found that he had told me the truth in this matter, for not far from Mr. Knight's house, the wagon in which we had set out was surrounded by the mob, who seemed only to await some signal from the constable; but to their great disappointment, he gave the horse the whip, and drove me out of their reach.

"Whilst driving along pretty quickly one of the wagon wheels came off, which left us once more very nearly surrounded by them, as they had come on in close pursuit; however, we managed to get the wheel on again, and again left them behind us. He drove on to the town of South Bainbridge, Chenango County, where he lodged me for the time being in an upper room of a tavern; and in order that all might be right with himself and with me also, he slept during the night with his feet against the door, and a loaded musket by his side, whilst I occupied a bed which was in the room; he having declared that if we were interrupted unlawfully, he would fight for me, and defend me as far as in his power.

"On the day following a court was convened for the purpose of investigating those charges which had been preferred against me. A great excitement prevailed on account of the scandalous falsehoods which had been circulated, the nature of which will come out in the sequel.

"In the meantime, my friend Joseph Knight had repaired to two of his neighbors, viz., James Davidson and John Reid, Esqrs., respectable farmers, men renowned for their integrity, and well versed in the laws of their country, and retained them on my behalf during my trial.

"At length the trial commenced amidst a multitude of spectators, who in general evinced a belief that I was guilty of all that had been reported concerning me, and of course were very zealous that I should be punished according to my crimes. Among many witnesses called up against me was Mr. Josiah Stoal, of whom I have made mention as having worked for him some time, and examined to the following effect:

"'Did not the prisoner, Joseph Smith, have a horse of you?'—'Yes.'

"'Did not he go to you and tell you that an angel had appeared unto him and authorized him to get the horse from you?'

"'No, he told me no such story.'

"'Well, how had he the horse of you?'

"'He bought him of me as another man would do.'

"'Have you had your pay?'—'That is not your business.' The question being again put, the witness replied, 'I hold his note for the price of the horse, which I consider as good as the pay; for I am well acquainted with Joseph Smith, jun., and know him to be an honest man, and, if he wishes, I am ready to let him have another horse on the same terms.'

"Mr. Jonathan Thompson was next called up and examined:

"'Has not the prisoner, Joseph Smith, jun., had a yoke of oxen of you?'—'Yes.'

"'Did he not obtain them of you by telling you that he had a revelation to the effect that he was to have them?'—'No, he did not mention a word of the kind concerning the oxen; he purchased them the same as another man would.'

"After a few more such attempts the court was detained for a time, in order that two young women, daughters of Mr. Stoal, with whom I had at times kept company, might be sent for, in order, if possible, to elicit something from them which might be made a pretext against me. The young ladies arrived, and were severally examined touching my character and conduct in general, but particularly as to my behavior towards them, both in public and private, when they both bore such testimony in my favor as left my enemies without a pretext on their account. Several attempts were now made to prove something against me, and even circumstances which were alleged to have taken place in Broome

County were brought forward, but these my lawyers would not here admit of against me, in consequence of which my persecutors managed to detain the court until they had succeeded in obtaining a warrant from Broome County, and which warrant they served upon me at the very moment in which I had been acquitted by this court.

"The constable who served this second warrant upon me, had no sooner arrested me than he began to abuse and insult me, and so unfeeling was he with me, that although I had been kept all the day in court without anythink to eat since the morning, yet he hurried me off to Broome County, a distance of about fifteen miles, before he allowed me any kind of food whatever. He took me to a tavern, and gathered in a number of men, who used every means to abuse, ridicule and insult me. They spit upon me, pointed their fingers at me, saying, 'Prophesy, prophesy!' and thus did they imitate those who crucified the Savior of mankind, not knowing what they did.

"We were at this time not far distant from my own house. I wished to be allowed the privilege of spending the night with my wife at home, offering any wished-for security for my appearance, but this was denied me. I applied for something to eat. The constable ordered me some crusts of bread and water, which was the only fare I that night received. At length we retired to bed; the constable made me lie next the wall; he then laid himself down by me and put his arm around me, and upon my moving in the least would clench me fast, fearing that I intended to escape from him; and in this not very agreeable manner did we pass the night.

"Next day I was brought before the magistrate's court, of Colesville, Broome County, and put upon my trial. My former faithful friends and lawyers were again at my side; my former persecutors were arrayed against me. Many witnesses were again called forward and examined, some of whom swore to the most palpable falsehoods, and, like the false witnesses which had appeared against me the day previous, they contradicted themselves so plainly that the court would not admit their testimony. Others were called, who showed by their zeal that they were willing enough to prove something against me, but all they could do was to tell some things which somebody else had told them. In this 'frivolous and vexatious' manner did they proceed for a considerable time, when, finally, Newel Knight was called up and examined by Lawyer Seymour, who had been especially sent for on this occasion. One Lawyer Burch, also, was on the side of the prosecution; but Mr. Seymour seemed to be a more zealous Presbyterian, and appeared very anxious and determined that the people should not be deluded by any one professing the power of godliness, and not 'denying the power thereof.'

"So soon as Mr. Knight had been sworn, Mr. Seymour proceeded to interrogate him as follows:

" 'Did the prisoner, Joseph Smith, jun., cast the devil out of you?'—'No, sir.'

" 'Why, have you not had the devil cast out of you?'—'Yes, sir.'

" 'And had not Joe Smith some hand in its being done?'—'Yes, sir.'

" 'And did not he cast him out of you?'—'No, sir, it was done by the power of God, and Joseph Smith was the instrument in the hands of God on the occasion. He commanded him to come out of me in the name of Jesus Christ.'

"'And you are sure that it was the devil?'—'Yes, sir.'

"'Did you see him after he was cast out of you?'—'Yes, sir. I saw him.'

"'Pray what did he look like?' Here one of my lawyers informed the witness that he need not answer the question. The witness replied, 'I believe I need not answer your last question, but I will do it, provided I be allowed to ask you one question first, and you answer me, viz., Do you, Mr. Seymour, understand the things of the Spirit?' 'No,' answered Mr. Seymour, 'I do not pretend to such big things.' 'Well, then,' replied Knight, 'it would be of no use to tell you what the devil looked like, for it was a spiritual sight, and spiritually discerned; and of course you would not understand it, were I to tell you of it.'

"The lawyer dropped his head, whilst the loud laugh of the audience proclaimed his discomfiture.

"Mr. Seymour now addressed the court, and in a long and violent harangue endeavored to blacken my character and bring me in guilty of the charges which had been brought against me. Among other things, he brought up the story of my having been a money digger; and in this manner proceeded, in hopes to influence the court and the people against me.

"Mr. Davidson and Mr. Reid followed on my behalf. They held forth in true colors the nature of the prosecution, the malignancy of intention, and the apparent disposition to persecute their client, rather than to afford him justice. They took up the different arguments which had been brought by the lawyers for the prosecution, and, having showed their utter futility and misapplication, they proceeded to scrutinize the evidence which had been adduced, and each, in his turn, thanked God that he had been engaged in so good a cause as that of defending a man whose character stood so well the test of such a strict investigation. In fact, these men, although not regular lawyers, were, upon this occasion, able to put to silence their opponents, and convince the court that I was innocent. They spoke like men inspired of God, whilst those who were arrayed against me, trembled under the sound of their voices, and quailed before them like criminals before a bar of justice.

"The majority of the assembled multitude had now begun to find that nothing could be sustained against me; even the constable who arrested me, and treated me so badly, now came and apologized to me, and asked my forgiveness for his behavior towards me; and so far was he changed, that he informed me that the mob were determined, that if the court acquitted me, they would have me, and railride me, and tar and feather me; and further, that he was willing to favor me and lead me out in safety by a private way.

"The court finding the charges against me not sustained, I was accordingly acquitted, to the great satisfaction of my friends and vexation of my enemies, who were still determined upon molesting me; but through the instrumentality of my new friend, the constable, I was enabled to escape them and make my way in safety to my wife's sister's house, where I found my wife awaiting with much anxiety the issue of those ungodly proceedings, and, with her in company, next day arrived in safety at my own house.

"After a few days, however, I again returned to Colesville, in company with Oliver Cowdery, for the purpose of confirming those whom we had thus been forced to abandon for a time. We had scarcely arrived at Mr. Knight's when the mob was seen collecting together to oppose us, and we considered it wisdom to leave for home, which we did, without even waiting for any refreshment. Our enemies pursued us, and it was oftentimes as much as we could do to elude them; however, we managed to get home, after having traveled all night, except a short time, during which we were forced to rest ourselves under a large tree by the wayside, sleeping and watching alternately. And thus were we persecuted on account of our religious faith—in a country, the constitution of which guarantees to every man the indefeasible right to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience—and by men, too, who were professors of religion, and who were not backward to maintain this privilege for themselves, though they thus wantonly could deny it to us. For instance, Cyrus McMaster, a Presbyterian of high standing in his church, was one of the chief instigators of these persecutions; and he at one time told me personally, that he considered me guilty without judge or jury. The celebrated Doctor Boyington, also a Presbyterian, was another instigator to these deeds of outrage; whilst a young man named Benton, of the same religious faith, swore out the first warrant against me. I could mention many others also, but, for brevity's sake, will make these suffice for the present."

The Prophet further states that amid all these trials and tribulations, the Lord, who well knew the infantile and delicate condition of the young Saints, manifested his goodness on various occasions and poured out his Holy Spirit upon his people. The Prophet himself also received numerous revelations or, as he says, "line upon line, here a little and there a little," which gave both him and the Saints unbounded joy and strengthened them in their faith. Thus in the month of June he received what is known as the Vision of Moses (See Pearl of Great Price, page 1), and in July the revelations constituting the 24th, 25th and 26th sections of the Doctrine and Covenants. In one of these (Section 25) Emma Smith was given of the Lord "to make a selection of sacred hymns" for the benefit of the Saints.

Joseph writes: "Shortly after we had received the above revelations, Oliver Cowdery returned to Mr. Peter Whitmer's, and I began to arrange and copy the revelations, which we had received from time to time; in which I was assisted by John Whitmer, who now resided with me.

"Whilst thus (and otherwise at intervals) employed in the work appointed me by my Heavenly Father, I received a letter from Oliver Cowdery, the contents of which gave me both sorrow and uneasiness. Not having that letter now in my possession, I cannot of course give it here in full, but merely an extract of the most prominent parts, which I can yet, and expect long to, remember. He wrote to inform me that he had discovered an error in one of the commandments (Doc & Cov., Sec. 20, verse 37):

"'And truly manifest by their works that they have received of the Spirit of Christ unto the remission of their sins.'

"The above quotation, he said, was erroneous, and added, 'I command you in the name of God to erase these words, that no priestcraft be amongst us!' I immediately wrote to him in reply, in which I asked him by what authority he took upon him to command me to alter or erase, to add to or diminish from a revelation or commandment from Almighty God. In a few days afterwards I visited him and Mr. Whitmer's family, when I found the family in general of his opinion concerning the words above quoted, and it was not without both labor and perseverance that I could prevail with any of them to reason calmly on the subject. However, Christian Whitmer at length got convinced that it was reasonable, and according to Scripture; and finally, with his assistance, I succeeded in bringing, not only the Whitmer family, but also Oliver Cowdery, to acknowledge that they had been in error, and that the sentence in dispute was in accordance with the rest of the commandments. And thus was their error rooted out, which, having its rise in presumption and rash judgment, was the more particularly calculated (when once fairly understood) to teach each and all of us the necessity of humility and meekness before the Lord, that he might teach us of his ways, that we might walk in his paths, and live by every word that proceedeth forth from his mouth."

Early in August Newel Knight, of Colesville, and his wife visited Joseph in Harmony. This was the same Knight of whom Joseph previously had cast out the devil. His wife as also Joseph's wife (Emma) were among those who had been baptized in Colesville a short time before, but who were hindered from being confirmed because of the mob who compelled the brethren to leave the neighborhood. Consequently Joseph made preparations for holding a confirmation meeting, and also for administering the Sacrament. In order to attend to the latter he "set out to procure some wine for the occasion, but had gone only a short distance when he was met by a heavenly messenger" and received a revelation concerning the Sacrament.

In this revelation, the Lord forbade him and the Saints to purchase wine or strong drinks of their enemies, and commanded further that they should not use wine at all for Sacrament purposes, except it was made new among themselves. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 27.) In obedience to this commandment they prepared some wine themselves and held a meeting attended by five persons (Joseph and his wife, Newel Knight and wife, and John Whitmer). They partook of the Sacrament, confirmed the two sisters into the Church and spent the evening in a most pleasant manner.

"About this time" writes the Prophet, "a spirit of persecution began again to manifest itself against us in the neighborhood where I resided, which was commenced by a man of the Methodist persuasion, who professed to be a minister of God. * * *

This man came to understand that my father-in-law and his family had promised us protection, and were friendly, and inquiring into the work; and knowing that if he could get him turned against me, my friends in that place would be but few, he accordingly went to visit my father-in-law, and told him falsehoods concerning me of the most shameful nature, which turned the old gentleman and his family so much against us, that they would no longer promise us protection, nor believe our doctrines.

"Toward the latter end of August, I, in company with John and David Whitmer, and my brother Hyrum Smith, visited the Church at Colesville, New York. Well knowing the determined hostilities of our enemies in that quarter, and also knowing that it was our duty to visit the Church, we had called upon our heavenly Father, in mighty prayer, that he would grant us an opportunity of meeting with them, that he would blind the eyes of our enemies, so that they would not know us, and that we might, on this occasion, return unmolested.

"Our prayers were not in vain, for when within a little distance of Mr. Knight's place, we encountered a large company at work upon the public road, amongst whom were several of our most bitter enemies; they looked earnestly at us, but not knowing us, we passed on without interruption. We that evening assembled the Church, and confirmed them, partook of the Sacrament, and held a happy meeting, having much reason to rejoice in the God of our salvation, and sing hosannas to his holy name.

"Next morning we set out on our return home, and although our enemies had offered a reward of five dollars to any one who would give them information of our arrival, yet did we get clear out of the neighborhood, without the least annoyance, and arrived home in safety.

"Some few days afterwards, however, Newel Knight came to my place, and from him we learned that very shortly after our departure, the mob had come to know of our having been there, when they immediately collected together, and threatened the brethren, and very much annoyed them during all that day.

"Meantime, Brother Knight had come with his wagon, prepared to move my family, etc., etc., to Fayette, New York. Mr. Whitmer, having heard of the persecutions which had been got up against us at Harmony, Pennsylvania, had invited us to go and live with him; and during the last week in August we arrived at Fayette, amidst the congratulations of our brethren and friends. To our great grief, however, we soon found that Satan had been lying in wait to deceive, and seeking whom he might devour. Brother Hiram Page had got in his possession a certain stone, by which he had obtained a number of revelations concerning the upbuilding of Zion, the order of the Church, etc., all of which were entirely at variance with the order of God's house, as laid down in the New Testament, as well as our late revelations."

Joseph found a number of the Saints, and prominent among them Oliver Cowdery and the Whitmer family, who believed much in the things set forth by this stone, wherefore he thought best to inquire of the Lord concerning so important a matter. As an answer he received a revelation for Oliver Cowdery (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 28), in which the Lord among other things said that the things which had been received by the stone were not of him, that Satan had deceived Hiram Page, and that no other than Joseph Smith should be appointed to receive revelations to the Church. In this revelation the Lord also speaks of the New Jerusalem for the first time, using the following language:

"And now, behold, I say unto you, that it is not revealed, and no man knoweth where the city shall be built, but it shall be given hereafter. Behold, I say unto you, that it shall be on the borders by the Lamanites."

About the same time Joseph received another important revelation concerning the gathering of the Saints, the end of the world, the reward of the righteous, the punishment of the wicked, etc. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 29.) This revelation was given at Fayette in the presence of six Elders.

September 1, 1830, the second conference of the Church was commenced at Fayette; it continued for three days. Of this conference Joseph writes:

"The subject of the stone, previously mentioned, was discussed, and after considerable investigation, Brother Page, as well as the whole Church who were present, renounced the said stone, and all things connected therewith, much to our mutual satisfaction and happiness. We now partook of the Sacrament, confirmed and ordained many, and attended to a great variety of Church business on that and the following day, during which time we had much of the power of God manifested amongst us; the Holy Ghost came upon us, and filled us with joy unspeakable; and peace and faith, and hope, and charity abounded in our midst. * * * The utmost harmony prevailed, and all things were settled satisfactorily to all present, and a desire was manifested by all the Saints to go forward and labor with all their powers to spread the great and glorious principles of truth, which had been revealed by our Heavenly Father. A number were baptized during conference and the work of the Lord spread and prevailed."

While this conference was in session, Joseph received two revelations (Doc. & Cov., Secs. 30 and 31), in which several of the brethren were called to go out and preach the gospel. At this time the Church consisted of about fifty members.

CHAPTER 4.

Missionaries are called to the Lamanites.—Their journey westward.—Preach as they travel.—Are met with great success in Kirtland, Ohio.—Sidney Rigdon and others are converted.—Parley P. Pratt is arrested and tried.—Escapes from his pursuers.—Has a hard journey.—Arrives with his fellow-missionaries in Jackson County, Missouri.—Visits the Delawares in company with Oliver Cowdery.—Both are compelled to leave the Indian country.—Council in Independence.—Pratt returns to Kirtland.

About this time great interest was manifested by several of the Elders respecting the remnants of the house of Joseph, the Lamanites, residing in the West, the brethren having learned from the Book of Mormon that the purposes of God in regard to that people were great, and they hoped that the time had come when the promises of the Almighty to them would be fulfilled, that they would receive the gospel and enjoy its blessings, etc. The interest finally became so universal that Joseph concluded to inquire of the Lord respecting the propriety of sending some of the Elders out amongst them. A revelation was consequently given which authorized Oliver Cowdery, Parley P. Pratt, Richard Ziba Peterson and Peter Whitmer, jun., to take a mission to the Lamanites or Indians in the West. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 32.) This being the first important mission performed by any of the Elders in this dispensation, we copy the following interesting account of it from the Autobiography of Parley P. Pratt:

"It was now October, 1830. A revelation had been given through the mouth of the Prophet, Seer and Translator, in which Elders Oliver Cowdery, Peter Whitmer, junior, Ziba Peterson and myself were appointed to go into the wilderness, through the Western States, and to the Indian Territory. Making arrangements for my wife in the family of the Whitmers, we took leave of our friends and the Church late in October, and started on foot.

"After traveling for some days we called on an Indian nation at or near Buffalo; and spent part of a day with them, instructing them in the knowledge of the record of their forefathers. We were kindly received, and much interest was manifested by them on hearing this news. We made a present of two copies of the Book of Mormon to certain of them who could read, and repaired to Buffalo. Thence we continued our journey for about two hundred miles, and at length called on Mr. Rigdon, my former friend and instructor, in the Reformed Baptist Society. He received us cordially and entertained us with hospitality.

"We soon presented him with a Book of Mormon, and related to him the history of the same. He was much interested, and promised a thorough perusal of the book.

"We tarried in this region for some time, and devoted our time to the ministry, and visiting from house to house.

"At length Mr. Rigdon and many others became convinced that they had no authority to minister in the ordinances of God; and that they had not been legally baptized and ordained. They, therefore, came forward and were baptized by us, and received the gift of the Holy Ghost by the laying on of hands, and prayer in the name of Jesus Christ.

"The news of our coming was soon noised abroad, and the news of the discovery of the Book of Mormon and the marvelous events connected with it. The interest and excitement now became general in Kirtland, and in all the region round about. The people thronged us night and day, insomuch that we had no time for rest or retirement. Meetings were convened in different neighborhoods, and multitudes came together soliciting our attendance; while thousands flocked about us daily, some to be taught, some for curiosity, some to obey the gospel, and some to dispute or resist it.

"In two or three weeks from our arrival in the neighborhood with the news, we had baptized one hundred and twenty-seven souls, and this number soon increased to one thousand. The disciples were filled with joy and gladness; while rage and lying was abundantly manifested by gainsayers; faith was strong, joy was great, and persecution heavy.

"We proceeded to ordain Sidney Rigdon, Isaac Morley, John Murdock, Lyman Wight and many others to the ministry; and, leaving them to take care of the churches and to minister the gospel, we took leave of the Saints and continued our journey.

"Fifty miles west of Kirtland, we had occasion to pass through the neighborhood where I first settled in the wilderness, after my marriage. We found the people all excited with the news of the great work we had been the humble instruments of doing in Kirtland and vicinity. Some wished to learn and obey the fulness of the gospel—were ready to entertain us and hear us preach. Others were filled with envy, rage and lying.

"We had stopped for the night at the house of Simeon Carter, by whom we were kindly received, and were in the act of reading to him and explaining the Book of Mormon, when there came a knock at the door, and an officer entered with a warrant from a magistrate by the name of Byington, to arrest me on a very frivolous charge. I dropped the Book of Mormon in Carter's house, and went with him some two miles, in a dark, muddy road; one of the brethren accompanied me. We arrived at the place of trial late in the evening; found false witnesses in attendance, and a judge who boasted of his intention to thrust us into prison, for the purpose of testing the powers of our Apostleship, as he called it; although I was only an Elder in the Church. The judge boasting thus, and the witnesses being entirely false in their testimony, I concluded to make no defence, but to treat the whole matter with contempt.

"I was soon ordered to prison, or to pay a sum of money which I had not in the world. It was now a late hour, and I was still retained in court, tantalized, abused and urged to settle the matter, to all of which I made no reply for some time. This greatly exhausted their patience. It was near midnight. I now called on brother Peterson to sing a hymn in the court. We sung, 'O how happy are they.' This exasperated them still more, and they pressed us greatly to settle the business, by paying the money.

"I then observed as follows: 'May it please the court, I have one proposal to make for a final settlement of the things that seem to trouble you. It is this: if the witnesses who have given testimony in the case will repent of their false swearing, and the magistrate of his unjust and wicked judgment and of his persecution, blackguardism and abuse, and all kneel down together, we will pray for you, that God might forgive you in these matters.'

"'My big bull dog pray for me,' says the judge.

"'The devil help us,' exclaimed another.

"They now urged me for some time to pay the money; but got no further answer.

"The court adjourned, and I was conducted to a public house over the way, and locked in till morning; the prison being some miles distant.

"In the morning the officer appeared and took me to breakfast; this over, we sat waiting in the inn for all things to be ready to conduct me to prison. In the meantime my fellow-travelers came past on their journey, and called to see me. I told them in an undertone to pursue their journey and leave me to manage my own affairs, promising to overtake them soon. They did so.

"After sitting awhile by the fire in charge of the officer, I requested to step out. I walked out into the public square accompanied by him. Said I, 'Mr. Peabody, are you good at a race?' 'No,' said he, 'but my big bull dog is, and he has been trained to assist me in my office these several years; he will take any man down at my bidding.' 'Well, Mr. Peabody, you compelled me to go a mile, I have gone with you two miles. You have given me an opportunity to preach, sing, and have also entertained me with lodging and breakfast. I must now go on my journey; if you are good at a race you can accompany me. I thank you for all your kindness—good day, sir.'

"I then started on my journey, while he stood amazed and not able to step one foot before the other. Seeing this, I halted, turned to him and again invited him to a race. He still stood amazed. I then renewed my exertions, and soon increased my speed to something like that of a deer. He did not awake from his astonishment sufficiently to start in pursuit till I had gained, perhaps, two hundred yards. I had already leaped a fence, and was making my way through a field to the forest on the right of the road. He now came hallooing after me, and shouting to his dog to seize me. The dog, being one of the largest I ever saw, came close on my footsteps with all his fury; the officer behind still in pursuit, clapping his hands and hallooing, 'stu-boy, stu-boy—take him, Watch—lay hold of him, I say—down with him,' and pointing his finger in the direction I was running. The dog was fast overtaking me, and in the act of leaping upon me, when, quick as lightning, the thought struck me to assist the officer, in sending the dog with all fury to the forest a little distance before me. I pointed my finger in that direction, clapped my hands, and shouted in imitation of the officer. The dog hastened past me with redoubled speed towards the forest; being urged by the officer and myself, and both of us running in the same direction.

"Gaining the forest, I soon lost sight of the officer and dog, and have not seen them since. I took a back course, crossed the road, took round into the wilderness, on the left, and made the road again in time to cross a bridge over Vermillion River, where I was hailed by half a dozen men, who had been anxiously awaiting our arrival to that part of the country, and who urged me very earnestly to stop and preach. I told them that I could not then do it, for an officer was on my track. I passed on six miles further, through mud and rain, and overtook the brethren, and preached the same evening to a crowded audience, among whom we were well entertained.

"The Book of Mormon, which I dropped at the house of Simeon Carter, when taken by the officer, was by these circumstances left with him. He read it with attention. It wrought deeply upon his mind, and he went fifty miles to the church we had left in Kirtland, and was there baptized and ordained an Elder. He then returned to his home and commenced to preach and baptize. A church of about sixty members was soon organized in the place where I had played such a trick of deception on the dog.

"We now pursued our journey for some days, and at length arrived in Sandusky, in the western part of Ohio. Here resided a tribe, or nation of Indians, called Wyandots, on whom we called, and with whom we spent several days. We were well received, and had an opportunity of laying before them the record of their forefathers, which we did. They rejoiced in the tidings, bid us God-speed, and desired us to write to them in relation to our success among the tribes further west, who had already removed to the Indian Territory, where these expected soon to go.

"Taking an affectionate leave of this people, we continued our journey to Cincinnati. In this city we spent several days, and preached to many of the people, but without much success. About the 20th of December we took passage on a steamer for St. Louis. In a few days we arrived at the mouth of the Ohio, and finding the river blocked with ice, the boat did not proceed further. We therefore landed and pursued our journey on foot for two hundred miles, to the neighborhood of St. Louis.

"We halted for a few days in Illinois, about twenty miles from St. Louis, on account of a dreadful storm of rain and snow, which lasted for a week or more, during which the snow fell in some places nearly three feet deep. Although in the midst of strangers, we were kindly entertained, found many friends, and preached to large congregations in several neighborhoods.

"In the beginning of 1831 we renewed our journey; and, passing through St. Louis and St. Charles, we traveled on foot for three hundred miles through vast prairies and through trackless wilds of snow—no beaten road; houses few and far between; and the bleak northwest wind always blowing in our faces with a keenness which would almost take the skin off the face. We traveled for whole days, from morning till night, without a house or fire, wading in snow to the knees at every step, and the cold so intense that the snow did not melt on the south side of the houses, even in the midday sun, for nearly six weeks. We carried on our backs our changes of clothing, several books, and cornbread and raw pork. We often ate our frozen bread and pork by the way, when the bread would be so frozen that we could not bite or penetrate any part of it but the outside crust.

"After much fatigue and some suffering we all arrived in Independence, in the county of Jackson, on the extreme western frontiers of Missouri, and of the United States.

"This was about fifteen hundred miles from where we started, and we had performed most of the journey on foot, through a wilderness country, in the worst season of the year, occupying about four months, during which we had preached the gospel to tens of thousands of Gentiles and two nations of Indians; baptizing, confirming and organizing many hundreds of people into churches of Latter-day Saints.

"This was the first mission performed by the Elders of the Church in any of the States west of New York, and we were the first members of the same which were ever on this frontier.

"Two of our number now commenced work as tailors in the village of Independence, while the others crossed the frontier line and commenced a mission among the Lamanites, or Indians.

"Passing through the tribe of Shawnees we tarried one night with them, and the next day crossed the Kansas River and entered among the Delawares. We immediately inquired for the residence of the principal chief, and were soon introduced to an aged and venerable looking man, who had long stood at the head of the Delawares, and been looked up to as the great-grandfather, or sachem, of ten nations or tribes.

"He was seated on a sofa of furs, skins and blankets, before a fire in the center of his lodge; which was a comfortable cabin, consisting of two large rooms.

"His wives were neatly dressed, partly in calicoes and partly in skins; and wore a vast amount of silver ornaments. As we entered his cabin he took us by the hand with a hearty welcome, and then motioned us to be seated on a pleasant seat of blankets, or robes. His wives, at his bidding, set before us a tin pan full of beans and corn boiled up together, which proved to be good eating; although three of us made use alternately of the same wooden spoon.

"There was an interpreter present and through him we commenced to make known our errand, and to tell him of the Book of Mormon. We asked him to call the council of his nation together and give us a hearing in full. He promised to consider on it till next day, in the meantime recommending us to a certain Mr. Pool for entertainment; this was their blacksmith, employed by government.

"The man entertained us kindly and comfortably. Next morning we again called on Mr. Anderson, the old chief, and explained to him something of the book. He was at first unwilling to call his council; made several excuses, and finally refused; as he had ever been opposed to the introduction of missionaries among his tribe.

"We continued the conversation a little longer, till he at last began to understand the nature of the book. He then changed his mind, became suddenly interested, and requested us to proceed no further with our conversation till he could call a council. He despatched a messenger, and in about an hour had some forty men collected around us in his lodge, who, after shaking us by the hand, were seated in silence; and in a grave and dignified manner awaited the announcement of what we had to offer. The chief then requested us to proceed; or rather, begin where we began before, and to complete our communication. Elder Cowdery then commenced as follows:

" 'Aged chief and venerable council of the Delaware Nation; we are glad of this opportunity to address you as our red brethren and friends. We have traveled a long distance from towards the rising sun to bring you glad news; we have traveled the wilderness, crossed the deep and wide rivers, and waded in the deep snows, and in the face of the storms of winter, to communicate to you great knowledge which has lately come to our ears and hearts; and which will do the red man good as well as the pale face.

" 'Once the red men were many; they occupied the country from sea to sea—from the rising to the setting sun; the whole land was theirs; the Great Spirit gave it to them, and no pale faces dwelt among them. But now they are few in numbers; their possessions are small, and the pale faces are many.

" 'Thousands of moons ago, when the red men's forefathers dwelt in peace and possessed this whole land, the Great Spirit talked with them, and revealed his law and his will, and much knowledge to their wise men and Prophets. This they wrote in a book; together with their history, and the things which should befall their children in the latter days.

" 'This book was written on plates of gold, and handed down from father to son for many ages and generations.

" 'It was then that the people prospered, and were strong and mighty; they cultivated the earth; built buildings and cities, and abounded in all good things, as the pale faces now do.

" 'But they became wicked; they killed one another and shed much blood; they killed their Prophets and wise men, and sought to destroy the book. The Great Spirit became angry, and would speak to them no more: they had no more good and wise dreams; no more visions; no more angels sent among them by the Great Spirit; and the Lord commanded Mormon and Moroni, their last wise men and Prophets, to hide the book in the earth, that it might be preserved in safety, and be found and made known in the latter day to the pale faces who should possess the land; that they might again make it known to the red man; in order to restore them to the knowledge of the will of the Great Spirit and to his favor. And if the red man would then receive this book and learn the things written in it, and do according thereunto, they should be restored to all their rights and privileges; should cease to fight and kill one another; should become one people; cultivate the earth in peace, in common with the pale faces, who were willing to believe and obey the same book, and be good men and live in peace.

" 'Then should the red men become great, and have plenty to eat and good clothes to wear, and should be in favor with the Great Spirit and be his children, while he would be their Great Father, and talk with them, and raise up Prophets and wise and good men amongst them again, who should teach them many things.

" 'This book, which contained these things, was hid in the earth by Moroni, in a hill called by him Cumorah, which hill is now in the State of New York, near the village of Palmyra, in Ontario County.

" 'In that neighborhood there lived a young man named Joseph Smith, who prayed to the Great Spirit much, in order that he might know the truth; and the Great Spirit sent an angel to him, and told him where this book was hid by Moroni; and commanded him to go and get it. He accordingly went to the place, and dug in the earth, and found the book written on golden plates.

" 'But it was written in the language of the forefathers of the red man; therefore this young man, being a pale face, could not understand it; but the angel told him and showed him, and gave him knowledge of the language, and how to interpret the book. So he interpreted it into the language of the pale faces, and wrote it on paper, and caused it to be printed, and published thousands of copies of it among them; and then sent us to the red men to bring some copies of it to them, and to tell them this news. So we have now come from him, and here is a copy of the book, which we now present to our red friend, the chief of the Delawares, and which we hope he will cause to be read and known among his tribe; it will do them good.'

"We then presented him with a Book of Mormon.

"There was a pause in the council, and some conversation in their own tongue, after which the chief made the following reply:

" 'We feel truly thankful to our white friends who have come so far, and been at such pains to tell us good news, and especially this new news concerning the book of our forefathers; it makes us glad in here'—placing his hand on his heart.

"'It is now winter, we are new settlers in this place; the snow is deep, our cattle and horses are dying, our wigwams are poor; we have much to do in the spring—to build houses, and fence and make farms; but we will build a council house, and meet together, and you shall read to us and teach us more concerning the book of our forefathers and the will of the Great Spirit.'

"We again lodged at Mr. Pool's, told him of the book, had a very pleasant interview with him, and he became a believer and advocate for the book, and served as an interpreter.

"We continued for several days to instruct the old chief and many of his tribe. The interest became more and more intense on their part, from day to day, until at length nearly the whole tribe began to feel a spirit of inquiry and excitement on the subject.

"We found several among them who could read, and to them we gave copies of the book, explaining to them that it was the book of their forefathers.

"Some began to rejoice exceedingly, and took great pains to tell the news to others, in their own language.

"The excitement now reached the frontier settlements in Missouri, and stirred up the jealousy and envy of the Indian agents and sectarian missionaries to that degree that we were soon ordered out of the Indian country as disturbers of the peace; and even threatened with the military in case of non-compliance.

"We accordingly departed from the Indian country, and came over the line, and commenced laboring in Jackson County, Missouri, among the whites. We were well received, and listened to by many; and some were baptized and added to the Church.

"Thus ended our first Indian Mission, in which we had preached the gospel in its fulness, and distributed the record of their forefathers among three tribes, viz.: the Catteraugus Indians, near Buffalo, N. Y., the Wyandots of Ohio, and the Delawares west of Missouri.

"We trust that at some future day, when the servants of God go forth in power to the remnant of Joseph, some precious seed will be found growing in their hearts, which was sown by us in that early day."

February 14, 1831, the five brethren (Oliver Cowdery, Parley P. Pratt, Richard Ziba Peterson, Peter Whitmer, jun., and Frederick G. Williams) held a council at Independence, in which it was decided that Parley P. Pratt should return to the East to report the result of their mission, etc., to the Presidency of the Church. He started on his perilous journey soon afterwards and after suffering much from sickness and hardships on the road he arrived in Kirtland, Ohio, in March, 1831. There he met with a hearty reception from the Prophet Joseph, who, during Elder Pratt's absence, had removed from the State of New York to Kirtland.

CHAPTER 5.

Joseph continues to receive revelations.—Is visited by Orson Pratt, Sidney Rigdon, Edward Partridge and others.—The third conference of the Church.—Joseph and the Saints remove from the State of New York to Kirtland, Ohio.—False spirits.—The fourth conference of the Church.—Joseph's first trip to Missouri.—The location for the New Jerusalem is revealed.—The Land of Zion is dedicated and consecrated for the gathering of the Saints.—The Temple site at Independence is dedicated.—The fifth conference of the Church.—Joseph and others return to Kirtland.

In the meantime Joseph continued to receive revelations from time to time, and thus he gradually became possessed of more light and knowledge concerning how to manage the affairs of the new-born Church, and he was enabled to discharge the duties of his high and holy calling with honor, while the work spread and the members slowly increased in number. Yet, both he and the Church were in their infancy, and as the true gospel, which was being restored, was different in nearly all its particulars from everything known among the so-called Christian sects, founded by the wisdom of men, he often found it necessary to inquire of the Lord, especially when he was visited by persons who came to him to learn the mind and will of God concerning themselves. Thus, in October, 1830, he received a revelation to Ezra Thayre and Northrop Sweet, in which these brethren were called to preach the gospel.

In the beginning of November, 1830, Orson Pratt visited Joseph at Fayette. Orson had been baptized six weeks previous by his brother Parley P. Pratt at Canaan, New York, on his 19th birthday, September 19, 1830. He now came to inquire of the Lord "what his duty was" and Joseph received a revelation commanding Orson to prophesy and lift up "his voice as with the sound of a trump and cry repentance unto a crooked and perverse generation." (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 34.) From that time until the day of his death Orson Pratt was an able and zealous laborer in the Lord's vineyard. (See Orson Pratt, page 49.)

In December, 1830, Sidney Rigdon, who had been baptized by Parley P. Pratt at Kirtland, Ohio, came to visit Joseph at Fayette, accompanied by Edward Partridge. He came to inquire of the Lord, who through Joseph gave a revelation commanding Sidney Rigdon to remain a short time with the Prophet at Fayette to write for him, after which Joseph should accompany him to Kirtland. (Doc & Coc., Sec. 35.) Speaking to Sidney Rigdon, the Lord says in the same revelation:

"I give unto thee a commandment, that thou shalt baptize by water, and they shall receive the Holy Ghost by the laying on of hands, even as the Apostles of old. * * * For I am God, and mine arm is not shortened; and I will show miracles, signs, and wonders, unto all those who believe on my name. And whoso shall ask it in my name in faith, they shall cast out devils; they shall heal the sick; they shall cause the blind to receive their sight, and the deaf to hear, and the dumb to speak, and the lame to walk; and the time speedily cometh that great things are to be shown forth unto the children of men."

Sidney Rigdon, who soon afterwards became a very prominent man in the Church, had formerly been a popular preacher in the Campbellite denomination and had given up a good situation for the sake of the gospel. (See Sidney Rigdon.)

About Edward Partridge, who visited Joseph Smith together with Sidney Rigdon, the Prophet writes that "he was a pattern of piety and one of the Lord's great men, known by his steadfastness and patient endurance to the end." (See Edward Partridge.) On December 11, 1830, a few days after his arrival at Fayette, he was baptized by the Prophet Joseph Smith, who subsequently ordained him the first Bishop in the Church. A revelation was also given to Edward Partridge, through the Prophet. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 36.)

Before the close of the year 1830, Joseph had commenced to translate the Bible under the inspiration of the Almighty. It is a well known fact that the Holy Scriptures, as we now have them translated by uninspired men, contain many errors and a number of ambiguous sentences, which are hard to understand. It was therefore necessary that the Lord should inspire his servant Joseph to translate them under the influence of the same spirit by which the servants of God originally wrote them. Sidney Rigdon assisted Joseph in this important labor by acting as his scribe. The Prophet writes:

"Much conjecture and conversation frequently occurred among the Saints concerning the books mentioned, and referred to, in various places in the Old and New Testaments, which were now nowhere to be found. The common remark was, 'they are lost books;' but it seems the Apostolic Church had some of these writings, as Jude mentions or quotes the Prophecy of Enoch, the seventh from Adam. To the joy of the little flock, which in all, from Colesville to Canandaigua, New York, numbered about seventy members, did the Lord reveal the following doings of olden times, from the prophecy of Enoch." (See Pearl of Great Price, pages 17-22.)

Soon after this revelation was given, the Saints in the State of New York were commanded to gather to Ohio (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 37), which was the first revelation the Lord gave in regard to the gathering of the Saints.

January 2, 1831, the Church held its third conference in the house of Peter Whitmer, sen., at Fayette. Besides the ordinary business transacted for the Church, Joseph received a cheering revelation to the members of the Church, in which the Lord, among other things, promised that He would give the Saints a land of inheritance, which they should possess for ever, if they would seek it with all their hearts. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 38.)

Not long after this conference closed, a man by the name of James Covill, who had been a Baptist minister for forty years, came to Joseph and covenanted with the Lord that he would obey any commandment which should be given him through Joseph; but when the Lord in a revelation (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 39) commanded him to obey the fulness of the gospel as it had been revealed through the Prophet Joseph, Mr. Covill turned away and held fast to his former doctrines and people. In a revelation (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 40) subsequently given to Joseph and Sidney Rigdon, the Lord said that the reason why James Covill rejected the commandment given him, was that Satan tempted him and darkened his mind with fear of persecution, etc.

In the latter part of January, in company with Sidney Rigdon and Edward Partridge, Joseph started with his wife for Kirtland, Ohio, about two hundred miles west of Fayette. The following is recorded in the Contributor, Vol. 6, page 125:

"About the first of February, 1831, a sleigh containing four persons drove through the streets of Kirtland and drew up at the door of Gilbert & Whitney's mercantile establishment. The occupants of the vehicle were evenly divided as to sex. One of the men, a young and stalwart personage, alighted, and springing up the steps, walked into the store and to where the junior partner was standing.

"'Newel K. Whitney! Thou art the man!' he exclaimed, extending his hand cordially, as if to an old and familiar acquaintance.

"'You have the advantage of me,' replied the one addressed, as he mechanically took the proffered hand—a half-amused, half-mystified look overspreading his countenance—'I could not call you by name, as you have me.'

"'I am Joseph, the Prophet,' said the stranger, smiling. 'You've prayed me here; now what do you want of me?'

"'Mr. Whitney, astonished, but no less delighted, as soon as his surprise would permit, conducted the party—who were no other than Joseph Smith, his wife Emma and two servants, just arrived from Fayette, the birth-place of the infant Church—across the street to his house on the corner, and introduced them to his wife. She shared fully his surprise and ecstacy."

Joseph writes: "We were kindly received and welcomed into the house of Brother Newel K. Whitney. My wife and I lived in the family of Brother Whitney several weeks, and received every kindness and attention which could be expected, and especially from Sister Whitney.

"The branch of the Church in this part of the Lord's vineyard, which had increased to nearly one hundred members, were striving to do the will of God, so far as they knew it, though some strange notions and false spirits had crept in among them. With a little caution and some wisdom, I soon assisted the brethren and sisters to overcome them. The plan of 'common stock,' which had existed in what was called 'the family,' whose members generally had embraced the everlasting gospel, was readily abandoned for the more perfect law of the Lord; and the false spirits were easily discerned and rejected by the light of revelation."

A few days after Joseph's arrival in Kirtland, Edward Partridge was called by revelation to be the first Bishop in the Church. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 41.)

February 9, 1831, in the presence of twelve Elders, the Lord gave through Joseph an important revelation, concerning Church government and how transgressors should be dealt with. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 42.) In this revelation, also, all the Elders, except Joseph Smith and Sidney Rigdon, were commanded to go out, two and two, to preach the gospel, and the Saints were instructed to pray much to the Lord, who promised that he would reveal unto them the place where the New Jerusalem should be built, in his own due time, etc.

A short time after this a woman came to Joseph "with great pretentions to revealing commandments, laws and other curious matters," and when Joseph inquired of the Lord concerning this, he received in answer a revelation from God to the effect that none but himself would be appointed to receive revelations and commandments, as long as he lived and remained faithful. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 43.)

In the latter part of February the Lord commanded (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 44) that the Elders who had gone out on missions should assemble at Kirtland, where a conference was appointed for the 6th of June following.

At this time "many false reports, lies and foolish stories were published in the newspapers and circulated in every direction to prevent people from investigating the work or embracing the faith, but to the joy of the Saints, who had to struggle against every thing that prejudice and wickedness could invent," the Lord gave a very encouraging revelation on March 7, 1831, in which many prophecies of great importance concerning the Saints and the future condition of the world were revealed. The Saints were also commanded as follows (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 45):

"Gather ye out from the eastern lands, assemble ye yourselves together, ye Elders of my Church; go ye forth into the western countries, call upon the inhabitants to repent, and inasmuch as they do repent, build up churches unto me; and with one heart and with one mind, gather up your riches that ye may purchase an inheritance which shall hereafter be appointed unto you, and it shall be called the New Jerusalem, a land of peace, a city of refuge, a place of safety for the Saints of the most High God; and the glory of the Lord shall be there, and the terror of the Lord also shall be there, insomuch that the wicked will not come unto it, and it shall be called Zion. And it shall come to pass among the wicked, that every man that will not take his sword against his neighbor must needs flee unto Zion for safety. And there shall be gathered unto it out of every nation under heaven; and it shall be the only people that shall not be at war one with another. And it shall be said among the wicked: Let us not go up to battle against Zion, for the inhabitants of Zion are terrible; wherefore we cannot stand. And it sball come to pass that the righteous shall be gathered out from among all nations, and shall come to Zion, singing with songs of everlasting joy."

The following day (March 8th) Joseph received a revelation concerning the Holy Ghost, and another one which directed him to appoint John Whitmer, Church Historian. (Doc. & Cov., Secs. 46 and 47.)

Shortly after Joseph's arrival in Kirtland, the Saints in the State of New York, in obediance to the revelation given the month previous, commenced to migrate to the northern parts of the State of Ohio, principally to Kirtland and neighborhood, which the Lord had selected as one of the Stakes of Zion. This move took place in the spring of 1831, and as early as April and May the Saints began to arrive in Kirtland. Previous to this the Saints in Kirtland were commanded by revelation (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 48) to receive these "eastern brethren" and divide their lands with them until the Lord should command them to gather to the land of their inheritance.

About this time Lemon Copley, "one of the sect called Shaking Quakers, embraced the fulness of the everlasting gospel, apparently honest-hearted, but still retained ideas that the Shakers were right in some particulars of their faith. In order to have more perfect understanding on the subject, Joseph inquired of the Lord and received a revelation (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 49), in which Sidney Rigdon, Parley P. Pratt and Lemon Copley were called to preach the fulness of the gospel to the Shakers, who, however, did not seem disposed to receive the same, as the Elders named shortly afterwards visited one of their settlements near Cleveland, Ohio, without being able to make any converts among them.

In the meantime Joseph continued the work of translating the Bible, as time and circumstances would allow, and in the month of May, when a number of Elders were present who did not understand the different spirits manifesting themselves in the land, Joseph inquired of the Lord for more intelligence on these matters, when he received the revelation which constitute the 50th section the Doctrine and Covenants.

Concerning the manifestations of these spirits Parley P. Pratt writes as follows: "As I went forth among the different branches, some very strange spiritual operations were manifested, which were disgusting rather than edifying. Some persons would seem to swoon away, and make unseemly gestures, and be drawn or disfigured in their countenances. Others would fall into ecstacies, and be drawn into contortions, cramp, fits, etc. Others would seem to have visions and revelations, which were not edifying, and which were not congenial to the doctrine and spirit of the gospel. In short, a false and lying spirit seemed to be creeping into the Church.

"All these things were new and strange to me, and had originated in the Church during our absence, and previous to the arrival of President Joseph Smith from New York.

"Feeling our weakness and inexperience, and lest we should err in judgment concerning these spiritual phenomena, myself, John Murdock, and several other Elders, went to Joseph Smith, and asked him to inquire of the Lord concerning these spirits or manifestations."

These brethren then joined in prayer in Joseph's translating room, and he dictated in their presence the above named revelation. "Each sentence," continues Elder Pratt, "was uttered slowly and very distinctly, and with a pause between each, sufficiently long for it to be recorded, by an ordinary writer, in long hand. This was the manner in which all his written revelations were dictated and written. There was never any hesitation, reviewing, or reading back, in order to keep the run of the subject; neither did any of these communications undergo revisions, interlinings, or corrections. As he dictated them so they stood, so far as I have witnessed; and I was present to witness the dictation of several communications of several pages each."

In that month (May) the Lord revealed his will to his servant Joseph about locating the Colesville Branch for a short season at Thompson (a place not far from Kirtland), agreeable to the principles of the United Order, about which the revelation contained a number of rules and regulations. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 21.)

On the 3rd of June, 1831, The Elders, who, according to the commandment of the Lord, had been out preaching the gospel, but had now returned from the various parts of the country where they had been laboring, assembled in Kirtland and held the conference previously appointed. Much instructions was given on this occasion by Joseph, who spoke with great power as he was moved by the Holy Ghost. The spirit of power and testimony also rested upon other Elders in a marvellous manner. Several of the brethren were selected by revelation, and ordained High Priests or to a higher degree of the Melchizedec Priesthood, after the order of the Son of God. This was the first occasion on which this Priesthood was fully revealed and conferred upon the Elders in this dispensation. Previous to this none of the brethren had been ordained to a higher position than the office of a common Elder, except Joseph and Oliver Cowdery, who, as previously related, had been ordained to the Apostleship by Peter, James and John. This was the fourth conference of the Church, and the number of members had now increased to about one thousand.

About this time Joseph received a revelation (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 52), in which the Lord commanded him and about thirty other Elders to journey westward, two and two, to preach the gospel and raise up branches of the Church wheresoever the people would receive their testimony. These Elders should travel by different routes and meet together in conference in the western part of Missouri, about one thousand miles west of Kirtland. The Lord also promised that if his Elders were faithful, the land of their inheritance, which was in the State of Missouri and then possessed by their enemies, should be made known unto them.

Shortly afterward Joseph received a revelation for Algernon Sidney Gilbert (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 52) and another for Newel Knight (Sec. 54). In the latter, the Colesville Branch, which had been located temporarily at Thompson, Ohio, and had there broken their covenants, were commanded to continue their journey to Missouri. These commandments were obeyed, and the Elders soon afterward started on their missions, two and two in company.

While Joseph Smith himself was preparing for the journey, William W. Phelps, who afterward became prominent in the Church, arrived from Kirtland "with his family, as he said to do the will of the Lord." Joseph inquired of the Lord for him and received a revelation for him. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 55.) Soon afterward Thomas B. Marsh also came to inquire what he should do, when another revelation was given through the Prophet. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 56.)

Joseph writes: "On the 19th of June, in company with Sidney Rigdon, Martin Harris, Edward Partridge, William W. Phelps, Joseph Coe, A. Sidney Gilbert and his wife, I started from Kirtland, Ohio, for the land of Missouri, agreeable to the commandment before received, wherein it was promised that if we were faithful, the land of our inheritance, even the place for the city of the New Jerusalem, should be revealed. We went by wagon, canal boats and stages to Cincinnati, where I had an interview with the Rev. Walter Scott, one of the founders of the Campbellites, or Newlight Church. Before the close of our interview, he manifested one of the bitterest spirits against the doctrine of the New Testament, where it says that these signs should follow them that believe (Mark 16: 17, 18), that I ever witnessed among men.

"We left Cincinnati in a steamer, and landed at Louisville, Kentucky, where we were detained three days in waiting for a steamer to convey us to St. Louis. From St. Louis, myself, and Brothers Harris, Phelps, Partridge and Coe, went by land on foot to Independence, Jackson County, Missouri, where we arrived about the middle of July; the rest of the company came by water a few days later.

"Notwithstanding the corruptions and abominations of the times, and the evil spirit manifested towards us on account of our belief in the Book of Mormon, at many places and among various persons, yet the Lord continued his watchful care and loving kindness to us day by day; and we made it a rule, wherever there was an opportunity, to read a chapter in the Bible, and pray; and these seasons of worship gave us great consolation. The meeting with our brethren, who had long awaited our arrival, was a glorious one, and moistened with many tears. It seemed good and pleasant for brethren to meet together in unity. But our reflections were many, coming as we had from a highly cultivated state of society in the East, and standing now upon the confines or western limits of the United States, and looking into the vast wilderness of those that sat in darkness. How natural it was to observe the degradation, leanness of intellect, ferocity and jealousy of a people that were nearly a century behind the time, and to feel for those who roamed about without the benefit of civilization, refinement, or religion; yea, and exclaim in the language of the Prophets: 'When will the wilderness blossom as a rose? When will Zion be built up in her glory, and where will thy Temple stand, unto which all nations shall come in the last days?' "

Shortly after their arrival in Jackson County, Joseph received a revelation (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 57) by which the anxiety of the brethren was relieved concerning their land of inheritance and the place where the New Jerusalem should be built. The Lord said in this revelation that Independence was the center place for the city, and that a spot for the Temple was lying westward, "upon a lot which was not far from the court house." The Lord also told the Saints that it was wisdom to buy land in all the regions round about that they might secure it for an everlasting inheritance. A. Sidney Gilbert was appointed by revelation to act as agent for the Church, in which capacity he was to receive means toward the purchase of land for the Saints. Edward Partridge, who previously had been ordained to the office of a Bishop, with two counselors as his assistants, was commanded to divide unto the Saints their inheritances according to the size of their respective families. The Bishop and agent were also commanded to make preparations for receiving the Saints who were on the road from Ohio, in order that they, on their arrival, might be located on the lots of their inheritances. A. Sidney Gilbert was furthermore commanded to open a store and establish himself as Church merchant, to "sell goods without fraud" and use the means acquired thereby for the purchase of lands. William W. Phelps was commanded to remain and establish himself as a printer for the Church. The brethren made immediate preparations to comply with all these commandments.

"The first Sabbath after our arrival in Jackson County," writes the Prophet, "Brother William W. Phelps preached to a western audience over the boundary of the United States, wherein were present specimens of all the families of the earth: Shem, Ham and Japhet; several of the Lamanites or Indians—representatives of Shem; quite a respectable number of negroes —descendants of Ham; and the balance was made up of citizens of the surrounding country and fully represented themselves as pioneers of the West. At this meeting two were baptized, who had previously believed in the fulness of the gospel. During this week the Colesville Branch, referred to in the latter part of the last revelation, and Sidney Rigdon, A. Sidney Gilbert and wife, and Elders Morley and Booth arrived."

August 1, 1831, a revelation (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 58) was given through the Prophet Joseph, in which the Lord chastised a number of the brethren and foretold that much tribulation would come over the Saints. He says:

"Ye cannot behold with your natural eyes, for the present time, the design of your God concerning those things which shall come hereafter, and the glory which shall follow after much tribulation. For after much tribulation cometh the blessings. Wherefore the day cometh that ye shall be crowned with much glory; the hour is not yet, but is nigh at hand. Remember this, which I tell you before, that you may lay it to heart, and receive that which is to follow."

This peculiar prediction the Saints could not then easily understand as there was no prospect of trouble at that time, but afterwards, by actual experience and the literal fulfillment of the revelation, they learned that Joseph indeed was a true Prophet.

Joseph continues: "On the 2nd of August, I assisted the Colesville Branch of the Church to lay the first log for a house, as a foundation of Zion in Kaw Township, twelve miles west of Independence. The log was carried and placed by twelve men, in honor of the twelve tribes of Israel. At the same time, through prayer, the land of Zion was consecrated and dedicated by Elder Rigdon for the gathering of the Saints. It was a season of joy to those present, and afforded a glimpse of the future, which time will yet unfold to the satisfaction of the faithful. * * * On the 3rd day of August, I proceeded to dedicate the spot for the Temple, a little west of Independence, and there were also present Sidney Rigdon, Edward Partridge, Wm. W. Phelps, Oliver Cowdery, Martin Harris and Joseph Coe.

The 87th Psalm was read: the scene was solemn and impressive.

On the 4th I attended the first conference in the land of Zion. It was held at the house of Brother Joshua Lewis, in Kaw Township, in the presence of the Colesville Branch of the Church. The Spirit of the Lord was there."

This was the fifth conference of the Church. On the 7th of August, Joseph attended the funeral of Sister Polly Knight, wife of Joseph Knight, sen. She was the first member of the Church who died in Jackson County. On the same day the Prophet received a revelation about the Sabbath. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 59.)

Aug. 8, 1831, Joseph received a revelation (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 60) commanding a number of Elders to return to the East, among whom were Joseph, Sidney Rigdon and Oliver Cowdery.

"On the 9th," writes Joseph, "in company with ten Elders, I left Independence Landing, for Kirtland. We started down the river in canoes, and went the first day as far as Fort Osage, where we had an excellent wild turkey for supper. Nothing very important occurred till the third day, when many of the dangers so common upon the western waters, manifested themselves; and after we had encamped upon the bank of the river, at McIlwaine's Bend, Brother Phelps, in open vision by daylight, saw the destroyer, in his most horrible power, ride upon the face of the waters; others heard the noise, but saw not the vision."

The next morning after prayer, Joseph received a revelation concerning the curse resting upon the waters because of the wickedness of men. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 61.)

On the 13th the company met several of the Elders on their way to the land of Zion, and after the joyful salutation with which brethren who are actually contending for the faith once delivered to the Saints meet each other, Joseph received another revelation (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 62), in which the Lord's will was manifested in regard to those who met the Prophet and his company.

"After this meeting with the Elders," continues Joseph, "Sidney Rigdon, Oliver Cowdery and myself continued our journey by land to St. Louis, where we overtook Brothers Phelps and Gilbert. From this place we took stage, and they went by water to Kirtland, where we arrived safe and well on the 27th. Many things transpired upon this journey to strengthen our faith, and which displayed the goodness of God in such a marvellous manner, that we could not help beholding the exertions of Satan to blind the eyes of the people, so as to hide the true light that lights every man that comes into the world."

CHAPTER 6.

The manner in which the land of Zion can be obtained.—Unsuccessful attempt in writing a revelation.—Mobbing in Hiram.—Joseph is acknowledged as president of the High Priesthood.—The Book of Commandments is printed. —An unlucky drive.—An attempt is made to poison Joseph.—The Evening and Morning Star.—Brigham Young's first meeting with the Prophet.—Remarkable prophecies.—An interesting conference.—The translation of the Bible finished.—Joseph makes a missionary trip to Canada.—Revelation concerning the exiled Saints.—A printing press established in Kirtland.

In these early days of the Church there was a great anxiety to obtain the word of the Lord upon every subject which in any way concerned the welfare and salvation of the Saints, and as "the land of Zion" at that time was the most important temporal object they had in view, Joseph inquired of the Lord for further information in regard to the gathering of the Saints to Missouri, the purchase of land and other matters connected therewith. In a revelation (Doc & Cov., Sec. 63) given in answer to this inquiry, the Lord explained the necessity of gathering means as soon as possible wherewith to purchase land in Jackson County; "for," says the Lord, "the land of Zion shall not be obtained but by purchase or by blood, otherwise there is no inheritance for you. And if by purchase, behold you are blessed; and if by blood, as you are forbidden to shed blood, lo, your enemies are upon you, and ye shall be scourged from city to city, and from synagogue to synagogue, and but few shall stand to receive an inheritance."

Joseph spent the forepart of September in making preparations to remove to the town of Hiram, Portage County, Ohio, there to recommence the translation of the Bible. Sept. 11th, he received another revelation (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 64), in which the Lord rebukes a number of leading men in the Church for not having kept his commandments. He also says that he would "retain a stronghold in the land of Kirtland for the space of five years."

The following day (Sept. 12th) Joseph returned with his family to the township of Hiram, situated about thirty miles southeast of Kirtland, and commenced living with John Johnson. (See pages 32 and 111.) About the same time Sidney Rigdon removed to Hiram to act in his office as Joseph's scribe. As soon as they had arranged the affairs of their new home, they resumed the work of translating the Scriptures, continuing with this labor as much as time would permit them during the following winter.

In the forepart of October Joseph received a commandment in relation to prayer (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 15), and toward the end of the month Orson Hyde, afterwards a prominent Apostle, was baptized. (See page 36.)

"About this time," writes Joseph, "Ezra Booth came out as an apostate. He came into the Church upon seeing a person healed of an infirmity of many years' standing. He had been a Methodist priest for some time previous to his embracing the fulness of the gospel, as developed in the Book of Mormon; and upon his admission into the Church he was ordained an Elder. As will be seen by the foregoing revelations, he went up to Missouri as a companion of Elder Morley; but when he actually learned that faith, humility, patience and tribulation go before blessing, and that God brings low before he exalts; that instead of the 'Savior's granting him power to smite men and make them believe,' (as he said he wanted God to do in his own case)—when he found he must become all things to all men, that he might, peradventure, save some; and that, too, by all diligence, by perils by sea and land, as was the case in the days of Jesus, then he was disappointed. In the 6th chapter of St. John's Gospel, 26th verse, it is written: 'Verily, verily I say unto you, ye seek me, not because ye saw the miracles, but because we did eat of the loaves, and were filled.' So it was with Booth; and when he was disappointed by his own evil heart, he turned away, and, as said before, became an apostate, and wrote a series of letters, which, by their coloring, falsity and vain calculations to overthrow the work of the Lord, exposed his weakness, wickedness and folly, and left him a monument of his own shame for the world to wonder at.

"A conference was held in which Brother William W. Phelps was instructed to stop at Cincinnati on his way to Missouri and purchase a press and type, for the purpose of establishing and publishing a monthly paper at Independence, Jackson County, Missouri, to be called the Evening and Morning Star. * * *

"On the 11th of October, a conference was held at Brother Johnson's where I was living, at which the Elders were instructed in the ancient manner of conducting meetings, of which knowledge most of them were ignorant. A committee of six was appointed to instruct the several branches of the Church. Elders David Whitmer and Reynolds Cahoon were appointed as two of the said committee; with the further duty on their mission, of setting forth the condition of Brothers Joseph Smith, jun., and Sidney Rigdon, that they might obtain means to continue the translation. This conference adjourned till the 25th of October, to meet at the house of Irenus Burnett, in Orange, Cuyahoga County.

"On the 21st, I attended a special conference, to settle a difficulty which had occurred in Kirtland, on account of William Cahoon and Peter Devolve having abused one of brother Whitney's children. Elder Rigdon and myself were appointed to go to Kirtland and settle the difficulty, which we did.

At the conference on the 25th, at Orange, twelve High Priests, seventeen Elders, four Priests, three Teachers and four Deacons, together with a large congregation, attended. Much business was done, and the four remaining members of the committee, authorized by the conference at Hiram on the 11th, were appointed, and consisted of Simeon Carter, Orson Hyde, Hyrum Smith and Emer Harris."

This was the sixth general conference of the Church.

At the request of Wm. E. McLellin Joseph inquired of the Lord and received a revelation calling Wm. E. McLellin and Samuel H. Smith to the ministry. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 66.)

Another special conference was held November 1, 1831, at Hiram, where it was decided that Oliver Cowdery should go to Independence, Missouri, with the revelations which Joseph had received up to that time, and get them printed. On the same day a revelation which was afterwards known as the Lord's Preface to the Book of Commandments was given. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 1.)

About this time there was some conversation among the brethren concerning revelations and language, and some of the Elders, who considered themselves learned men, thought the revelations which Joseph received might be written in a better style. While this was being discussed another revelation was given through the Prophet, in which the Lord said that the Elders who found fault with the language of the revelations might seek out the least revelation which Joseph had received, and appoint the wisest man among them to write one like it; and if they could do it, then they should be justified in saying they did not know that the commandment which Joseph had received were true, but if they could not do it, the Lord would condemn them, if they did not bear record that they were true. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 67.)

"After the foregoing was received," writes the Prophet, "William E. McLellin, as the wisest man, in his own estimation, having more learning than sense, endeavored to write a commandment like unto one of the least of the Lord's but failed; it was an awful responsibility to write in the name of the Lord. The Elders and all present, who witnessed this vain attempt of a man to imitate the language of Jesus Christ, renewed their faith in the fulness of the gospel, and in the truth of the commandments and revelations which the Lord had given to the Church through my instrumentality; and the Elders signified a willingness to bear testimony of their truth to all the world."

Wm. E. McLellin afterwards apostatized and became a bitter enemy to the work of God and to Joseph. (See pages 38 and 39.)

During that month (November) Joseph received four other revelations. In one of these, addressed to Orson Hyde, Luke S. Johnson, Lyman E. Johnson and Wm. E. McLellin (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 68), the Lord explains the nature and authority of the Aaronic Priesthood, the duties of parents toward their children, etc. He also says:

"Now I, the Lord, am not well pleased with the inhabitants of Zion (Jackson County, Missouri), for there are idlers among them; and their children are also growing up in wickedness; they also seek not earnestly the riches of eternity, but their eyes are full of greediness."

On the 3rd of November the revelation known as the Appendix (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 133) was given, and shortly afterwards a revelation (Sec. 69) appointing John Whitmer to accompany Oliver Cowdery to Missouri.

Joseph writes: "My time was occupied closely in reviewing the commandments and sitting in conference, for nearly two weeks; for from the 1st to the 12th of November we held four special conferences. In the last, which was held at Brother Johnson's in Hiram, after deliberate consideration, in consequence of the Book of Revelations, now to be printed, being the foundation of the Church in these last days, and a benefit to the world, showing that the keys of the mysteries of the kingdom of our Savior are again entrusted to man; and the riches of eternity within the compass of those who are willing to live by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God—therefore the conference voted that they prize the revelations to be worth to the Church the riches of the whole earth, speaking temporally. The great benefits to the world which result from the Book of Mormon and the revelations, which the Lord has seen fit in his infinite wisdom to grant unto us for our salvation, and for the salvation of all that will believe, were duly appreciated; and in answer to an inquiry, I received the following revelation." (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 70.)

In the latter part of November, Oliver Cowdery and John Whitmer took their departure for Jackson County, Missouri, with the revelations, which had been arranged and dedicated by prayer by the Prophet.

Wm. W. Phelps had already started for Missouri, and with a press and type which, according to instructions, he had purchased in Cincinnati, Ohio, he arrived safe and well at Independence. He immediately commenced to arrange the type preparatory for publishing a monthly paper in the interest of the Church. Quite a number of other Saints from Ohio removed to Missouri the same fall.

After Elders Cowdery and Whitmer had started for Missouri, Joseph resumed the work of translating the Scriptures and continued in this branch of his calling, with Sidney Rigdon as scribe, until the 1st of December, when both were called by revelation (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 71) to proclaim the gospel in the regions round about. In obedience to this commandment they went to Kirtland on the 3rd of December. On the 4th they met with a number of Elders and members at that place, on which occasion they also ordained Newel K. Whitney to the office of a Bishop and appointed him to preside over the Kirtland Stake. A revelation defining the duties of the Bishop at Kirtland and containing additional laws and commandments in relation to Church government was also given through the Prophet. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 72.) Joseph continues:

"From this time until the 8th or 10th of January, 1832, myself and Elder Rigdon continued to preach in Shalersville, Ravenna, and other places, setting forth the truth, vindicating the cause of our Redeemer; showing that the day of vengeance was coming upon this generation like a thief in the night; that prejudice, blindness and darkness filled the minds of many, and caused them to persecute the true Church, and reject the true light; by which means we did much towards allaying the excited feelings which were growing out of the scandalous letters then being published in the Ohio Star, at Ravenna, by the before-mentioned apostate, Ezra Booth."

January 10, 1832, Joseph was commanded to resume his work of translating the Scriptures and continue this labor until it was finished. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 73.) Subsequently he received by revelation an explanation of the First Epistle to the Corinthians, Chapter 7, Verse 14. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 74.)

January 25th, the seventh General conference of the Church was held, at Amherst, Lorraine County, Ohio. Considerable business was done, and a number of Elders were called by revelation (Doc. & Cov. 75) to the ministry, and appointed to take missions to various parts of the United States.

"Upon my return from Amherst conference," writes Joseph, "I resumed the translation of the Scriptures. From sundry revelations which had been received, it was apparent that many important points touching the salvation of man, had been taken from the Bible, or lost before it was compiled. It appeared self-evident from what truths were left, that if God rewarded every one according to the deeds done in the body, the term 'Heaven,' as intended for the Saints' eternal home, must include more kingdoms than one. Accordingly, on the 16th of February, 1832, while translating St. John's Gospel, myself and Elder Rigdon saw the following Vision. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 76.)

"Nothing could be more pleasing to the Saints upon the order of the Kingdom of the Lord, than the light which burst upon the world through the foregoing vision. Every law, every commandment, every promise, every truth and every point touching the destiny of man, from Genesis to Revelations, where the purity of the Scriptures remains unsullied by the folly of men, go to show the perfection of the theory of different degrees of glory in the future life, and witnesses the fact that that document is a transcript from the records of the eternal world. The sublimity of the ideas; the purity of the language; the scope for action; the continued duration for completion, in order that the heirs of salvation may confess the Lord and bow the knee; the rewards for faithfulness, and the punishments for sins, are so much beyond the narrow-mindedness of men, that every honest man is constrained to exclaim. 'It came from God.'

"About the 1st of March, in connection with the translation of the Scriptures, I received the following explanation of the revelations of St. John." (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 77.)

In March, 1832, Joseph received the revelations constituting Sections 78, 79, 80 and 81 of the Doctrine and Covenants. On the night of the 25th of March, Joseph and Sidney Rigdon were brutally treated by a mob at Hiram, and barely escaped with their lives. (See pages 112-114,) One of Joseph's children, an adopted son (Joseph Smith Murdock), who was sick with the measles and in bed with him at the time of the outrage, was thereby exposed to the night air, and died a few days later. He may, therefore, be called the first martyr of this dispensation.

April 2, 1832, in obedience to revelation (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 78, Verse 9), Joseph left Hiram to make another visit to Missouri, accompanied by Newel K. Whitney, Peter Whitmer, jun., and Jesse Gauze. Joseph writes:

"Not wishing to go to Kirtland, as another mob existed in that neighborhood (and indeed, the spirit of mobocracy was very prevalent through that whole region of country at the time), Brother George Pitkin took us in his wagon by the most expeditious route to Warren, where we arrived the same day, and were there joined by Elder Rigdon, who left Chardon in the morning; and proceeding onward, we arrived at Wellsville the next day, and the day following at Steubenville, where we left the wagon; on Wednesday, April 5th, we took passage on board a steam-packet for Wheeling, Virginia, where we purchased a lot of paper for the press in Zion, then in care of W. W. Phelps.

"After we left Hiram, fearing for the safety of my family, on account of the mob, I wrote to my wife (in connection with Bishop Whitney), suggesting that she go to Kirtland and tarry with Brother Whitney's family until our return. She went to Kirtland, to Brother Whitney's, and Sister Whitney's aunt, Sarah Smith (who was then living with her), inquired of her niece if my wife was going to stay there; and, on being answered in the affirmative, said she should go away, for there was not room enough for both of them. Accordingly, my wife left immediately, having enjoyed only about two hours' visit. She then went to Brother Reynolds Cahoon's, and Father Smith's, and Doctor Williams', where I found her very disconsolate on my return.

"From Wheeling we took passage on board the steamer Trenton. While at the dock, during the night, the boat was twice on fire, burning the whole width of the boat through into the cabin, but with so little damage that the boat went on in the morning; and when we arrived at Cincinnati, some of the mob, which had followed us, left us, and we arrived at Louisville the same night. Captain Brittle offered us protection on board of his boat, and gave us supper and breakfast gratuitously. At Louisville we were joined by Elder Titus Billings, who was journeying with a company of Saints from Kirtland to Zion, and we took passage on the steamer Charleston for St. Louis, where we parted with Brother Billings and company, and by stage arrived at Independence, Missouri, on the 24th of April, having traveled a distance of about three hundred miles from St. Louis. We found the brethren in Zion generally enjoying health and faith, and they were extremely glad to welcome us among them.

"On the 26th I called a general council of the Church, and was acknowledged as the President of the High Priesthood, according to a previous ordination at a conference of High Priests, Elders and members, held at Amherst, Ohio, January 25, 1832. The right hand of fellowship was given to me by the Bishop, Edward Partridge, in behalf of the Church. The scene was solemn, impressive and delightful. During the intermission, a difficulty or hardness, which had existed between Bishop Partridge and Elder Rigdon, was amicably settled, and when we came together in the afternoon, all hearts seemed to rejoice, and I received the following revelation, showing the order given to Enoch and the Church in his day. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 82.)

"On the 27th we transacted considerable business for the salvation of the Saints, who were settling among a ferocious set of mobbers, like lambs among wolves. It was my endeavor to so organize the Church, that the brethren might eventually be independent of every incumbrance beneath the celestial kingdom, by bonds and covenants of mutual friendship, and mutual love.

"On the 28th and 29th, I visited the brethren above Big Blue River, in Kaw Township, a few miles west of Independence, and received a welcome only known by brethren and sisters united as one in the same faith, and by the same baptism, and supported by the same Lord. The Colesville Branch, in particular, rejoiced as the ancient Saints did with Paul. It is good to rejoice with the people of God. On the 30th I returned to Independence, and again sat in council with the brethren and received the following revelation about the maintenance of widows and orphans in the Church. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 83.)

"Our council was continued on the 1st of May, when it was ordered that 3,000 copies of the Book of Commandments be printed as the first edition; that William W. Phelps, Oliver Cowdery and John Whitmer be appointed to review and prepare such revelations for the press as shall be deemed proper for publication, and print them as soon as possible at Independence, Missouri, the announcement to be made that they are 'published by W. W. Phelps & Co.' It was also ordered that Wm. W. Phelps correct and print the hymns which had been selected by Emma Smith in fulfillment of the revelation.

"Arrangements were also made for supplying the Saints with stores in Missouri and Ohio, which action, with a few exceptions, was hailed with joy by the brethren. Before we left Independence, Elder Rigdon preached two powerful discourses, which, so far as outward appearance was concerned, gave great satisfaction to the people.

"On the 6th of May I gave the parting hand to the brethren in Independence, and, in company with Brothers Rigdon and Whitney, commenced a return to Kirtland, by stage to St. Louis, from thence to Vincennes, Indiana, and from thence to New Albany, near the falls of the Ohio River. Before we arrived at the latter place, the horses became frightened, and while going at full speed Bishop Whitney attempted to jump out of the coach, but having his coat fast, caught his foot in the wheel, and had his leg and foot broken in several places; at the same time I jumped out unhurt. We put up at Mr. Porter's public house, in Greenville, for four weeks, while Elder Rigdon went directly forward to Kirtland. During all this time Brother Whitney lost not a meal of victuals or a night's sleep, and Doctor Porter, our landlord's brother who attended him, said, it was a pity we had not got some Mormons there, as they could set broken bones or do anything else. I tarried with Brother Whitney and administered to him till he was able to be moved.

"While at this place I frequently walked out in the woods, where I saw several fresh graves; and one day when I rose from the dinner-table, I walked directly to the door and commenced vomiting most profusely. I raised large quantities of blood and poisonous matter, and so great were the muscular contortions of my system, that my jaw in a few moments was dislocated. This I succeeded in replacing with my own hands, and made my way to Brother Whitney (who was on the bed), as speedily as possible; he laid his hands on me and administered to me in the name of the Lord, and I was healed in an instant, although the effect of the poison was so powerful, as to cause much of the hair to become loosened from my head. Thanks be to my heavenly Father for his interference in my behalf at this critical moment, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

"Brother Whitney had not had his foot moved from the bed for nearly four weeks, when I went into his room, after a walk in the grove, and told him if he would agree to start for home in the morning, we would take a wagon to the river, about four miles, and there would be a ferry-boat in waiting which would take us quickly across where we would find a hack which would take us directly to the landing, where we should find a boat in waiting, and we would be going up the river before 10 o'clock and have a prosperous journey home. He took courage and told me he would go. We started next morning and found everything as I had told him, for we were passing rapidly up the river before 10 o'clock, and landing at Wellsville, took stage-coach to Chardon, from thence in a wagon to Kirtland, where we arrived some time in June.

"As soon as I could arrange my affairs, I commenced the translation of the Scriptures, and thus I spent most of the summer."

In June, 1832, the first number of the Evening and Morning Star (See page 31) was published in Independence, Jackson County, Mo., by Wm. W. Phelps & Co. This was the first paper published by the Saints in this dispensation; its mission was to "spread light and truth among the children of men," assist the Elders in their missionary labor and teach and encourage the Saints generally. It was the only paper published in Upper Missouri at that time; its office being situated within twelve miles of the western boundary of the State of Missouri, and about 120 miles west of any other press in the States, 1,000 miles west from Kirtland and 1,300 miles from New York City. In connection with the Star a weekly paper called the Upper Missouri Advertizer was published, giving the general news of the day.

During the summer of 1832 the Elders continued to preach with unabated zeal, notwithstanding they were constantly subjected to abuse and persecution from the hands of the wicked. Branches of the Church were organized in various parts of the United States and Canada, and the work made rapid progress. In the fall the Elders began to return from their missions in the Eastern States and reported their several stewardships in the Lord's vineyard; and while they were yet together the Prophet inquired of the Lord and received on the 22nd and 23rd of September a very important revelation on Priesthood. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 84.) In this revelation the Lord says:

"Verily this is the word of the Lord, that the city New Jerusalem shall be built by the gathering of the Saints, beginning at this place, even the place of the Temple, which Temple shall be reared in this generation; for verily this generation shall not all pass away until an house shall be built unto the Lord, and a cloud shall rest upon it, which cloud shall be even the glory of the Lord which shall fill the house."

The following glorious promises were also made by the Lord to his servants on the same occasion, the fulfillment of which in thousands of cases ought to convince every honest-minded person that Joseph Smith was indeed a Prophet of the living God:

"Therefore, as I said unto mine Apostles, I say unto you again, that every soul who believeth on your words, and is baptized by water for the remission of sins, shall receive the Holy Ghost; and these signs shall follow them that believe:—In my name they shall do many wonderful works; in my name they shall cast out devils; in my name they shall heal the sick; in my name they shall open the eyes of the blind, and unstop the ears of the deaf; and the tongue of the dumb shall speak; and if any man shall adminster poison unto them it shall not hurt them; and the poison of a serpent shall not have power to harm them."

Joseph continued to translate and administer to the Church through the fall, excepting a rapid journey to Albany, New York and Boston, in company with Bishop Newel K. Whitney, from which he returned on the 6th of November, immediately after the birth of his eldest son Joseph, who was born at Kirtland, Ohio, November 6, 1832.

The Saints in Jackson County made rapid progress and their number increased steadily by the immigration of Saints from various parts of the country. Large tracts of land were purchased from the United States government, several hundred farms were opened, and mills and many extensive improvements commenced. On the 27th of November, Joseph wrote an encouraging letter and revelation to the Saints in Zion (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 85), while an extensive correspondence was kept up between the two places, Kirtland and Independence.

Some time during that month (November), Joseph met Brigham Young and Heber C. Kimball, who came to Kirtland on a visit. (See pages 25 and 33.)

December 6, 1832, Joseph received a revelation explaining the parable of the wheat and the tares (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 86), and on the 25th the important revelation foretelling the war between the Southern and Northern States, which broke out 29 years later. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 87.)

In a communication which was written a few days later to N. C. Seaton, editor of a paper published in Rochester, New York, the Prophet says:

"I am prepared to say by the authority of Jesus Christ, that not many years shall pass away before the United States shall present such a scene of bloodshed as has not a parallel in the history of our nation."

The literal fulfilment of these predictions is now a matter of history. In the same letter the Prophet further says:

"I declare unto you the warning which the Lord has commanded me to declare unto this generation, remembering that the eyes of my Maker are upon me, and that to him I am accountable for every word I say, wishing nothing worse to my fellowmen than their eternal salvation; therefore, 'Fear God, and give glory to him, for the hour of his judgment is come.' Repent ye, repent ye, and embrace the everlasting covenant, and flee to Zion, before the overflowing scourge overtake you; for there are those now living upon the earth whose eyes shall not be closed in death until they see all these things, which I have spoken, fulfilled."

On December 27th Joseph received that lengthy, important revelation which was afterwards known among the Saints as the "Olive Leaf." (Doc. & Co., Sec. 88.) In this the Lord revealed many grand and glorious principles and foretold some of the great things which will come to pass in the last days. It also contained a commandment to the Saints to build a "House of God" in Kirtland (Verse 119), and to open a school for the benefit of the Elders, to be known as the school of the Prophets (Verse 127).

In those days Joseph was much troubled in spirit by the conduct of the leading Elders and the Saints in Jackson County, Missouri. They obeyed not the commandments which the Lord had given them as strictly as they should have done, although they did not transgress the laws of the country. But Joseph did not hide the word of the Lord for them. In a letter which he wrote to Wm. W. Phelps, editor of the Star, he gave them solemn warnings of the judgments that were in store for them in consequence of their transgressions, and urged them to repent.

On the 14th of January, 1833, a conference of twelve High Priests sent a long epistle of the same nature to the Saints in Missouri. After receiving these warnings the Saints in Zion commenced to humble themselves and repent of their sins. Thus a special council of High Priests assembled in Zion, February 26, 1833, and a general epistle was written to the Presidency in Kirtland, in which the Saints in Zion promised to obey the commandment of the Lord. With this Joseph and the brethren in Kirtland were satisfied, and in a revelation subsequently given through Joseph, the Lord acknowledged their repentance and said that the angels rejoiced over them. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 91, Verse 34.)

During that month (February, 1833) Joseph organized the School of the Prophets in Kirtland, in which institution of learning the Elders made good progress in the knowledge of God. The school was continued during the winter. As there was no suitable school building in Kirtland at that time, the brethren hired a room for school purposes. Joseph writes:

"This winter (1832-1833) was spent in translating the Scriptures, in the School of the Prophets, and sitting in conferences. I had many glorious seasons of refreshing. The gifts which follow them that believe and obey the gospel, as tokens that the Lord is ever the same in his dealings with the humble lovers and followers of truth, began to be poured out among us, as in ancient days, for as we, viz., Joseph Smith, jun., Sidney Rigdon, Frederick G. Williams, Newel K. Whitney, Hyrum Smith, Zebedee Coltrin, Joseph Smith, sen., Samuel H. Smith, John Murdock, Lyman E. Johnson, Orson Hyde and Ezra Thayer, High Priests, and Levi W. Hancock and William Smith, Elders, were assembled in conference, on the 22nd day of January (1833), I spoke to the conference in another tongue, and was followed in the same gift by Brother Zebedee Coltrin, and he by Brother William Smith, after which the Lord poured out his spirit in a miraculaus manner, until all the Elders present spake in tongues, and several members, both male and female, exercised the same gift. Great and glorious were the divine manifestations of the Holy Spirit. Praises were sung to God and the Lamb; speaking and praying, all in tongues, occupied the conference until a late hour at night, so rejoiced were we at the return of these long absent blessings.

"On the 23rd of January we again assembled in conference; when, after much speaking, singing, praying, and praising God, all in tongues, we proceeded to the washing of feet (according to the practice recorded in the 13th chapter of John's Gospel), as commanded of the Lord. Each Elder washed his own feet first, after which I girded myself with a towel and washed the feet of all of them, wiping them with the towel with which I was girded. Among the number, my father presented himself, but before I washed his feet, I asked of him a father's blessing, which he granted by laying his hands upon my head, in the name of Jesus Christ, and declaring that I should continue in the Priest's office until Christ comes. At the close of the scene, Brother Frederick G. Williams, being moved upon by the Holy Ghost, washed my feet in token of his fixed determination to be with me in suffering, or in journeying, in life or in death, and to be continually on my right hand; in which I accepted him in the name of the Lord.

"I then said to the Elders: As I have done, so do ye: wash ye, therefore, one another's feet; and by the power of the Holy Ghost I pronounced them all clean from the blood of this generation; but if any of them should sin wilfully after they were thus cleansed and sealed up unto life eternal, they should be given over to the buffetings of Satan until the day of redemption. Having continued all day in fasting, prayer, and ordinances, we closed by partaking of the Lord's Supper. I blessed the bread and wine in the name of the Lord, when we all ate and drank and were filled; then sung a hynm and the meeting adjourned.

"I completed the translation and review of the New Testament, February 2, 1833, and sealed it up, no more to to be opened till it arrived in Zion."

February 27, 1833, Joseph received the revelation known as the Word of Wisdom. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 89.) On the 8th of March he received a revelation concerning the keys of the Kingdom (Sec. 90), the following day one in relation to the Apocrypha (Sec. 91), and on the 15th of the same month the Lord gave him commandments concerning the order of the Church for the benefit of the poor (Sec. 92).

In a meeting of High Priests held in the "school-room of the Prophets" in Kirtland, March 18, 1833, Joseph Smith ordained Sidney Rigdon and Frederick G. Williams to act as his counselors in the Presidency of the High Priesthood according to revelation. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 90, Verse 6.) This was the first organization of the First Presidency of the Church. (See page 73.) About this meeting Joseph writes:

"I exhorted the brethren to faithfulness and diligence in keeping the commandments of God, and gave much instruction for the benefit of the Saints, with a promise that the pure in heart should see a heavenly vision; and after remaining a short time in secret prayer, the promise was verified; for many present had the eyes of their understanding opened by the spirit of God, so as to behold many things. I then blessed the bread and wine, and distributed a portion to each. Many of the brethren saw a heavenly vision of the Savior, and concourses of angels, and many other things, of which each one has a record of what they saw."

May 6, 1833, two important revelations were given through the Prophet. (Doc. & Cov., Secs. 93 and 94.) In one of these the Lord gave instructions in relation to the dimensions of the Temple to be built to his name in Kirtland. On the 1st of June another revelation was given on the same subject Doc. & Cov., Sec. 95), and on the 4th the Lord instructed Joseph in regard to the order of the city or Stake of Kirtland (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 96), the building of which absorbed the attention of the Saints for a number of years afterwards. (See Kirtland, page 62.)

June 25, 1833, the First Presidency in Kirtland wrote an important letter to William W. Phelps and the Saints in Missouri. We give the following extracts:

"The truth triumphs gloriously in the East; multitudes are embracing it. * * * We send by this mail a draft of the city of Zion, with explanations, and a draft of the house to be built immediately in Zion, for the Presidency, as well as for all purposes of religion and instruction.

"Kirtland, the Stake of Zion, is strengthening continually. When the enemies look at her, they wag their heads and march along. * * *

"A man is bound by the law of the Church, to consecrate to the Bishop, before he can be considered a legal heir to the kingdom of Zion; and this, too, without constraint; and unless he does this, he cannot be acknowledged before the Lord on the Church Book. * * *

"The matter of consecration must be done by the mutual consent of both parties; for to give the Bishop power to say how much every man shall have, and he be obliged to comply with the Bishop's judgment, is giving to the Bishop more power than a king has; and, upon the other hand, to let every man say how much he needs, and the Bishop be obliged to comply with his judgment, is to throw Zion into confusion, and make a slave of the Bishop. The fact is, there must be a balance of equilibrium of power between the Bishop and the people; and thus harmony and good-will may be preserved among you. Therefore, those persons consecrating property to the Bishop in Zion, and then receiving an inheritance back, must reasonably show to the Bishop that he wants as much as he claims. But in case the two parties cannot come to a mutual agreement, the Bishop is to have nothing to do about receiving such consecrations; and the case must be laid before a council of twelve High Priests, the Bishop not being one of the council, but he is to lay the case before them. * * *

"When the Bishops are appointed according to our recommendation, it will devolve upon them to see to the poor, according to the laws of the Church. In regard to the printing of the New Translation, it cannot be done until we can attend to it ourselves, and this we will do as soon as the Lord permits. * * *

"The order of the Literary Firm is a matter of stewardship, which is of the greatest importance; and the mercantile establishment God commanded to be devoted to the support thereof, and God will bring every transgression into judgment.

"Say to the brothers Hulet, and to all others, that the Lord never authorized them to say, that the devil, his angels, or the sons of perdition, should ever be restored; for their state of destiny was not revealed to man, is not revealed, nor ever shall be revealed, save to those who are made partakers thereof; consequently those who teach this doctrine have not received it of the spirit of the Lord. Truly Brother Oliver declared it to be the doctrine of devils. We, therefore, command that this doctrine be taught no more in Zion. * * * * The number of disciples in Kirtland is about one hundred and fifty. We have commenced building the House of the Lord, in this place, and it goes on rapidly. Good news from the east and south of the success of the labarers is often saluting our ears. It is a general time of health among us; families all well, and day and night we pray for the salvation of Zion."

July 2, 1833, Joseph finished the translation of the Bible, and on the 23rd the corner stones of the Kirtland Temple were laid. (See Kirtland Temple, page 74.)

On the 2nd of August the Prophet received a comforting revelation concerning the Saints in Missouri (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 97), and on the 6th another revelation commanding the Saints to observe the constitutional laws of the land, to forgive their enemies and cultivate a spirit of charity towards all men. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 98.)

A few days later John Murdock was called to the ministry by revelation. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 99.)

In the beginning of September Oliver Cowdery arrived at Kirtland as a special messenger from the Saints in Missouri, bringing news of the persecutions, the destruction of the printing office, etc., in Jackson County. Arrangements were made to dispatch Elders Orson Hyde and John Gould to Missouri, with advice to the Saints in their unfortunate situation.

September 11, 1833, Joseph Smith, Frederick G. Williams, Sidney Rigdon, Newell K. Whitney and Oliver Cowdery (delegate from the Saints in Missouri) met in council to consider the expediency of establishing a printing press in Kirtland. It was resolved that such a press be established and "conducted under the firm name of F. G. Williams & Co., and that a periodical entitled The Latter-day Saints' Messenger and Advocate be published; also that the Star, formerly published in Jackson County, Mo., be printed by the new firm at Kirtland." Soon afterward Oliver Cowdery and Bishop Whitney were sent to New York to purchase a press and other necessary material for a printing office.

The following is Joseph's own account of a missionary trip made by him to Canada:

"On the 5th of October, 1833, I started on a journey east, and to Canada, in company with Elders Rigdon and Freeman Nickerson, and arrived the same day at Lamb's Tavern, in Ashtabula; and the day following, the Sabbath, we arrived at Springfield, whilst the brethren were in meeting, and Elder Rigdon spoke to the congregation. A large and attentive congregation assembled at Brother Rudd's in the evening, to whom we bore our testimony.

"We continued at Springfield until the 8th of October, when we removed to Brother Roundy's at Elk Creek; and, continuing our journey, on the evening of the 9th arrived at a tavern, and on the 10th, at Brother Job Lewis', in Westfield, where we met the brethren according to previous appointment, and spoke to them as the Spirit gave utterance, greatly to their gratification. * * *

"On the day following (Oct. 13th) Elder Rigdon preached to a large congregation, at Freeman Nickerson's, and I bore record, while the Lord gave us his spirit in a remarkable manner.

"Monday, 14th. Continued our journey towards Canada, and arrived at Lodi, where we had an appointment, and preached in the evening to a small assembly, and made an appointment for Tuesday, the 15th at 10 o'clock a. m., to be in the Presbyterian meeting-house. When the hour arrived, the keeper of the house refused to open the doors, and the meeting was thus prevented. We came immediately away, leaving the people in great confusion, and continued our journey till Friday, the 18th, when we arrived at the house of Freeman A. Nickerson, in Upper Canada, having passed through a fine and well-cultivated country, after entering the province, and having had many peculiar feelings in relation to both the country and people. We were kindly received by Freeman A. Nickerson, who lived at Mount Pleasant, which was near Brantford, the county seat of Brant County.

"Sunday, 20th. At ten o'clock, we met an attentive congregation at Brantford; and the same evening a large assembly at Mount Pleasant, at Mr. Nickerson's. The people gave good heed to the things spoken.

"Tuesday, 22nd. We went to the village of Colburn, and although it snowed severely, we held a meeting by candle light on Wednesday evening, and were publicly opposed by a Wesleyan Methodist. He was very tumultuous, but exhibited a great lack of reason, knowledge, and wisdom, and gave us no opportunity to reply.

"Thursday, 24th. At the house of Mr. Beman, in Colburn, whence we left for Waterford, where we spoke to a small congregation, occasioned by the rain; thence to Mount Pleasant, and preached to a large congregation the same evening, when Freeman A. Nickerson and his wife declared their belief in the work, and offered themselves for baptism. Great excitement prevailed in every place we visited.

"Saturday, 25th. Preached at Mount Pleasant; the people were very tender and inquiring.

"Sunday, 27th. Preached to a large congregation at Mount Pleasant, after which I baptized twelve, and others were deeply impressed, and desired another meeting, which I appointed for the day following.

"Monday, 28th. In the evening we broke bread, and laid on hands for the gift of the Holy Ghost and for confirmation, having baptized two more. The Spirit was given in great power to some, and peace to others.

"Tuesday, 29th. After preaching at 10 o'clock a. m., I baptized two, and confirmed them at the water's side. Last evening we ordained Freeman Nickerson an Elder; and one of the sisters received the gift of tongues, which made the Saints rejoice exceedingly. * * *

"We took our departure from Mount Pleasant, on our return to Kirtland, and arrived at Buffalo, New York, on the 31st.

"Friday, November 1st, I left Buffalo, New York, at 8 o'clock a. m., and arrived at my house in Kirtland on Monday, the 4th, 10 a. m., and found my family well, according to the promise of the Lord in the revelation of October 12th, for which I felt to thank my heavenly Father."

Under the date of November 19th the Prophet records the following:

"My heart is somewhat sorrowful, but I feel to trust in the Lord, the God of Jacob. I have learned in my travels that man is treacherous and selfish, but few excepted. * * * The man who willeth to do well, we should extol his virtues, and speak not of his faults behind his back. A man who wilfully turneth away from his friend without a cause, is not easily forgiven. The kindness of a man should never be forgotten. That person who never forsaketh his trust, should ever have the highest place of regard in our hearts, and our love should never fail, but increase more and more, and this is my disposition and these my sentiments.

November 25th, Elders Orson Hyde and John Gould returned to Kirtland from Missouri, bringing the melancholy intelligence of the mobbings and persecutions in Jackson County. A few days later the Prophet received communications from W. W. Phelps, Bishop Partridge and other leading men in Missouri, giving the particulars of the expulsion of the Saints from Jackson County the month previous.

On the 10th of December, Joseph wrote a lengthy communication addressed to Edward Partridge, William W. Phelps, John Whitmer, A. Sidney Gilbert, John Corrill, Isaac Morley and the Saints generally, of which the following are extracts:

"I cannot learn from any communication by the Spirit to me, that Zion has forfeited her claim to a celestial crown, notwithstanding the Lord has caused her to be thus afflicted, except it may be some individuals, who have walked in disobedience, and forsaken the new covenant; all such will be made manifest by their works in due time. I have always expected that Zion would suffer some affliction, from what I could learn from the commandments which have been given. But I would remind you of a certain clause in one which says, that after much tribulation cometh the blessing. By this, and also others, and also one received of late, I know that Zion, in the due time of the Lord, will be redeemed; but how many will be the days of her purification, tribulation and affliction, the Lord has kept hid from my eyes; and when I inquire concerning this subject, the voice of the Lord is: Be still, and know that I am God! All those who suffer for my name shall reign with me, and he that layeth down his life for my sake shall find it again. Now, there are two things of which I am ignorant; and the Lord will not show them unto me, perhaps for a wise purpose in himself—I mean in some respects—and they are these: Why God has suffered so great a calamity to come upon Zion, and what the great moving cause of this great affliction is; and again, by what means he will return her back to her inheritance, with songs of everlasting joy upon her head. These two things, brethren, are in part kept back that they are not plainly shown unto me; but there are some things that are plainly manifested which have incurred the displeasure of the Almighty.

"When I contemplate upon all things that have been manifested, I am aware that I ought not to murmur, and do not murmur only in this, that those who are innocent are compelled to suffer for the iniquities of the guilty; and I cannot account for this, only on this wise, that the saying of the Savior has not been strictly observed: 'If thy right eye offend thee, pluck it out, and cast it from thee; or if thy right arm offend thee, cut it off, and cast it from thee.' Now the fact is, if any of the members of our body is disordered, the rest of our body will be affected with it, and then all are brought into bondage together; and yet, notwithstanding all this, it is with difficulty that I can restrain my feelings when I know that you, my brethren, with whom I have had so many happy hours—sitting, as it were, in heavenly places in Christ Jesus; and also, having the witness which I feel, and ever have felt, of the purity of your motives—are cast out, and are as strangers and pilgrims on the earth, exposed to hunger, cold, nakedness, peril, sword—I say, when I contemplate this, it is with difficulty that I can keep from complaining and murmuring against this dispensation; but I am sensible that this is not right, and may God grant, that notwithstanding your great afflictions and sufferings, there may not anything separate us from the love of Christ.

"Brethren, when we learn your sufferings, it awakens every sympathy of our hearts; it weighs us down; we cannot refrain from tears, yet, we are not able to realize, only in part, your sufferings; and I often hear the brethren saying, they wish they were with you, that they might bear a part of your sufferings; and I myself should have been with you, had not God prevented it in the order of his providence, that the yoke of affliction might be less grievous upon you, God having forewarned me, concerning these things, for your sakes; and also, Elder Cowdery could not lighten your afflictions by tarrying longer with you, for his presence would have so much the more enraged your enemies; therefore God hath dealt mercifully with us.

"O brethren, let us be thankful that it is as well with us as it is, and we are yet alive, and peradventure, God hath laid up in store great good for us in this generation, and may grant that we may yet glorify his name.

"I feel thankful that there have no more denied the faith; I pray God in the name of Jesus Christ that you all may be kept in the faith unto the end; let your sufferings be what they may, it is better in the eyes of God that you should die than that you should give up the land of Zion, the inheritances which you have purchased with your moneys; for every man that giveth not up his inheritance, though he should die, yet, when the Lord shall come, he shall stand upon it, and with Job, in his flesh he shall see God. Therefore, this is my counsel, that you retain your lands, even unto the uttermost, and employ every lawful means to seek redress of your enemies; and pray to God, day and night, to return you in peace and in safety to the lands of your inheritance: and when the judge fails you, appeal unto the executive; and when the executive fails you, appeal unto the President; and when the President fails you, and all laws fail you, and the humanity of the people fails you, and all things else fail you but God alone, and you continue to weary him with your importunings, as the poor woman did the unjust judge, he will not fail to execute judgment upon your enemies, and to avenge his own elect that cry unto him day and night.

"Behold, he will not fail you! He will come with ten thousand of his Saints, and all his adversaries shall be destroyed with the breath of his lips! All those who keep their inheritances, notwithstanding they should be beaten and driven, shall be likened unto the wise virgins who took oil in their lamps. But all those who are unbelieving and fearful will be likened unto the foolish virgins, who took no oil in their lamps; and when they shall return and say unto the Saints, Give us of your lands—behold, there will be no room found for them. As respects giving deeds, I would advise you to give deeds as far as the brethren have legal and just claims for them, and then let every man answer to God for the disposal of them. * * *

"Now hear the prayer of your unworthy brother in the new and everlasting covenant: —O my God! Thou who hast called and chosen a few, through thy weak instrument, by commandment and sent them to Missouri, a place which thou didst call Zion, and commanded thy servants to consecrate it unto thyself for a place of refuge and safety for the gathering of thy Saints, to be built up a holy city unto thyself; and as thou hast said that no other place should be appointed like unto this, therefore, I ask thee, in the name of Jesus Christ, to return thy people unto their houses and their inheritances, to enjoy the fruit of their labors; that all the waste places may be built up; that all the enemies of thy people, who will not repent and turn unto thee, may be destroyed from off the face of the land; and let a house be built and established unto thy name; and let all the losses that thy people have sustained be rewarded unto them, even more than fourfold, that the borders of Zion may be enlarged forever; and let her be established no more to be thrown down; and let all thy Saints, when they are scattered as sheep, and are persecuted, flee unto Zion, and be established in the midst of her; and let her be organized according to thy law; and let this prayer ever be recorded before thy face. Give thy Holy Spirit unto my brethren, unto whom I write; send thine angels to guard them, and deliver them from all evil; and when they turn their faces toward Zion, and bow down before thee and pray, may their sins never come up before thy face, neither have place in the book of thy remembrance; and may they depart from all their iniquities. Provide food for them as thou doest for the ravens; provide clothing to cover their nakedness, and houses that they may dwell therein; give unto them friends in abundance, let their names be recorded in the Lamb's book of life, eternally before thy face. Amen."

A few days later (December 16th) Joseph received a revelation, in which the Lord said, that he had allowed these afflictions to come upon the inhabitants of Zion in consequence of their transgressions, but that he would still be merciful unto them and in his own due time permit the pure in heart to return to their inheritances. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 101.)

Oliver Cowdery and Bishop Whitney, who some time previous had been sent to New York to purchase a new press, type, etc., for a printing office, and also merchandise wherewith to stock a store which they intended to open in Kirtland, returned to the latter place December 1st, and on the 18th "the printing press, and all that pertained thereto, was dedicated to God by Joseph Smith, Hyrum Smith and Sidney Rigdon; after which they commenced to publish The Evening and Morning Star, with Oliver Cowdery as editor." On the same day Joseph Smith, sen., the Prophet's father, was ordained to the office of Patriarch to the Church. (See Page 89.)

December 19th, William Pratt and David W. Patten left Kirtland for Missouri, bearing dispatches from the First Presidency to the exiled Saints.

December 26, 1835, Joseph received a revelation concerning Lyman Sherman. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 108.)

CHAPTER 7.

The first High Council of the Church is organized.—Dr. Hurlburt's annoyances.—Conference in New Portage.—Zion's Camp.—The Messenger and Advocate first published.—Joseph visits the Saints in Michigan.—The law of tithing introduced.

January 22, 1834, the Presidency in Kirtland wrote a comforting letter to the Saints in Missouri, which they forwarded together with a copy of the revelation given December 16, 1833. Some means which had been gathered among the eastern branches for the relief of the exiled Saints was also sent.

February 17, 1834, the first High Council of the Church was organized in Joseph Smith's house in Kirtland, aggreeable to revelation; 24 High Priests were present on that occasion, and by their unanimous vote Joseph Smith, jun., Sidney Rigdon and Frederick G. Williams were acknowledged as presidents, and Joseph Smith, sen., John Smith, Joseph Coe, John Johnson, Martin Harris, John S. Carter, Jacob Carter, Oliver Cowdery, Samuel H. Smith, Orson Hyde, Sylvester Smith and Luke S. Johnson were chosen as members of the council, which was appointed by revelation for the purpose of settling important difficulties that might arise in the Church, which could not be settled by the Church or the Bishop's council to the satisfaction of the parties. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 102.) In the next meeting held on the 19th, Joseph laid his hands on the twelve councilors and the assistant presidents and blessed them. He also gave excellent instructions in regard to the duties connected with their high and important calling. There being at that time a number of complaints against some of the brethren and several cases of importance to consider, the council was soon busy in regular sessions.

Previous to this an apostate by the name of Doctor P. Hurlburt had visited the State of New York, and there gathered up all the ridiculous stories that could be invented, and had even secured some affidavits respecting the character of Joseph and the Smith family, which subsequently were proven to be absolutely false. With these papers he returned to Ohio and stirred up much indignation against Joseph and the Church by lecturing before numerous congregations in Chagrin, Kirtland, Mentor, Painesville and other places. He even threatened that he would take Joseph's life, if he could not destroy "Mormonism" by any other means. For these threats he was arrested, and after an impartial trial in the town of Chardon bound over in the sum of $200 to keep the peace in six months, and also to pay the costs of suit, which amounted to about three hundred dollars.

On the 24th of February Joseph received a revelation, in which the Lord commanded him to gather the strength of the Church, the young and middle-aged men, from the various branches in the East, and march with them to Missouri to redeem Zion. Joseph Smith, Sidney Rigdon, Hyrum Smith, Frederick G. Williams, Orson Hyde, Orson Pratt, Parley P. Pratt and Lyman Wight were called by revelation to go out two and two in different directions and gather the men and preach to the people. Joseph and Parley P. Pratt were to travel together. (Doc. and Cov., Sec. 103.) They left Kirtland February 26th and traveled eastward to the State of New York, visiting the several branches of the Church on their way and also held meetings with strangers wherever they had opportunity to do so. On several occasions they spoke to large congregations and bore powerful testimonies of the restoration of the fulness of the gospel, which in several places bore good fruit. In Freedom, Cataraugus County, New York, they baptized Heman Hyde, and in a short time a branch of 30 or 40 members was organized there. In Genesee they met Sidney Rigdon and other brethren from Kirtland, and together with them they held a conference at Avon, Livingston County, New York, March 16th, where considerable business was transacted in the interest of the Church. From this conference Joseph returned to Kirtland, where he arrived March 28th, having been absent about a month and had a pleasant and successful journey. The Spirit of God rested upon many of the young and middle-aged men of the Church, who cheerfully volunteered to go to Missouri to aid their suffering brethren. It was after Joseph's return from this trip that he met in the court at Chardon against Doctor Hurlburt with the above-mentioned result.

Joseph writes: "April 18th, 1834, in company with Elders Sidney Rigdon, Oliver Cowdery and Zebedee Coltrin, I left Kirtland for New Portage, to attend a conference; dined at W. W. Williams', in Newburgh, and continuing our journey, after dark, we were hailed by a man who desired to ride. We were checked by the Spirit, and refused. He professed to be sick, but in a few minutes was joined by two others, who followed us hard, cursing and swearing; but we were successful in escaping their hands, through the providence of the Lord, and stayed that night at a tavern where we were treated with civility.

"On the 19th, we continued our journey, dined at Brother Joseph Bosworth's, in Copley, Medina County. Brother Bosworth was strong in the faith, and, if faithful, may do much good. We arrived the same day at Brother Jonathan Taylor's, in Norton, where we were received with kindness. We soon retired to the wilderness, where we united in prayer and supplication for the blessings of the Lord to be given unto his Church. We called upon the Father in the name of Jesus, to go with the brethren who were going to the land of Zion; and that I might have strength, and wisdom, and understanding sufficient to lead the people of the Lord, and to gather and establish the Saints upon the land of their inheritances, and organize them according to the will of Heaven, that they may be no more cast down for ever. We then united in the laying on of hands.

"Elders Rigdon, Cowdery and Coltrin laid their hands on my head, and conferred upon me all the blessings necessary to qualify me to stand before the Lord, in my calling, and return again in peace and triumph, to enjoy the society of my brethren.

"Those present then laid their hands upon the head of Elder Rigdon, and confirmed upon him the blessings of wisdom and knowledge to preside over the Church in my absence; also to have the spirit to assist Elder Cowdery in conducting the Star. * * *

"Previous to blessing Elder Rigdon, we laid hands on Elder Oliver Cowdery, and confirmed upon him the blessings of wisdom and understanding sufficient for his station, that he be qualified to assist Elder Rigdon in arranging the Church Book of Covenants, which is soon to be published; and have intelligence in all things to do the work of printing.

"After blessing Elder Rigdon, we laid our hands upon Brother Zebedee Coltrin, and confirmed the blessing of wisdom to preach the gospel, even till it spreads to the islands of the seas, and to be spared to see three score years and ten, and see Zion built up, and Kirtland established for ever, and even at last to receive a crown of life. Our hearts rejoiced, and we were comforted with the Holy Spirit."

After attending the conference in New Portage on the 21st of April, Joseph returned to Kirtland, where he, on the 23rd, received a revelation concerning the United Order, which the Lord desired to introduce among the Saints. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 104.)

In a conference held in Kirtland, May 3rd, the Church, agreeable to the will of the Lord, was first named "The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints."

On the 5th Joseph left Kirtland with about one hundred armed men, (see Zion's Camp) and arrived, after a long and difficult journey, in Missouri. Joseph visited Jackson County on the 1st of July, organized a High Council (the second in the Church) in Clay County on the 3rd, and in a number of meetings, which he subsequently attended, gave the members of the council and other officers of the Church, as well as the brethren of the Camp, much valuable instructions. (See Clay County.)

On the 9th Joseph and his brother Hyrum and some other Elders started from Clay County, to return to Kirtland, Ohio, where Joseph arrived by stage about the 1st of August, having had a tedious journey in the midst of enemies, mobs, cholera and excessively hot weather. He had parted with the brethren who started from Missouri with him at various points of the journey. On the morning of the day on which Joseph and his companions passed through Richmond, Indiana, on the homeward journey, a paper published at that place contained an article, stating that Joseph Smith and his company had fought a battle with the Missourians, that he (Joseph) had been wounded in the leg, that the wound was so severe that his leg had been amputated, and that three days after losing his leg he had died. Joseph and his brother Hyrum called on the editor, but it was with difficulty that he could be persuaded to believe that the story he had published was false.

After Joseph's return to Kirtland, a council was convened, in which all his proceedings during his journey to and from Missouri were thoroughly investigated. Sylvester Smith, who had been a member of the Camp, had circulated many stories about Joseph's conduct, and had tried to blacken his character in various ways. In order to correct these falsehoods the Elders called this council, in which the brethren who had traveled in Joseph's company gave their testimony, and after due examination the council published to the Church and the brethren scattered abroad that they were perfectly satisfied with his conduct, having learned from the clearest evidence that he had acted in every respect worthy of his high and responsible station in the Church. The council subsequently had the case of Sylvester Smith under consideration, and to retain his standing in the Church he had to confess that he had maliciously told falsehoods about Joseph.

For about six weeks Joseph remained in Kirtland, during which time he was busily engaged in public labors. He presided over the High Council, met in conference with the Elders and the Saints, acted as general supervisor of the building of the Lord's House, and was foreman in the Temple stone quarry, where he, when other duties would permit, often labored with his own hands. Besides all this labor he had the general oversight of the printing office, in which capacity he discontinued the publication of the Evening and Morning Star, and commenced to issue The Latter-day Saints' Messenger and Advocate. To witness the Saints in the midst of poverty and hardships respond so cheerfully with their time and means for the building of the Lord's House and for other purposes, was indeed a source of the greatest satisfaction to the youthful Prophet, who was always on hand to bless and encourage them.

"Having accomplished all that could be done at present," writes the Prophet, "I, in company with my brother Hyrum Smith and Elders David Whitmer, Frederick G. Williams, Oliver Cowdery and Roger Orton, left Kirtland on the 16th of October, 1834, for the purpose of visiting some Saints in the State of Michigan, where, after a tolerably pleasant journey, we arrived at Pontiac on the 20th.

"While on our way up the lake on board the steamer Monroe, Elder Cowdery had a short discussion with a man calling his name Elmer. He said that he was 'personally acquainted with Joe Smith, had heard him preach his lies, and now, since he was dead, he was glad! He had heard Joe Smith preach in Bainbridge, Chenango County, New York, five years since; he knew it to be him, that he was a dark complexioned man,' etc. Elmer appeared to exult most in that 'Joe' was dead, and made his observations in my presence. I concluded he had learned it from the popular priests of the day, who, through fear that their craft will be injured, if their systems are compared with the truth, seek to ridicule those that teach the truth; and thus I am suffering under the tongue of slander, for Christ's sake, unceasingly. God have mercy on such, if they will quit their lying. I need not state my complexion to those that have seen me, and those who have read my history thus far will recollect that five years ago I was not a preacher, as Elmer represented; neither did I ever preach in Bainbridge.

"After preaching, and teaching the Saints, in Michigan as long as our time would allow, we returned to Kirtland, greatly refreshed from our journey, and much pleased with our friends in that section of the Lord's vineyard. * * *

"No month ever found me more busily engaged than November; but as my life consisted of activity and unyielding exertions, I made this my rule: When the Lord commands, do it."

November 25th Joseph received a revelation to Warren A. Cowdery, who was appointed presiding High Priest over the "Church in Freedom and the regions round about." (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 106.) On the 28th the Prophet attended a meeting of the High Council, where Elders John H. and Joseph W. Tippits, delegates from the Church at Lewis, Essex County, New York, gave an account of $848, which the Saints at that place had gathered, for purchasing land in Missiroui, agreeable to revelation.

"On the evening of the 29th of November" writes Joseph, "I united in prayer with Brother Oliver, for the continuance of blessings. After giving thanks for the relief which the Lord had lately sent us by opening the hearts of the brethren from the east to loan us 430 dollars; after commencing and rejoicing before the Lord on this occasion, we agreed to enter into the following covenant with the Lord, viz., That if the Lord will prosper us in our business, and open the way before us, that we may obtain means to pay our debts, that we be not troubled nor brought into disrepute before the world, nor his people; after that, of all that he shall give unto us, we will give a tenth, to be bestowed upon the poor in his Church, or as he shall command; and that we will be faithful over that which he has entrusted to our care, that we may obtain much; and that our children after us shall remember to observe this sacred and holy covenant; and that our children, and our children's children, may know of the same, we have subscribed our names with our own hands.

(Signed) JOSEPH SMITH, jun.,
OLIVER COWDERY."

This was the first introduction of the law of tithing among the Latter-day Saints.

December 5, 1834, Joseph ordained Oliver Cowdery an assistant president in the First Presidency.

CHAPTER 8.

The Elders' school established—The Twelve Apostles called and set apart for the ministry.—The first quorum of the Seventies organized.—Egyptian Mummies and Papyrus.—The Book of Abraham translated and published.—The Book of Doctrine and Covenants accepted as a law and rule for the Church.—William Smith's conduct is the cause of much grief to Joseph.—A Hebrew school established in Kirtland.—False doctrines denounced.—Important items of instructions.—Mary Smith's death.—Joseph makes a missionary trip to Massachusetts.

During the month of January, 1835, Joseph was engaged in the school of the Elders and preparing lectures on theology for publication in the Book of Doctrine and Covenants. During the winter the school, which was held in the lower story of the printing office building, was well attended, and with the lectures on theology, which were regularly delivered, absorbed for the time being everything else of a temporal nature. The classes being mostly Elders, gave the most studious attention to the all-important object of qualifying themselves as messengers of Jesus Christ, to be ready to do his will in carrying glad tidings to all that would open their eyes, ears and hearts. The following spring Wm. E. McLellin, one of the principal teachers of the school, said in his report: "The school has been conducted under the immediate care and inspection of Joseph Smith, jun., Frederick G. Williams, Sidney Rigdon and Oliver Cowdery, trustees. When the school first commenced, we received into it both large and small; but in about three weeks the classes became so large, and the house so crowded, that it was thought advisable to dismiss all the small students, and continue those only who wished to study the sciences of penmanship, arithmetic, English grammar and geography. Before we dismissed the small scholars, there were in all about one hundred and thirty who attended; since that time there have been, upon an average, about one hundred, the most of whom have received lectures upon English grammar; and for the last four weeks, about seventy have been studying geography one half the day, and grammar and writing the other part. T. Burdick's Arithmetic, S. Kirkham's Grammar and J. Olney's Geography have been used, with Noah Webster's Dictionary as standard. Since the year 1827, I have taught school in five different States, and visited many schools in which I was not engaged as teacher; but in none, I can say with certainty, have I seen students make more rapid progress than in this."

On Sunday, February 8, 1835, when Brigham and Joseph Young came to Joseph Smith's house after meeting and sang for him, the spirit of the Lord was poured out upon them, and the Prophet told them that he wanted to see those brethren together who went up to Zion in the camp the previous summer, for he had a blessing for them. Consequently, a meeting was held on the 14th of February, in which Joseph himself presided. He read the 15th chapter of St. John, an appropriate and affecting prayer was offered, after which the brethren who had belonged to the camp were requested to take their seats together in a part of the house by themselves.

Joseph then made a lengthy speech, in which he related some of the circumstances, trials and sufferings attending the camp while journeying to Zion, and said that God had not designed all this for nothing, but had it in remembrance yet; and it was his will that those who thus went to Zion with a determination to lay down their lives, if necessary, "should be ordained to the ministry and go forth to prune the vineyard for the last time, or the coming of the Lord, which was nigh—even fifty-six years should wind up the scene."

The meeting was continued in the afternoon, and after opening with prayer, Joseph said that the first business to be done was for the Three Witnesses to the Book of Mormon, namely, Oliver Cowdery, David Whitmer and Martin Harris, to pray, each one, and then proceed to choose twelve men from the Church to be ordained Apostles and to go to all nations, kindreds, tongues and people. The Three Witnesses were then blessed by the laying on of hands of the Presidency, after which they, agreeable to the revelation given in June, 1829 (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 18), proceeded to make choice of twelve Apostles in the following order: Lyman E. Johnson, Brigham Young, Heber C. Kimball, Orson Hyde, David W. Patten, Luke S. Johnson, Wm. E. McLellin, John F. Boynton, Orson Pratt, William Smith, Thos. B. Marsh and Parley P. Pratt. (See page 13.)

In a subsequent meeting Joseph, in speaking to the Twelve, said:

"Since the Twelve are now chosen, I wish to tell them a course which they may pursue, and be benefited thereafter, in a point of light of which they are not now aware. If they will, every time they assemble, appoint a person to preside over them during the meeting, and one or more to keep a record of their proceedings, and on the decision of every question or item, be it what it may, let such decision be written, and such decision will forever remain upon record, and appear an item of covenant or doctrine. An item thus decided may appear, at the time, of little or no worth, but should it be published, and one of you lay hands on it after, you will find it of infinite worth, not only to your brethren, but it will be a feast to your own souls.

"Here is another important item. If you assemble from time to time, and proceed to discuss important questions, and pass decisions upon the same, and fail to note them down, by and by you will be driven to straits from which you will not be able to extricate yourselves, because you may be in a situation not to bring your faith to bear with sufficient perfection or power to obtain the desired information; or, perhaps, for neglecting to write these things when God had revealed them, not esteeming them of sufficient worth, the Spirit may withdraw, and God may be angry; and there is, or was, a vast knowledge of infinite importance which is now lost. What was the cause of this? It came in consequence of slothfulness, or a neglect to appoint a man to occupy a few moments in writing all these decisions. Here let me prophesy: The time will come when, if you neglect to do this thing, you will fall by the hands of unrighteous men. Were you to be brought before the authorities, and be accused of any crime or misdemeanor, and be as innocent as the angels of God, unless you can prove yourselves to have been somewhere else, your enemies will prevail over you; but if you can bring twelve men to testify that you were in a certain place at that time, you will escape their hands. Now, if you will be careful to keep minutes of these things, as I have said, it will be one of the most important records ever seen; for all such decisions will ever after remain as items of doctrine and covenants."

On the same occasion the Prophet, in answer to the question: What importance is there attached to the calling of these Twelve Apostles different from the other callings or officers of the Church? said:

"They are the Twelve Apostles, who are called to the office of the Traveling High Council, who are to preside over the churches of the Saints among the Gentiles where there is a presidency established; and they are to travel and preach among the Gentiles, until the Lord shall command them to go to the Jews. They are to hold the keys of this ministry, to unlock the door of the Kingdom of Heaven unto all nations, and to preach the gospel to every creature. This is the power, authority and virtue of their Apostleship."

"On the 28th (February, 1835)," writes Joseph, "the Church in council assembled, commenced selecting certain individuals to be Seventies from the number of those who went up to Zion with me, in camp; and the following are the names of those who were ordained and blessed at that time, to begin the organization of the First Quorum of Seventy, according to the visions and revelations which I have received; the Seventies to constitute traveling quorums, to go into all the earth, whithersoever the Twelve Apostles shall call them: Hiram Winters, Elias Hutchins, Henry Shibley, Roger Orton, J. B. Smith, Harvey Stanley, Jedediah M. Grant, Lyman Sherman, Joseph Hancock, Lyman Smith, Peter Buchanan, David Elliot, Almon W. Babbitt, Levi Gifford, Joseph B. Noble, Lorenzo Booth, Zera S. Cole, Leonard Rich, Harrison Burgess, Alden Burdick, William F. Cahoon, Harper Riggs, Bradford Elliot, Burr Riggs, Lewis Robbins, Darwin Richardson, Joseph Young, Alexander Badlam, Zebedee Coltrin, Solomon Angell, John D. Parker, Daniel Stearns, Hiram Stratten, Sylvester Smith, William Pratt, Ezra Thayer, Levi W. Hancock, Solomon Warner, Israel Barlow, Willard Snow, Hazen Aldrich, Charles Kelly, Jenkins Salisbury, George A. Smith, Nathan B. Baldwin."

The council adjourned until the following day (March 1st), when the work of ordaining and blessing those previously called was continued. Joseph Young and Sylvester Smith were ordained presidents of Seventies. In speaking to a council of leading authorities a few weeks later (May 2nd), the Prophet said:

"If the first Seventy are all employed, and there is a call for more laborers, it will be the duty of the seven presidents of the first Seventy to call and ordain other Seventy and send them forth to labor in the vineyard, until, if needs be, they set apart seven times seventy, and even until there are one hundred and forty and four thousand thus set apart for the ministry. * * * The Twelve and Seventy have particularly to depend upon their ministry for their support, and that of their families; and they have a right, by virtue of their offices, to call upon the churches to assist them."

On March 7th and 8th, 1835, 119 of those brethren who by their labor or means had assisted in building the Lord's House in Kirtland were blessed by the laying on of hands by the First Presidency. Many of them were ordained Elders and had great promises and blessings pronounced upon them because of their diligence in rearing a Temple to God's honor and glory. They were all willing to continue their labors until the building was completed.

March 28th, the Twelve Apostles met in council in Kirtland and had a time of general confession. As a body they unitedly asked God to grant unto them, through his Seer, a revelation of his mind and will concerning their duties which might cheer and comfort them on their journeys. This desire they made known to the Prophet, who, in compliance with their request, inquired of the Lord, and received the very important revelation on Priesthood, which constitutes the 107th section of the Doctrine and Covenants.

On the 4th of May the Twelve left Kirtland on a mission to the Eastern States. According to previous arrangement they attended a number of conferences with the Saints in New York, Vermont, Massachusetts, Maine and Canada, where they also held many meetings among strangers and arranged the affairs of the various branches and conferences. From this mission they returned September 21st following.

Joseph writes: "About the middle of May Wm. W. Phelps and John Whitmer, presidents of the Church in Missouri, arrived at Kirtland, and John Whitmer was appointed to take the place of President Oliver Cowdery, in conducting the Messenger and Advocate. Frederick G. Williams was appointed to edit the Northern Times, a weekly newspaper, which had commenced in February last, in favor of Democracy; and Wm. W. Phelps (with his son Waterman) made his home with my family, and assisted the committee in compiling the Book of Doctrine and Covenants. * * *

"Thursday, June 18th, $950 were subscribed for the Temple by the Saints in Kirtland. Great anxiety was manifest to roll on the work. * * *

"Thursday, June 25th, there was a meeting in Kirtland to subscribe for the building of the Temple; and $6,232.50 was added to the list. Joseph Smith subscribed $500; Oliver Cowdery, $750; Wm. W. Phelps, $500; John Whitmer, $500; and Frederick G. Williams, $500, of the above. All of which they paid within one hour, and the people were astonished.

"On the 3rd of July, Michael H. Chandler came to Kirtland to exhibit some Egyptian mummies. There were four human figures, together with some two or more rolls of papyrus covered with hieroglyphic figures and devices. As Mr. Chandler had been told I could translate them, he brought me some of the characters, and I gave him the interpretation, and, like a gentleman, he gave me the following certificate:

"Kirtland, July 6, 1835.

"This is to make known to all, who may be desirous, concerning the knowledge of Mr. Joseph Smith, jun., in deciphering the ancient Egyptian hieroglyphic characters in my possession, which I have, in many eminent cities, showed to the most learned; and, from the information that I could ever learn, or meet with, I find that of Mr. Joseph Smith, jun., to correspond in the most minute matters.

"MICHAEL H. CHANDLER, Traveling with, and Proprietor of, Egyptian Mummies."

Soon after this, some of the Saints purchased the mummies and papyrus, and Joseph, with Wm. W. Phelps and Oliver Cowdery as scribes, commenced the translation of some of the characters or hieroglyphics, when much to their joy they found that one of the rolls contained the writings of Abraham, another the writings of Joseph of Egypt, etc.

The roll containing the writings of Abraham was translated by Joseph and subsequently published under the name of the Book of Abraham in the Times and Seasons, a paper published in Nauvoo, Illinois, and still later in the Pearl of Great Price, where the reader now can find it.

"The record of Abraham and Joseph, found with the mummies," writes Joseph, "is beautifully written on papyrus, with black, and a small part red, ink or paint, in perfect preservation. The characters are such as you find upon the coffins of mummies—hieroglyphics, etc., with many characters or letters like the present (though probably not quite so square) form of the Hebrew without points. The records were obtained from one of the catacombs in Egypt, near the place where once stood the renowned city of Thebes, by the celebrated French traveler, Antonio Sebolo, in the year 1831. He procured license from Mehemet Ali, then Viceroy of Egypt, under the protection of Chevalier Drovetti, the French consul, in the year 1828, and employed 433 men four months and two days (if I understand correctly)—Egyptian or Turkish soldiers, at from four to six cents per diem, each man. He entered the catacomb June 7, 1831, and obtained eleven mummies. There were several hundred mummies in the same catacomb; about one hundred embalmed after the first order, and placed in niches, and two or three hundred after the second and third orders, and laid upon the floor or bottom of the grand cavity. The two last orders of embalmed were so decayed, that they could not be removed, and only eleven of the first found in the niches. On his way from Alexandria to Paris, he put in at Trieste, and, after ten days' illness, expired. This was in the year 1832. Previous to his decease, he made a will of the whole to Mr. Michael H. Chandler (then in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania), his nephew, whom he supposed to be in Ireland. Accordingly, the whole were sent to Dublin, and Mr. Chandler's friends ordered them to New York, where they were received at the custom-house in the winter or spring of 1833. In April of the same year, Mr. Chandler paid the duties, and took possession of his mummies. Up to this time, they had not been taken out of the coffins, nor the coffins opened. On opening the coffins, he discovered that in connection with two of the bodies was something rolled up with the same kind of linen, saturated with the same bitumen, which, when examined, proved to be two rolls of papyrus previously mentioned. Two or three other small pieces of papyrus with astronomical calculations, epitaphs, etc., were found with others of the mummies. When Mr. Chandler discovered that there was something with the mummies, he supposed or hoped it might be some diamonds or valuable metal, and was no little chagrined when he saw his disappointment. He was immediately told, while yet in the custom-house, that there was no man in that city who could translate his roll; but was referred, by the same gentleman (a stranger), to Mr. Joseph Smith, jun., 'who,' continued he, 'possesses some kind of power or gifts by which he had previously translated similar characters.' I was then unknown to Mr. Chandler, neither did he know that such a book or work as the record of the Nephites had been brought before the public. From New York he took his collection to Philadelphia, where he obtained the certificate of the learned, and from thence came to Kirtland, as before related, in July."

At a general assembly held in Kirtland, August 17, 1835, the Book of Doctrine and Covenants was presented to the Church for its acceptance. A committee, consisting of Joseph Smith, Sidney Rigdon, Oliver Cowdery and Frederick G. Williams (appointed in a general assembly September 24, 1834), had previously been engaged in gathering and arranging the revelations and doctrines previously given in a book, which now by unanimous vote was approved and accepted as a law and rule of faith and practice to the Church.

The following testimony of the Twelve was also read to the assembly by Wm. W. Phelps:

"The testimony of the Witnesses to the Book of the Lord's commandments, which he gave to His Church, through Joseph Smith, jun., who was appointed, by the voice of the Church, for this purpose.

"We therefore feel willing to bear testimony to all the world of mankind, to every creature upon the face of all the earth, that the Lord has borne record to our souls, through the Holy Ghost shed forth upon us, that these commandments were given by inspiration of God, and are profitable for all men, and are verily true. We give this testimony unto the world, the Lord being our helper; and it is through the grace of God the Father, and His Son Jesus Christ, that we are permitted to have this privilege of bearing this testimony unto the world, in the which we rejoice exceedingly, praying the Lord always that the children of men may be profited thereby."

Joseph and Frederick G. Williams being absent on a visit to the Saints in Michigan, Oliver Cowdery and Sidney Rigdon presided over the meeting.

On the same occasion, Section 134 of the Doctrine & Covenants, in relation to governments and laws in general, was accepted and ordered to be printed in said book.

Joseph, having returned from his mission to Michigan August 23rd, now spent a considerable length of time in Kirtland attending to the numerous duties devolving upon him as the President of the Church, which by this time had increased to quite a large number. In Kirtland and vicinity alone there were 2,000 members. He was continually visited by strangers from different parts of the country, of whom some came to converse with him about religion, others to see the Egyptian mummies, etc. To these strangers he bore powerful testimonies of the restoration of the gospel and related the circumstances connected therewith, but as the minds of men are darkened and they love falsehoods more than truth, there were, as a matter of course, many who did not believe these things, even when listening to their recital from the Prophet's own lips. With unabating zeal he sought both in public and private to teach the brethren and the Saints generally their duties, and also worked as much as time would permit on the translation of the rolls of papyrus, in which Oliver Cowdery assisted him as scribe. He also dedicated a number of letters and communications which were published in the Messenger and Advocate. By all this it is easily seen that Joseph's life was a very busy one, but the Lord endowed him with the needed gifts and qualifications to attend to every duty which he had to perform. He never seemed to grow weary of the work entrusted to him, for his love and zeal became stronger and his feelings warmer every day he lived. He constantly saw new features in it which he admired and which stimulated him to renewed exertions. The following is from the pen of Geo. Q. Cannon:

"Many were the fervent prayers which Joseph offered up to the Lord in those days for the aid which he and the brethren required to enable them to meet their engagements. He did not want himself or the brethren to be brought into disrepute or into the power of their enemies through not being able to pay any debt that might be due. On one occasion, in the month of December, 1835, twenty of the brethren united together and made a donation to Joseph of $40.50. In speaking about the brethren's kindness he says: 'My heart swells with gratitude inexpressible, when I realize the great condescension of my Heavenly Father in opening the hearts of these my beloved brethren to minister so liberally to my wants, and I ask God, in the name of Jesus Christ, to multiply blessings upon their heads,' etc. We record this act of the brethren, and Joseph's feelings respecting it, to give our readers an idea of the value that was placed upon a small amount of means in those days. The Church was not as rich then as it is now; and a dollar was worth much more than it is now. Joseph and the leading Elders had to accomplish great works with little means. Some of those brethren, whose names are recorded as having donated this money to Joseph, could to-day, if necessary, give the $40.50 apiece, and probably much more than that sum, and not feel it as much as they did that amount when divided between twenty of them in the year 1835.

"Not for one moment did Joseph lose sight of the redemption of Zion. He and the brethren were pledged to keep it in view while life should last; accordingly we find him in December, 1835, mailing numerous petitions from people in all parts of the United States to the governor of the State of Missouri to restore the Saints to their possessions. * * * These petitions had a two-fold effect: the Saints could claim that they had sought for redress in every possible way, and had not failed to try to do the Lord's will, and the rulers were left without excuse for their criminal neglect in not granting them their rights.

"During those days Joseph suffered much in his feelings through the misconduct of his brother William. Though called to be one of the Twelve Apostles, William had not obtained the mastery over himself. He was a very stubborn, violent-tempered man, impatient of contradiction and rebuke. His brother Joseph was the best friend he had, and yet he would abuse him. On one occasion (Oct. 29, 1835), at the trial of a case before the High Council, in which William Smith was complainant, Joseph objected to some testimony that was presented, which he did not deem proper. William became very much enraged at Joseph for objecting to the testimony. The next day they met for the purpose of talking the affair over, Joseph being anxious to have it settled. Hyrum Smith, their elder brother, was present. But they could do nothing with William. He became very angry, and would not listen to anything they had to say, and left the house abruptly, declaring that he would have nothing more to do with them. He sent Joseph his Elder's license, and busied himself in trying to poison the minds of the people against the Prophet. This was a cause of great grief to Joseph, for he loved his brother and was desirous that he should be saved; but he knew that the course he had taken was very wrong, and unless he repented he would lose his standing before the Lord. William's brethren of the Twelve Apostles were anxious about him, and prayed to the Lord for him, and it is probable that he did humble himself to a certain extent, but from what followed, not as he should have done.

"Shortly after the difficulty brought about by the violence of William Smith, a debating school was established, and met in his house. Joseph met with the school (Dec. 16th) and gave the Elders some good counsel respecting debates. Some words were indulged in on the impropriety of continuing such meetings, Joseph fearing that they would not result in good. In the conversation which ensued, William's anger became excited against his brother Joseph, and, before he could be stopped, he rushed upon him in a dreadful rage, and committed violence upon his person, the effects of which Joseph carried with him to his grave. This occurred in William's house—a house which Joseph's kindness helped him to procure—and in the presence of their parents and their brother Hyrum. Joseph's feelings, on being thus treated, can not be described. To be thus abused, under any circumstances, by a brother, would be a great cause of sorrow. But for a brother to be beaten by his brother, who occupied so exalted a station as William did—one of the Twelve Apostles—how sore must have been his grief!

"William wrote him a long letter (Dec. 18th), in which he asked forgiveness. In view of the many difficulties he had had with the Church, and the disgrace he had brought upon himself, and his strong passions, he asked that some one might be appointed to fill his place as one of the Twelve Apostles. To this letter Joseph wrote an answer, and no one can read that reply without being forcibly struck with the nobility of character which he displayed towards a brother who had so cruelly wronged him; godliness is breathed in every line. In the spirit of his high calling he said to him: Grant me the privilege of saying, that however hasty or harsh I may have spoken at any time to you, it has been done for the express purpose of endeavoring to warn, exhort, admonish and rescue you from falling into difficulties and sorrow which I foresaw you plunging into, by giving way to that wicked spirit, which you call your passions, which you should curb and break down and put under your feet, which if you do not, you never can be saved, in my view, in the Kingdom of God!' Prophetic words! which, if William had taken them to heart, would have saved him from many an evil and the wretched condition into which his conduct has since placed him. Joseph advised him to retain his Apostleship, and to rise up and make one tremendous effort and try to overcome his passions.

"A charge was preferred against William Smith before the First Presidency, but the day previous to the one appointed for the trial, Father Smith and his brother John, with his sons Hyrum, Joseph and William, met together, and he addressed them in a most feeling and pathetic manner. The Spirit of God rested upon them, and William made a most humble confession and asked Joseph's forgiveness for the abuse he had offered to him. The spirit of confession and forgiveness was mutual among them, and they covenanted to build each other up in righteousness in all things, and not to listen to evil reports concerning each other. After this meeting they unitedly laid their hands on Joseph's cousin, George A. Smith, who was much afflicted with severe rheumatic affection, which caused great pain, and he was immediately healed.

"When the council convened the next day (Jan. 2, 1836), William humbly acknowledged the charges preferred against him, and asked the forgiveness of the council and the whole congregation. The confession was accepted and he was restored to fellowship.

"Joseph had a great taste for languages. What time he had to spare he spent in acquiring them. He studied Greek, and during the winter of 1835-36 a Hebrew school was established in Kirtland, Mr. Joshua Seixas being the teacher, which the leading Elders attended. They were much blessed in their studies. Joseph, in alluding to their progress, said: 'It seems as if the Lord opened our minds in a marvelous manner to understand his word in the original language; and my prayer is that God will speedily indue us with a knowledge of all languages and tongues, that his servants may go forth for the last time to bind up the law and seal up the testimony.'

"During those days the adversary was not idle. It required all the wisdom and power which Joseph and the Elders who were one with him in heart and feeling could exercise, to prevent dissensions and bickerings among those who were called Saints. Several of the Twelve Apostles and Seventies manifested extreme sensitiveness upon many points, being very jealous, lest they should not be honored and respected as much as they thought they were entitled to, in view of their labor and positions."

November 10, 1835, Joseph had a conversation with a man who called himself "Joshua, the Jewish minister." This man said that he possessed the spirit of his fathers, that he was a literal descendant of Matthias the Apostle, that was chosen in the place of Judas that fell; and that his spirit was resurrected in him; and that this was the way or scheme of eternal life —this transmigration of soul or spirit from father to son. He said also that he possessed the soul of Christ.

Joseph told him that his doctrine was of the devil, that he was in possession of a wicked and depraved spirit, although he professed to be the spirit of truth itself.

In the midst of Joseph's trials his brother Hyrum stood nobly by him and the most tender love and affection seemed to exist between the two brothers. In alluding to the part Hyrum took in the difficulty between William and himself, he says in reference to Hyrum: "He was perfectly satisfied with the course I had taken in rebuking him (William) in his wickedness, but he is wounded to the very soul, because of the conduct of William; and although he feels the tender feelings of a brother towards him, yet he can but look upon his conduct as an abomination in the sight of God. And I could pray in my heart, that all my brethren were like unto my beloved brother Hyrum, who possesses the mildness of a lamb, and the integrity of a Job, and in short, the meekness and humility of Christ; and I love him with that love that is stronger than death, for I never had occasion to rebuke him, nor he me, which he declared when he left me to-day."

In speaking concerning the duties of the various officers of the Church, at a council which was held in Kirtland January 16, 1836, Joseph says: "I next proceeded to explain the duty of the Twelve, and their authority, which is next to the present Presidency, and that the arrangement of the assembly in this place on the 15th instant, in placing the High Councilors of Kirtland next the Presidency, was because the business to be transacted, was business relating to the body in particular, which was to fill the several quorums in Kirtland, not because they were first in office, and that the arrangements were the most judicious that could be made on the occasion; also the Twelve are not subject to any other than the First Presidency, viz., myself, Sidney Rigdon and Frederick G. Williams, who are now my counselors, and where I am not, there is no First Presidency over the Twelve."

Under date of January 17, 1836, Joseph writes: "I attended meeting at the school house at the usual hour; a large congregation assembled. I proceeded to arrange the several quorums present, first the Presidency, then the Twelve, and the Seventy, who were present, also the councilors of Kirtland and Zion. President Rigdon then arose and observed that instead of preaching the time would be occupied by the Presidency and Twelve, in speaking each in turn, until they had all spoken. The Lord poured out his Spirit upon us, and the brethren began to confess their faults one to the other, and the congregation was soon overwhelmed in tears, and some of our hearts were too big for utterance. The gift of tongues came on us also, like the rushing of a mighty wind, and my soul was filled with the glory of God." Joseph continues:

"Thursday, January 21st. * * * About 3 o'clock p. m. I dismissed the school, and the Presidency retired to the attic story of the printing office, where we attended to the ordinance of washing our bodies in pure water. We also perfumed our bodies and our heads, in the name of the Lord.

"At early candle-light I met with the Presidency at the west school room, in the Temple, to attend to the ordinance of anointing our heads with holy oil; also the councils of Kirtland and Zion met in the two adjoining rooms, and waited in prayer while we attended to the ordinance. I took the oil in my left hand, Father Smith being seated before me, and the remainder of the Presidency encircled him round about. We then stretched our right hands towards heaven, and blessed the oil, and consecrated it in the name of Jesus Christ.

"We then laid our hands upon our aged father (Smith) and invoked the blessings of heaven. I then anointed his head with the consecrated oil, and sealed many blessings upon him. The Presidency then in turn laid their hands upon his head, beginning at the oldest, until they had all laid their hands upon him, and pronounced such blessings upon his head as the Lord put into their hearts, all blessing him to be our Patriarch, to anoint our heads, and attend to all duties that pertain to that office. The Presidency then took the seat in their turn, according to their age, beginning at the oldest, and received their anointing and blessing under the hands of Father Smith. And in my turn, my father anointed my head, and sealed upon me the blessings of Moses, to lead Israel in the latter-days, even as Moses led him in days of old; also the blessings of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. All of the Presidency laid their hands upon me, and pronounced upon my head many prophecies and blessings, many of which I shall not notice at this time. But as Paul said, so say I, let us come to visions and revelations."

"The heavens were opened upon us," etc. (See page 64.)

For full particulars concerning the glorious manifestations of the power of God in those days; the dedication of the Temple (March 27, 1836); the visits of the Savior, Moses, Elijah the Prophet and Elias (April 3, 1836), the reader is referred to the article on Kirtland, pages 62-71, and The Kirtland Temple, pages 74-80.

Not long after the dedication of the Temple, the Elders began to spread abroad in all parts of the land preaching the gospel. April 9th, Bishop Partridge, William W. Phelps and other leading men from Missouri, who had been in Kirtland to attend the dedication and receive their blessings, started for home. Joseph and the principal men of Kirtland accompanied them as far as Chardon, and after staying all night, blessed them in the morning and returned to Kirtland.

The remainder of this month (April) and May Joseph devoted to the spiritual interests of the brethren, and particularly in "devising ways and means to build up Kirtland; and, in fact, the city began to spring into existence like the opening buds of the forest."

During the month of May in that year (1836) two of Joseph's uncles —Asahel and Silas Smith—arrived in Kirtland with their respective families. They brought with them their mother—Joseph's grandmother—Mary Smith, an aged lady, 93 years of age, who had traveled 500 miles to see her children. She was very much pleased and gratified to see Joseph. Her husband, Asahel Smith, Joseph's grandfather, had prophesied, long before, that there would be a Prophet raised up in his family. A short time before his death he had received the Book of Mormon, and read it nearly through, and he declared that Joseph was the very Prophet! Joseph's grandmother had lived to see her husband's prophecy fulfilled, and, in the flesh, to behold her grandson, who had been so favored of the Lord. It was but natural that she should have great joy. For ten days after her arrival in Kirtland, she enjoyed the society of her four sons and families, and then fell asleep, without sickness, pain or regret. She died on May 27th. Her maiden name was Mary Duty; she was married to Asahel Smith in February, 1767, and they lived together as husband and wife for the long period of 64 years, rearing eleven children to man and womanhood. She outlived her husband five years. At the time of his death their direct descendants numbered 110.

July 25, 1836, Joseph, accompanied by his brother Hyrum, Sidney Rigdon and Oliver Cowdery, left Kirtland on a missionary trip to the East. They traveled by way of Buffalo, Albany, New York, Providence and Boston, to Salem, Massachusetts, where they remained about a month, teaching the people from house to house and preaching publicly as opportunity offered. In a revelation (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 111) which Joseph received in Salem on August 6th, the Lord said that many in that city would embrace the gospel in due time and be gathered. While staying in Salem, they were visited by President Brigham Young, who, together with his brother Joseph, had traveled through the States of New York, Vermont and Massachusetts, preaching, baptizing and visiting relatives. From this trip Joseph returned to Kirtland in the following September.

In the fall of this year (1836) most of the Saints living in Clay County, Missouri, removed to Caldwell County, where they founded the city of Far West and other smaller settlements; during the following two years the Saints in that and adjoining counties increased in numbers to about twelve thousand souls. (See Clay County and Far West.)

December 31, 1836, Willard Richards was baptized at Kirtland by Brigham Young (see page 104).

Blessings received in the Kirtland Temple.—Apostasy in Kirtland.—Mission to England.—Joseph reduced to the point of death through sickness.—He visits Canada.—Reorganization of quorums.—The Kirtland Safety Society fails.—Joseph visits Far West, Missouri.—An apostate church organized.—The Elders' Journal first published.—Brigham Young flees from Kirtland to escape mob violence.

April 6, 1837, a solemn assembly called for the purpose of washing, anointing, receiving instructions and the further organizations of the ministry, convened in the Kirtland Temple, and was attended by official members of the Church. The first two or three hours were spent by the different quorums in washing of feet, singing, praying and preparing to receive instruction from the Presidency. The Presidents, together with the Seventies and their presidents, repaired to the west room in the attic story, where, for want of time the preceeding evening, it became necessary to seal the anointing of those who had recently been anointed and not sealed.

Another subject of vital importance to the Church was the establishment of the grades of the different quorums. It was ascertained that all but one or two of the presidents of the Seventies were High Priests, and when they had ordained and set apart (any) from the quorum of Elders into the quorum of Seventies, they had conferred upon them the High Priesthood also. This was declared to be wrong, and not according to the order of heaven. New presidents of the Seventies were accordingly ordained to fill the places of such of them as were High Priests, and the ex-officio presidents, and such of the Seventies as had been legally ordained to the High Priesthood, were directed to unite with the High Priests. (See page 81.) All the quorums then assembled in the lower room of the Lord's House, where they were addressed by the Presidents from the stand.

Joseph addressed the assembly and said "that the Melchizedek High Priesthood was no other than the Priesthood of the Son of God; that there are certain ordinances which belong to the Priesthood, from which flow certain results; and the Presidents or Presidency are over the Church; and revelations of the mind and will of God to the Church are to come through the Presidency. This is the order of heaven, and the power and privilege of this Priesthood. It is also the privilege of any officer in this Church to obtain revelations, so far as relates to his particular calling and duty in the Church. All are bound by the principles of virtue and happiness, but one great privilege of the Priesthood is to obtain revelations of the mind and will of God. It is also the privilege of the Melchizedek Priesthood to reprove, rebuke and admonish, as well as to receive revelation. If the Church knew all the commandments, one half they would condemn through prejudice and ignorance.

"A High Priest is a member of the same Melchizedek Priesthood with the Presidency, but not of the same power or authority in the Church. The Seventies are also members of the same Priesthood—are a sort of traveling council or Priesthood, and may preside over a church or churches until a High Priest can be had. The Seventies are to be taken from the quorum of Elders, and are not to be High Priests. They are subject to the direction and dictation of the Twelve, who have the keys of the ministry. All are to preach the gospel, by the power and influence of the Holy Ghost; and no man can preach the gospel without the Holy Ghost."

Joseph writes:

"At this time the spirit of speculation in lands and property of all kinds, which was so prevalent throughout the whole nation, was taking deep root in the Church. As the fruits of this spirit, evil surmisings, fault-finding, disunion, dissension and apostasy followed in quick succession, and it seemed as though all the powers of earth and hell were combining their influence in an especial manner to overthrow the Church at once, and make a final end. Other banking institutions refused the Kirtland Safety Society's notes. The enemy abroad and apostates in our midst united in their schemes; flour and provisions were turned towards other markets, and many became disaffected towards me as though I were the sole cause of those very evils I was most strenuously striving against, and which were actually brought upon us by the brethren not giving heed to my counsel.

"No quorum in the Church was entirely exempt from the influence of those false spirits who were striving against me for the mastery; even some of the Twelve were so far lost to their high and responsible calling as to begin to take sides secretly with the enemy.

"In this state of things, and but a few weeks before the Twelve were expecting to meet in full quorum (some of them having been absent for some time), God revealed to me that something new must be done for the salvation of his Church; and on or about the 1st of June, 1837, Heber C. Kimball, one of the Twelve, was set apart by the spirit of prophecy and revelation, prayer and the laying on of hands of the First Presidency, to preside over a mission to England, to be the first foreign mission of the Church of Christ in the last days. While we were about ordaining him, Orson Hyde, another of the Twelve, came in, and upon listening to what was passing, his heart melted within him (for he had begun to drink of the cup filled with the overflowings of speculation); he acknowledged all his faults, asked forgiveness and offered to accompany President Kimball on his mission to England. His offer was accepted and he was set apart for that purpose. * * *

"The same evening (June 11th), while I was engaged in giving some special instructions to Elders Kimball and Hyde and Priest Joseph Fielding concerning their mission to England, President Brigham Young came into my house, where we were sitting, accompanied by Dr. Willard Richards, who had just returned from a special business mission to New York, Boston and other eastern cities, on which he started with President Young March 14th, Dr. Richards having been previously ordained an Elder on the 6th of March, and President Young having returned from the mission a few days previous. My instructions to the brethren were, when they arrived in England, to adhere closely to the first principles of the gospel, and remain silent concerning the gathering, the Vision and the Book of Doctrine and Covenants, until such time as the work was fully established, and it should clearly be made manifest by the Spirit, etc.

"Monday, June 12th, I was taken sick and kept to my room, unable to attend to business.

"Elder Willard Richards, having reported his mission, requested the privilege of fulfilling a covenant which he made with President Kimball in January, which was that he should, agreeable to his desire, accompany the Twelve on their first foreign mission. Presidents Hyrum Smith and Sidney Rigdon granted his petition, laid their hands upon his head and set him apart for the English mission.

"Tuesday, 13th. My afflictions continued to increase, and were very severe, insomuch that I was unable to raise my head from my pillow, when the brethren called to bid me farewell; and at 9 o'clock a. m., Elders Heber C. Kimball, Orson Hyde, Willard Richards and Joseph Fielding, a Priest, a native of Honedon, England, left Kirtland in company with President Brigham Young and several of the Kirtland brethren and sisters, who continued with them as far as Fairport, on Lake Erie, where the missionaries took a steamer for Buffalo, directing their course for New York City.

"Wednesday, 14th. I continued to grow worse and worse until my sufferings were excruciating, and although in the midst of it all I felt to rejoice in the salvation of Israel's God, yet I found it expedient to call to my assistance those means which a kind Providence had provided for the restoration of the sick, in connection with the ordinances; and Dr. Levi Richards, at my request, administered to me herbs and mild food, and nursed me with all tenderness and attention; and my Heavenly Father blessed his administrations to the easing and comforting of my system, for I began to mend in a short time, and in a few days I was able to resume my usual labors.

"This is one of the many instances that I have suddenly been brought from a state of health to the borders of the grave, and as suddenly restored, for which my heart swells with gratitude to my Heavenly Father, and I feel renewedly to dedicate myself and all my powers to his service.

"While I was thus afflicted, the enemy of all righteousness was suggesting, apostates reporting and the doubtful believing that my afflictions were sent upon me, because I was in transgression and had taught the Church things contrary to godliness; but of this the Lord judge between me and them, while I pray my Father to forgive them the wrong. * * *

"Some time previous to this I resigned my office in the Kirtland Safety Society, disposed of my interest therein and withdrew from the institution, being fully aware, after so long an experiment, that no institution of the kind, established upon just and righteous principles, for a blessing not only to the Church but the whole nation, would be suffered to continue its operations in such an age of darkness, speculation and wickedness."

June 23, 1837, the same day as the gospel was first preached in England, Joseph received "The Word of the Lord unto Thomas B. Marsh concerning the Twelve Apostles of the Lamb." (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 112.)

On Thursday, June 27th, Joseph started from Kirtland in company with Elders Sidney Rigdon and Thos. B. Marsh for the purpose of visiting the Saints in Canada. The Prophet writes:

"When we arrived at Painesville we were detained all day by malicious and vexatious law-suits. About sunset I got into my carriage to return home to Kirtland; at this moment the sheriff sprang into the carriage, seized my lines and served another writ upon me, which was sworn out by a man who had a few weeks previously brought a new-fashioned cooking stove to Kirtland, and prevailed on me to put it up in my kitchen, saying it would give credit to his stove, wishing to have it tested by our people; and now he thought would be a good time to get pay for it. I gave my watch to the officer, for security, and we all returned home.

"The following day I remained at home until evening, when we set out again, in Brother S. B. Stoddard's wagon, to Ashtabula, a distance of thirty miles, and arrived there a little after daybreak, and stayed till afternoon and enjoyed ourselves very much in walking on the beach and bathing in the beautiful clear water of the lake. At 4 p. m. we took a deck passage on board the steamer for Buffalo. At night we all laid down to rest on the upper deck of the boat, and for pillows some took their boots, others their valises, and had a comfortable night's repose. We arrived at Buffalo the next morning in safety. Here we separated from Brothers Brigham Young and Albert P. Rockwood, they going to the Eastern States; and myself, Brothers Sidney Rigdon and Thos. B. Marsh started for Toronto, Upper Canada."

Joseph and his companions remained in Canada several weeks and had a pleasant time with the Saints, who gladly welcomed them and treated them with great hospitality and kindness. Their faith was strong in the gospel and they listened to the Prophet's teachings with delight. In visiting the various branches of the Church in the province, Joseph was accompanied by John Taylor (see page 39), who some time previous had been baptized by Parley P. Pratt and now presided over the church there. They preached, baptized and blessed the people wherever they were willing to listen to them. About the last of August, Joseph returned to Kirtland.

September 3, 1837, a conference was held in Kirtland for the purpose of reorganizing the quorums. On that occasion one of Joseph's counselors—Frederick G. Williams—and three of the Twelve—Luke S. Johnson, Lyman E. Johnson and John F. Boynton—were rejected; the two last named had left their calling and gone into the mercantile business. Several members of the High Council, among whom Martin Harris and other leading men of the Church, were considered unworthy to retain their important positions in the Church and were consequently rejected by the conference. John F. Boynton, the only one of the Apostles named who was present, endeavored to justify his conduct before the conference, but was opposed by Elder Brigham Young, who in a plain and energetic manner strongly protested against the course Boynton had pursued, and stated several reasons why he could not receive him into fellowship until a hearty repentence and confession had taken place. Boynton again tried to defend himself, and alleged that the failure of the Kirtland Bank was the cause of his difficulties. He had been told, he said, that the bank was founded by the will of God, and could never fail, no matter what men might do. In reply to this Joseph said that if any such thing had been told him, he had not authorized anybody to do it, for he had always said that unless the institution was conducted on righteous principles it would not stand. All of those present who had the spirit of God knew that Joseph spoke the truth, for they could plainly understand that God would not sustain a bank or anything else in his Church that was not conducted in a proper manner.

The Kirtland Safety Society, or Bank, was established by the direction of Joseph for the benefit and advantage of the Saints. Those who were faithful sustained it by their faith and works; but the dishonest took advantage of every opportunity they could to speculate and swindle. It was on this account that Joseph, as previously stated, withdrew from it, and afterwards published a caution to the people, warning them about the schemes of those wicked men. Elder Brigham Young was the first to discover the roguery that was being practiced by those men. He had deposited some money in the bank which, while it had been in his possession, he had put a private mark on. He wished to help a family to emigrate to Missouri, and had occasion to sell a piece of land for that purpose. Oliver Cowdery was the purchaser. He was to pay for it in Kirtland Bank money, Brother Brigham supposing that he would be helping the bank by taking up money that was in circulation. As soon as he commenced to count the money he saw they were his marked bills which he had deposited a few days before in the bank, and which ought to then be in its vaults. Warren Parrish was the principal operator in this business. He had his partners, and they did not stop until they had taken out all the money there was in the bank, and also signed and issued all the notes they could. Many of the Elders and Saints were very desirous to keep up the credit of the paper, and they would sell anything they had for it, to take it up. This gave Parrish and his confederates great opportunities to swindle the Saints and obtain their property; for when the money was redeemed and returned to the bank, instead of being retained, it was taken out again and given to speculators and gamblers to repeat the same process by buying up more property. All this was done without the knowledge of the Prophet Joseph or the directors, they having issued orders that the money should be retained in the bank as fast as received.

At an assembly of the Church in the Lord's House, on September 10th, Luke S. and Lyman E. Johnson and John F. Boynton came forward and made their confessions and were received into fellowship by the vote of the Church, with the privilege of retaining their Apostleship.

At a conference held in the Kirtland Temple, September 17, 1837, Geo. W. Robinson was unanimously elected Church Recorder in place of Oliver Cowdery, who had removed to Missouri. In the evening Joseph spoke to the Elders in relation to the gathering of the Saints. This conference was of the opinion that the gathering places already appointed were at that time crowded to overflowing, and that it was necessary that more Stakes of Zion should be appointed, wherefore it was moved, seconded and voted unanimously that Joseph and Sidney Rigdon should be requested by the conference to go and appoint other Stakes or places of gathering. Consequently Joseph and Sidney, accompanied by William Smith and Vinson Knight, started from Kirtland September 27th, and arrived in Far West, Missouri, about the 1st of November. While there Joseph met in council with the Elders and Saints, and regulated matters connected with the townsite of Far West. It was also decided that there was sufficient room in the county for the Saints to continue gathering there from abroad. The previous summer (August 5, 1837), the authorities of the Church in Missouri had resolved in council to go on moderately and build a house unto the name of the Lord in Far West. When Joseph arrived there he counseled that the building of that house should be postponed until the Lord should reveal it to be his will to have it commenced. A general assembly of the Church was also called together, and particulars of the recent reorganization of the Church at Kirtland were given. At this meeting Frederick G. Williams was not sustained as counselor to Joseph, and Hyrum Smith was nominated and sustained in his stead. There was a president and two assistant presidents over the Church in Zion—David Whitmer, John Whitmer and William W. Phelps. They were objected to by the Church; but they made confession and satisfaction and were sustained in their positions.

Having thus arranged the affairs of the Church in Missouri, Joseph returned to Kirtland about the 10th of December. During his absence Warren Parrish, John F. Boynton, Luke S. Johnson, Joseph Coe and some others united together for the overthrow of the Church, and soon after his return this dissenting band openly and publicly renounced the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, and claimed that they were the old standard. They called themselves the Church of Christ, but dropped the name of Saints. They said that Joseph was a fallen prophet and that he and the Church were heretics. As all apostates do, they had to show their blindness. In dropping the name of Saints they thought they were making an improvement; but they forgot that the Lord had said, through the Prophet Daniel, that the Saints should possess the kingdom.

Some time previous to this the publication of the Messenger and Advocate had been suspended and a new paper called the Elders' Journal had been commenced in its stead. No. 2, or the November number, of the last-named periodical was the last paper published by the Saints in Kirtland, as the printing establishment was attached to satisfy an unjust judgment of the county court, and soon after the whole printing apparatus was burned to the ground through the work of an incendiary.

"On the morning of December 22, 1837," writes Joseph, "Brother Brigham Young left Kirtland, in consequence of the fury of the mob—the spirit that prevailed in the apostates who had threatened to destroy him, because he would proclaim publicly and privately that he knew by the power of the Holy Ghost that I was a Prophet of the Most High God, and that I had not transgressed or fallen as the apostates declared.

"Apostacy, persecution, confusion and mobocracy strove hard to bear rule at Kirtland, and thus closed the year 1837."

CHAPTER 10.

Joseph removes to Missouri.—Reorganization of the Stake in Far West.—The location of the Garden of Eden revealed.—Answers to questions.—Joseph labors among the Saints in Missouri.—Difficulty with Judge Black.—Joseph and Lyman Wight tried in Daviess County.—The Mob-Militia ordered out.

"A new year," writes Joseph "dawned upon the Church in Kirtland in all the bitterness of the spirit of apostate mobocracy, which continued to rage and grow hotter and hotter, until Elder Rigdon and myself were obliged to flee from its deadly influence, as did the Apostles and Prophets of old, and as Jesus said, 'when they persecute you in one city, flee to another.' On the evening of January 12, 1838, about 10 o'clock, we left Kirtland, on horseback, to escape mob violence, which was about to burst upon us under the color of legal process to cover the hellish designs of our enemies, and to save themselves from the just judgment of the law.

"We continued our travels during the night, and at 8 o'clock on the morning of the 13th, arrived among the brethren in Norton Township, Medina County, Ohio, a distance of 60 miles from Kirtland. Here we tarried about thirty-six hours, when our families arrived; and on the 16th we pursued our journey with our families, in covered wagons, toward the city of Far West, in Missouri. We passed through Dayton and Eaton, Ohio, and Dublin, Indiana. In the latter place we tarried nine days, and refreshed ourselves. * *

"The weather was extremely cold, and we were obliged to secrete ourselves in our wagons, sometimes, to elude the grasp of our pursuers, who continued their pursuit more than two hundred miles from Kirtland, armed with pistols and guns, seeking our lives. They frequently crossed our track, twice they were in the houses where we stopped, once we tarried all night in the same house with them, with only a partition between us and them; and heard their oaths and imprecations and threats concerning us, if they could catch us; and late in the evening they came in our room and examined us, but decided we were not the men. At other times we passed them in the streets, and gazed upon them, and they on us, but they knew us not. One Lyons was one of our pursuers.

"I parted with Brother Rigdon at Dublin, and traveling different routes we met at Terre Haute, where, after resting, we separated again, and I pursued my journey, crossing the Mississippi River at Quincy, Illinois.

"When I had arrived within 120 miles of Far West, the brethren met me with teams and money to help me forward; and when eight miles from the city, we were met by an escort, viz., Thomas B. Marsh and others, who received us with open arms; and on the 13th of March, I with my family and some others put up at Brother Barnards' for the night. Here we were met by another escort of the brethren from the town, who came to make us welcome to their little Zion.

"On the 14th of March, as we were about entering Far West, many of the brethren came out to meet us, who also with open arms welcomed us to their bosoms. We were immediately received under the hospitable roof of Brother George W. Harris, who treated us with all possible kindness, and we refreshed ourselves with much satisfaction, after our long and tedious journey, the brethren bringing in such things as we had need of for our comfort and convenience."

Shortly after the Prophet's arrival in Far West, a number of answers to certain questions on Scripture were given by revelation. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 113.)

Joseph's arrival in Far West was very timely, as affairs there were in a bad state. Pres. David Whitmer and his two counselors, who had only retained their standing by confessing their wrongs and making satisfaction, had again commenced the practice of evil, and they had been rejected by the Church while Joseph was on his journey from Kirtland to Far West. About three weeks after his arrival a conference was held, in which Thomas B. Marsh was appointed president of the Church in Missouri for the time being, and David W. Patten and Brigham Young were appointed assistant presidents. A few days later a number of prominent men were excommunicated from the Church, among whom were Oliver Cowdery, David Whitmer, Luke S. and Lyman E. Johnson and Wm. E. McLellin.

April 17, 1838, Joseph received a revelation (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 114), in which David W. Patten was instructed to get ready for a mission. On the 26th the Saints were commanded by revelation to build a Temple at Far West.

(Doc. & Cov., Sec. 115.) On the 8th of July another revelation was given through the Prophet, commanding William Marks and Newel K. Whitney, to settle up their business in Kirtland and remove to Missouri (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 117); and in answer to the question, "Show us thy will, O Lord, concerning the Twelve?" the following revelation was given (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 118):

"Verily, thus saith the Lord, let a conference be held immediately, let the Twelve be organized, and let men be appointed to supply the place of those who are fallen. Let my servant Thomas remain for a season in the land of Zion, to publish my word. Let the residue continue to preach from that hour, and if they will do this in all lowliness of heart, in meekness and humility, and long-suffering, I, the Lord, give unto them a promise that I will provide for their families, and an effectual door shall be opened for them, from henceforth. And next spring let them depart to go over the great waters, and there promulgate the gospel, the fulness thereof, and bear record of my name. Let them take leave of my Saints in the city of Far West on the 26th day of April next, on the building spot of my house, saith the Lord. Let my servant John Taylor and also my servant Johne E. Page, and also my servant Wilford Woodruff, and also my servant Willard Richards, be appointed to fill the places of those who have fallen, and be officially notified of their appointment."

In answer to the question, "O Lord, show unto thy servants how much thou requirest of the properties of thy people for a tithing?" a revelation on tithing was given (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 119). A few days later (July 18th) the Lord's will concerning the disposition of property tithings was made known. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 120.)

For a few months Joseph spent his time among the Saints in Caldwell and Daviess counties. He was also engaged in writing and dictating Church history, studying grammar and law, writing for the Elders' Journal, locating the Saints, sitting in council with the brethren and receiving revelations.

The Saints kept gathering from the various States of the Union and Canada, besides a large number who, later in the season, removed from Kirtland and settled at Adam-ondi-Ahman. (See Kirtland's Camp.)

The following is Joseph's own account of a trip to Daviess County:

"Friday, May 18th, 1838. I left Far West, in company with Sidney Rigdon, Thos. B. Marsh, David W. Patten, Bishop Partridge, Elias Higbee, Simeon Carter, Alanson Ripley and many others, for the purpose of visiting the north country, and laying off a Stake of Zion, making locations, and laying claims to lands to facilitate the gathering of the Saints, and for the benefit of the poor, in upbuilding the Church of God. We traveled to the mouth of Honey Creek, which is a tributary of Grand River, where we camped for the night. We passed through a beautiful country, the greater part of which is prairie and thickly covered with grass and weeds, among which is plenty of game, such as deer, turkey and prairie hen. We discovered a large black wolf, and my dog gave him chase, but he outran us. We have nothing to fear in camping out, except the rattlesnake, which is native to this country, though not very numerous. We turned our horses loose, and let them feed on the prairie.

"Saturday, 19th. This morning we struck our tents, and formed a line of march, crossing Grand River at the mouth of Honey Creek and Nelson's Ferry. Grand River is a large, beautiful, deep and rapid stream, during the high waters of spring, and will undoubtedly admit of navigation by steamboat and other water craft. At the mouth of Honey Creek is a good landing. We pursued our course up the river, mostly through timber, for about eighteen miles, when we arrived at Col. Lyman Wight's home. He lives at the foot of Tower Hill (a name I gave the place in consequence of the remains of an old Nephite alter or tower that stood there), where we camped for the Sabbath. In the afternoon, I went up the river about half a mile to Wight's Ferry, accompanied by President Rigdon and my clerk Geo. W. Robinson, for the purpose of selecting and laying claim to a city plat near said ferry in Daviess County, township 60, ranges 27 and 28, and sections 25, 36, 31 and 30, which the brethren called Spring Hill, but by the mouth of the Lord it was named ADAM-ONDI-AHMAN, because, said he, it is the place where Adam shall come to visit his people, or the Ancient of Days shall sit, as spoken of by Daniel the Prophet. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 116.)

"Sunday 20th. This day was spent by our company principally at Adam-ondi-Ahman; but near the close of the day we struck our tents and traveled about six miles north, and encamped for the night with Judge Morin and company, who were also traveling north.

"Monday 21st. This morning, after making some locations in this place, which is in township 61, ranges 27 and 28, we returned to Robinson's Grove, about two miles, to secure some land near Grand River, which we passed the day previous; and finding a mistake in the former survey, I sent the surveyor south five or six miles to obtain a correct line, while some of us tarried to obtain water for the camp.

"In the evening I called a council of the brethren, to know whether it was wisdom to go immediately into the north country, or tarry here and hereabouts, to secure land on Grand River, etc. The brethren spoke their minds freely on the subject, when I stated to the council that I felt impressed to tarry and secure all the land near by that is not secured between this and Far West, especially on Grand River. President Rigdon concurred, and the council voted unanimously to secure the land on Grand River, and between this and Far West.

"Tuesday 22nd. President Rigdon went east with a company, and selected some of the best locations in the county, and returned with a good report of that vicinity, and with information of valuable locations which might be secured. Following awhile the course of the company, I returned to camp in Robinson's Grove, and thence went west to obtain some game to supply our necessities. We discovered some antiquities, about one mile west of the camp, consisting of stone mounds, apparently erected in square piles, though somewhat decayed and obliterated by the weather of many years. These mounds were probably erected by the aborigines of the land, to secrete treasures. We returned without game.

"Wednesday 23rd. We all traveled east locating lands, to secure a claim on Grove Creek, and near the 'City of Adam-ondi-Ahman.' Towards evening I accompanied Elder Rigdon to Col. Wight's, and the remainder of the company returned to their tents.

"Thursday 24th. This morning the company returned to Grove Creek to finish the survey, accompanied by President Rigdon and Col. Wight, and I returned to Far West."

The following is from the Juvenile Instructor:

"Great curiosity has been felt by learned men in the world to know the exact spot where the garden of Eden was situated. They have searched all Asia to find the place, but have not been able to decide upon it. But, from the fact that the ark rested on the mountain Ararat, which is in Asia, it has been generally supposed that Adam must have dwelt in Asia. It required the word of the Lord to decide this point. Joseph obtained a revelation on this subject. From the Lord, Joseph learned that Adam had dwelt on the land of America, and that the garden of Eden was located where Jackson County, Missouri, now is.

"In the Book of Doctrine and Covenants it is said that 'Three years previous to the death of Adam, he called Seth, Enos, Cainan, Mahalaleel, Jared, Enoch, and Methuselah, who were all High Priests, with the residue of his posterity who were righteous, into the valley of Adam-ondi-Ahman, and there bestowed upon them his last blessing. And the Lord appeared unto them, and they rose up and blessed Adam, and called him Michael, the Prince, the Archangel. And the Lord administered comfort unto Adam, and said unto him, I have set thee to be at the head—a multitude of nations shall come of thee, and thou art a prince over them for ever. And Adam stood up in the midst of the congregation, and notwithstanding he was bowed down with age, being full of the Holy Ghost, predicted whatsoever should befall his posterity unto the latest generation. These things were all written in the Book of Enoch, and are to be testified of in due time.' How gratifying it is to have doubt removed upon such points, and to have the word of the Lord to depend upon! With what peculiar emotions Joseph and the brethren must have trod upon this holy land, the Lord having told them what had taken place there in the early days of men, and what would yet take place there in the future! The remains of the altar, on which Adam had offered sacrifice, were plainly to be seen."

Subsequently a Stake of Zion was organized in Daviess County. (See Adam-ondi-Ahman, page 45.)

May 8, 1838, the following questions, which had previously been asked a number of times, were answered by Joseph Smith, and subsequently published in the Elders' Journal, No. 3:

"1st. 'Do you believe the Bible?' If we do, we are the only people under heaven that does, for there are none of the religious sects of the day that do.

"2nd. 'Wherein do you differ from other sects?' Because we believe the Bible and all other sects profess to believe their interpretations of the Bible and their creeds.

"3rd. 'Will everybody be damned but Mormons?' Yes, and a great portion of them, unless they repent and work righteousness.

"4th. 'How and where did you obtain the Book of Mormon?' Moroni, who deposited the plates in a hill in Manchester, Ontario County, New York, being dead and raised again therefrom, appeared unto me, and told me where they were, and gave me directions how to obtain them. I obtained them and the Urim and Thummim with them, by the means of which I translated the plates; and thus came the Book of Mormon.

"5th. 'Do you believe Joseph Smith, jun., to be a Prophet?' Yes, and every other man who has the testimony of Jesus. For the testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy. (Rev. 19: 10.)

"6th. 'Do the Mormons believe in having all things common?' No!

"7th. 'Do the Mormons believe in having more wives than one?' No, not at the same time.* But they believe that if their companion dies, they have a right to marry again. But we do disapprove of the custom, which has gained in the world, and has been practised among us, to our great mortification, in marrying in five or six weeks, or even in two or three months, after the death of their companion. We believe that due respect ought to be had of the memory of the dead, and the feelings of both friends and children.

"8th. 'Can they (the Mormons) raise the dead?' No, nor any other people that now lives, or ever did live. But God can raise the dead, through man as an instrument.

"9th. 'What signs does Joe Smith give of his divine mission?' The signs which God is pleased to let him give, according as his wisdom thinks best, in order that he may judge the world agreeably to his own plan.

"10th. 'Was not Joe Smith a money digger?' Yes, but it was never a very profitable job for him, as he only got $14 a month for it.

"11th. 'Did not Joe Smith steal his wife?' Ask her, she was of age, she can answer for herself.

"12th. 'Do the people have to give up their money when they join his Church?' No other requirement than to bear their proportion of the expenses of the Church, and support the poor.

"13th. 'Are the Mormons Abolitionists?' No, unless delivering the people from priestcraft, and the priests from the power of Satan, should be considered such. But we do not believe in setting the negroes free.

"14th. 'Do they not stir up the Indians to war, and to commit depredations?' No, and they who reported the story knew it was false when they put it in circulation. These and similar reports are palmed upon the people by the priests, and this is the only reason why we ever thought of answering them.

"15th. 'Do the Mormons baptize in the name of Joe Smith?' No, but if they did it would be as valid as the baptism administered by the sectarian priests.

"16th. 'If the Mormon doctrine is true, what has become of all those who died since the days of the Apostles?' All those who have not had an opportunity of hearing the gospel, and being administered unto by an inspired man in the flesh, must have it hereafter, before they can be finally judged.

"17th. 'Does not Joe Smith profess to be Jesus Christ?' No, but he professes to be his brother, as all other Saints have done and now do. Matt. 12: 49, 50: 'And he stretched forth his hand towards his diciples and said, Behold my mother and my brethren; for whosoever shall do the will of my Father, which is in heaven, the same is my brother, and sister, and mother.'

"18th. 'Is there anything in the Bible which licenses you to believe in revelation nowadays?' Is there anything that does not authorize us to believe so? If there is, we have as yet not been able to find it.

"19th. 'Is not the canon of the Scriptures full?' If it is, there is a great defect in the book, or else it would have said so.

"20th. 'What are the fundamental principles of your religion?' The fundamental principles of our religion are the testimony of the Apostles and Prophets concerning Jesus Christ, that he died, was buried, and rose again the third day, and ascended up into heaven; and all other things which pertain to our religion are only appendages to it. But in connection with these, we believe in the gift of the Holy Ghost, the power of faith, the enjoyment of the spiritual gifts according to the will of God, the restoration of the house of Israel, and the final triump of truth.' "

In the meantime persecutions were again renewed against the Saints in Missouri, commencing with a riot at Gallatin, Daviess County, August 6th, where the mobbers tried to prevent the brethren from voting. (See Gallatin.) The next morning (August 7th) the report reached Far West, through persons who did not belong to the Church, that two or three brethren had been killed by the Missourians, and left dead on the ground, their bodies not being suffered to be interred. This report created some excitement, especially when the brethren heard, also, that the majority of the people of Daviess County were determined to drive the Saints from the county. Joseph writes:

*This was before the revelation on celestial marriage was given.

"On hearing this report, I started for Gallatin (August 7th) to assist the brethren, accompanied by President Rigdon, Brother Hyrum Smith and fifteen or twenty others, who were armed for their own protection; and the command of the company was given to George W. Robinson.

"On our way we were joined by the brethren from different parts of the country, some of whom were attacked by the mob, but we all reached Colonel Wight's that night in safety, where we found some of the brethren who had been mobbed at Gallatin, with others, waiting for our counsel. Here we received the cheering intelligence that none of the brethren were killed, although several were badly wounded.

"From the best information, about one hundred and fifty Missourians warred against from six to twelve of our brethren, who fought like lions. Several Missourians had their skulls cracked. Blessed be the memory of those few brethren who contended so strenuously for their constitutional rights and religious freedom, against such an overwhelming force of desperadoes!

"Wednesday, 8th. After spending the night in council at Colonel Wight's I rode out with some of the brethren to view the situation of affairs in that region, and among others called on Adam Black, justice of the peace and judge-elect for Daviess County, who had some time previous sold his farm to Brother Vinson Knight, and received part pay according to agreement, and afterwards united himself with a band of mobbers to drive the Saints from, and prevent their settling in, Daviess County. On interrogation, he confessed what he had done, and in consequence of this violation of his oath, as magistrate, we asked him to give us some satisfaction so that we might know whether he was our friend or enemy, whether or not he would administer the law in justice; and politely requested him to sign an agreement of peace; but being jealous, he would not sign it, but said he would write one himself to our satisfaction and sign it, which he did, as follows:

" 'I, Adam Black, a Justice of the Peace of Daviess County, do bereby Sertify to the people, coled Mormin, that he is bound to suport the Constitution of this State, and of the United State, and he is not attached to any mob, nor will not attach himself to any such people, and so long as they will not molest me, I will not molest them. This the 8th day of August, 1838.

" 'ADAM BLACK, J. P.' "

Hoping that he would abide his own decision and support the law, Joseph and his brethren left Mr. Black in peace and returned to Adam-ondi-Ahman, where they on the day following met in council with some of the leading men of the county. At this meeting both parties entered into a covenant of peace, to preserve each other's rights and stand in their defense, that if any one individual should go wrong, neither party should uphold them or endeavor to screen them from justice, but deliver up all offenders to be dealt with according to law and justice. The assembly dispersed on these friendly terms, after which Joseph and his friends returned to Far West.

It was brotherly and warm feelings towards his friends, who were exposed to danger, which prompted Joseph to hasten to Daviess County to render them what assistance he could; he had no desire to harm anybody. Nevertheless, his enemies spared no pains to bring him into trouble. Mr. Black, twenty days after giving Joseph and his company that document, made an affidavit that he had been threatened with instant death, by an armed force of 154 men if he did not sign a certain instrument binding himself, as a justice of the peace for said county of Daviess, not to molest the people called Mormons; he also swore that they had threatened the lives of himself and other individuals. William P. Peniston also, who was the candidate at the election, went into Ray County and swore before Judge Austin A. King that a large body of men had committed violence against Adam Black by surrounding his house, and taking him and forcing him, under threats of death, to sign a writing of a very disgraceful character, and that they had threatened to kill him (Peniston) on sight, and also to drive all the old citizens of Daviess County from the county and to take possession of their property. He also swore that Joseph and Lyman Wight were the leaders of this body of men. Three other mobbers swore to the same effect.

Judge King, on the affidavit of Peniston and the others, issued a writ for the arrest of Joseph, for visiting Daviess County. The sheriff of Daviess County called upon Joseph at Far West, and notified him that he had a writ for him to take him to Daviess County for trial. The report had been circulated that Joseph would not suffer himself to be taken by legal process, but he soon relieved the sheriff by telling him that he always intended to submit to the laws of the land; he wished, however, to be tried in his own county, as there was too much excitement and bad feeling in Daviess County for him to have any hope of obtaining justice there. When the sheriff heard what Joseph had to say, he declined serving the writ upon him, and said he would go and see Judge King on the subject. He went, and when he returned, he found Joseph at home, he having promised the sheriff that he would remain there until his return. He very gravely informed Joseph that he could not act in Caldwell County, and that he, therefore, was out of his jurisdiction, and then withdrew.

But, from this circumstance, the report went out, and was widely spread, that Joseph and Lyman Wight had resisted the officer. This was done to create excitement. The wicked, who were determined to find, if possible, causes of offense against them, went into the surrounding country telling the most adominable lies about Joseph and the Saints. The consequence was that the mob began to collect from all Upper Missouri into Daviess County for the purpose, as they said, of helping to take Joseph and Lyman Wight. About this time Lilburn W. Boggs, who now had become governor of the State of Missouri, issued orders as commander-in-chief of the militia, through his adjutant-general, to Generals David R. Atchison, John B. Clark, Samuel D. Lucas, David Willock, Louis Bolton, Henry W. Crowther and Thomas D. Grant, to have some companies of cavalry and infantry in their several divisions of the militia put in readiness for immediate service. The excuse made by Boggs for this action was that there were signs of Indian disturbances and of civil disturbances in Caldwell, Daviess and Carroll Counties. The allusion to Indian troubles was merely a blind; Boggs knew that there was no cause to raise the militia to guard against the Indians, but he hoped to have an opportunity to use the troops against the Saints. Lilburn W. Boggs was a base, bad man —a traitor to every republican principle, and a bloody tyrant, who took delight in using his power for the persecution and destruction of the innocent.

To do everything in his power to remove all causes of offence, and to show himself a law-abiding, loyal man, was always a matter of duty with Joseph. If others did wrong, and acted in direct violation of all law and justice by joining together in mobs, he did not desire to follow their example, but always acted in such a manner that he had the law on his side. Those who knew him, therefore, were not surprised at his willingness to volunteer to be tried by Judge King in Daviess County, and that the public might not remain in ignorance about the details of his visit to Daviess County, he made an affidavit, in which he set forth with straightforward plainness all the particulars of his trip.

September 6, 1838, Joseph, accompanied by his brother Hyrum and others of the brethren, left Far West for the place appointed for trial; but the plaintiff was absent, and the court adjourned until the next day. In going there the next day, Joseph deemed it wise to have a company of the brethren accompany him to the line of Caldwell County, and there remain so as to be ready at a moment's warning, if there should be any difficulty at the trial. This was very necessary, as the excitement was very high, and many threats had been made against Joseph. William P. Peniston was the prosecutor, and his only witness was Adam Black. Upon this occasion Black maintained his old character for lying. He swore by the job; and such lies as he told were probably never exceeded in any court in the world. There were four witnesses who testified for Joseph, but what weight could four truthful Latter-day Saints' testimony have in a court in Missouri against one bad, false man who opposed them? King bound Joseph and Lyman Wight over to court in a $500 bond, though there was no proof against them to criminate them. But supposing the judge did it to pacify the feelings of the mob, Joseph submitted to the decision, gave the required bonds with sufficient security, and then returned to Far West. The judge afterwards, in the presence of Geo. W. Robinson, stated that there had been nothing proved against them, which should require any security to be given, but it was the mob and not justice which should be satisfied.

In relation to the troubles which he and the Saints had to pass through in those days, Joseph writes:

"They (the mobbers) are continually chafing us, and provoking us to anger if possible, one sign of threatening after another, but we do not fear them, for the Lord God the Eternal Father is our God, and Jesus the Mediator is our Savior, and in the Great I AM is our strength and confidence. We have been driven time after time, and that without cause, and smitten again and again, and that without provocation, until we have proved the world with kindness, and the world proved us that we have no design against any man or set of men, that we injure no man, that we are peaceable with all men, minding our own business and our business only. We have suffered our rights and our liberties to be taken from us; we have not avenged ourselves of those wrongs; we have appealed to magistrates, to sheriffs, to judges, to government and to the President of the United States, all in vain; yet we have yielded peaceably to all these things. We have not complained at the Great God, we murmured not, but peaceably left all and retired into the back country, in the broad and wild prairie, in the barren and desolate plains, and there commenced anew; we made the desolate places to bud and blossom as the rose; and now the fiend-like race are disposed to give us no rest."

As the particulars of the mobbings in Caldwell, Daviess and Carroll Counties and the part Joseph took in the defense will be given under the headings of Far West, De Witt, Haun's Mill Massacre, Gallatin, etc., in subsequent numbers of the RECORD, we will here briefly state that Joseph continued his labors quietly among the Saints, giving them advice and counsel in their afflictions, until he was betrayed into the hands of his enemies by Geo. M. Hinkle, colonel of the militia in Far West, who secretly made an engagement with the mob to deliver up to them the Church leaders to be tried and punished, and also to deliver up the arms of every description belonging to the brethren.

CHAPTER 11.

Joseph Smith, Sidney Rigdon, Parley P. Pratt, Lyman Wight, Hyrum Smith, Amasa M. Lyman and George W. Robinson betrayed into the hands of the enemy by Geo. M. Hinkle.—Saved by General A. W. Doniphan.—Sentenced to be shot.—Heart-rending scenes in the families of the prisoners.—March to Jackson County.—General Wilson's behavior to the prisoners.—Prophecies and their fulfillment.—The prisoners are marched to Richmond, where they are put in chains and again senteneed to be shot.—Joseph rebukes the guard.—Mock-trial in Richmond.—Joseph and fellow-prisoners incarcerated in Liberty and Richmond jails.

It was towards evening of October 31st, 1838, that George M. Hinkle waited on Joseph Smith, Sidney Rigdon, Parley P. Pratt, Lyman Wight and George W. Robinson, and stated that the officers of the army wanted a mutual consultation with them, hoping thereby that the difficulties between the Saints and the Missourians might be settled without having occasion to carry into effect the governor's exterminating order. He also assured them that Generals Lucas, Wilson and Doniphan had pledged their sacred honor that they should not be abused or insulted, but that they should be guarded back in safety in the morning, or as soon as the consultation was over. When the brethren got about half way to the camp of the mob-militia, they were met by General Lucas with a strong guard and also a cannon. As Lucas came up, he ordered his men to surround the brethren; after which Hinkle stepped forward and said: "These are the prisoners I agreed to deliver up." Lucas drew his sword and brandished it, and told the brethren that they were his prisoners. Immediately a great number of guns were cocked and some of them were pointed at Joseph and his companions. The Prophet writes:

"Judge of my surprise, when, instead of being treated with that respect which is due from one citizen to another, we were taken as prisoners of war, and treated with the utmost contempt. The officers would not converse with us, and the soldiers, almost to a man, insulted us as much as they felt disposed, breathing out threats against me and my companions. I cannot begin to tell the scene which I there witnessed. The loud cries and yells of more than one thousand voices, which rent the air and could be heard for miles, and the horrid and blasphemous threats and curses which were poured upon us in torrents, were enough to appall the stoutest heart. In the evening we had to lie down on the cold ground, surrounded by a strong guard, who were only kept back by the power of God from depriving us of life. We petitioned the officers to know why we were thus treated, but they utterly refused to give us any answer or to converse with us."

"If the vision of the infernal regions could suddenly open to the mind, with thousands of malicious fiends, all clamoring, exulting, deriding, blaspheming, mocking, railing, raging and foaming like a troubled sea, then could some idea be formed of the hell which we had entered. * * *

"No pen need undertake to describe our feelings during that terrible night, while there confined—not knowing the fate of our wives and children, nor of our fellow Saints, and seeing no way for our lives to be saved except by the miraculous power of God. But, notwithstanding all earthly hopes were gone, still we felt a calmness indescribable. A secret whispering to our inmost soul seemed to say: 'Peace, my sons, be of good cheer, your work is not yet done; therefore I will restrain your enemies, that they shall not have power to take your lives.'"

The next day, November 1st, Hyrum Smith and Amasa M. Lyman were torn away from their families and brought as prisoners into the camp of the mob-militia. In the morning of the next day General Lucas demanded that the arms of the militia of Far West be taken away. He promised that the people should be protected and the arms restored; but they received no protection and the arms were never restored to the owners. No sooner had the mob got possession of the arms than they commenced their ravages, plundering the Saints of their bedding, clothing, money and everything of value which they could lay their hands upon. They also went to Joseph's house, drove his family out of doors and carried away most of his property.

The following night a court martial was held. This court was composed of seventeen preachers and some of the principal officers of the army, Samuel D. Lucas presiding. This court did not bring Joseph or any of the brethren before it, but it sentenced them to be shot at 8 o'clock the next morning in the public square at Far West, and in the presence of their families and friends. When the sentence was passed, General Doniphan arose and said that neither himself nor his brigade should have any hand in the shooting—that it was nothing short of cold-blooded murder, and then left the court martial and ordered his brigade to prepare and march off the ground.

This unexpected and bold action on the part of General Doniphan and a few of the others so alarmed the haughty murderer that he did not dare to put the decree into execution. Not until the next morning were the prisoners apprised of the decision of the court martial, when General Doniphan himself came to the place where the prisoners were under guard and said: "By G—d, you have been sentenced by the court martial to be shot this morning; but I will be d—d if I will have any of the honor of it, or any of the disgrace of it; therefore I have ordered my brigade to take up the line of march, and to leave the camp; for I consider it to be cold-blooded murder, and I bid you farewell." He then went away.

Joseph inquired of General Wilson, who had been one of the mob in Jackson County, what he had done that he should be treated with such indignity, stating that he had always been a supporter of the Constitution and of Democracy. His reply was: "I know it, and that is the reason I want to kill you, or have you killed."

In another court martial, which was held subsequently, it was decided to take the brethren as prisoners of war to Jackson County and execute them there. Before starting, and after using many entreaties, Joseph and his companions were permitted, under a strong guard, to go to Far West to take leave of their families.

Joseph writes: "I found my wife and children in tears, who feared we had been shot by those who had sworn to take our lives, and that they would see me no more. When I entered my house, they clung to my garments, their eyes streaming with tears, while mingled emotions of joy and sorrow were manifest in their countenances. I requisted to have a private interview with them for a few minutes, but this privilege was denied me by the guard. I was then obliged to take my departure. But who can realize the feelings which I experienced at that time, to be thus torn from my companion, and leave her surrounded with monsters in the shape of men, and my children, too, not knowing how their wants would be supplied; while I was to be taken far from them in order that my enemies might destroy me when they thought proper to do so. My partner wept, my children clung to me until they were thrust from me by the swords of the guards. I felt overwhelmed while I witnessed the scene, and could only commend them to the care of that God whose kindness had followed me to the present time, and who alone could protect them, and deliver me from the hands of my enemies, and restore me to my family. After this painful scene I was then taken back to the camp, and with the rest of my brethren, namely, Sidney Rigdon, Hyrum Smith, Parley P. Pratt, Lyman Wight, Amasa M. Lyman and Geo. W. Robinson, started off for Independence, Jackson County."

Parley P. Pratt, another of the prisoners, writes as follows:

"This was the most trying scene of all. I went to my house, being guarded by two or three soldiers; the cold rain was pouring down without, and on entering my little cottage, there lay my wife sick of a fever, with which she had been for some time confined. At her breast was our son Nathan, an infant of three months, and by her side a little girl of five years. On the foot of the same bed lay a woman in travail, who had been driven from here house in the night, and had taken momentary shelter in my hut of ten feet square—my larger house having been torn down. I stepped to the bed; my wife burst into tears. I spoke a few words of comfort, telling her to try to live for my sake and the children's; and expressing a hope that we should meet again, though years might separate us. She promised to try to live. I then embraced and kissed the little babes and departed. Till now I had refrained from weeping: but to be forced from so helpless a family, who were destitute of provisions and fuel, and deprived almost of shelter in a bleak prairie, with none to assist them, exposed to a lawless banditti who were utter strangers to humanity, and this at the approach of winter, was more than nature could well endure.

"I went to General Moses Wilson in tears, and stated the circumstances of my sick, heartbroken and destitute family in terms which would have moved any heart that had a latent spark of humanity yet remaining. But I was only answered with an exultant laugh, and a taunt of reproach by this hardened murderer.

"As I returned from my house towards the troops in the square, I halted with the guard at the door of Hyrum Smith, and heard the sobs and groans of his wife, at his parting words. She was then near confinement, and needed more than ever the comfort and consolation of a husband's presence. As we returned to the wagon we saw Sidney Rigdon taking leave of his wife and daughters, who stood at a little distance, in tears of anguish indescribable. In the wagon sat Joseph Smith, while his aged father and venerable mother came up overwhelmed with tears, and took each of the prisoners by the hand with a silence of grief too great for utterance.

"In the meantime hundreds of the brethren crowded around us, anxious to take a parting look or a silent shake of the hand, for feelings were too intense to allow of speech. In the midst of these scenes orders were given, and we moved slowly away, under the conduct of General Wilson and his whole brigade. A march of twelve miles brought us to Crooked River, where we camped for the night. Here General Wilson began to treat us more kindly; he became very sociable, conversing very freely on the subject of his former murders and robberies committed against us in Jackson. He did not pretend to deny anything; but spoke upon the whole as freely as if he had been giving the history of other ages or countries, in which his audience had no personal concern. Said he:

" 'We Jackson County boys know how it is, and therefore have not the extremes of hatred and prejudice which characterize the rest of the troops. We know perfectly well from the beginning the Mormons have not been the aggressors at all. As it began in 1833 in Jackson County, so it has been ever since. You Mormons were crowded to the last extreme, and compelled to self-defence; and this has been construed into treason, murder and plunder. We mob you without law; the authorities refuse to protect you according to law; you then are compelled to protect yourselves, and we act upon the prejudices of the public, who join our forces, and the whole is legalized, for your destruction and our gain. Is not this a shrewd and cunning policy on our part, gentlemen?

" 'When we drove you from Jackson County, we burned two hundred and three of your houses; plundered your goods; destroyed your press, type, paper, books, office and all—tarred and feathered old Bishop Partridge, as exemplary an old man as you can find anywhere. We shot down some of your men, and, if any of you returned the fire, we imprisoned you, and tried you for murder, etc. Damn'd shrewdly done, gentlemen; and I came damn'd near kicking the bucket myself; for on one occasion, while we were tearing down houses, driving families and destroying and plundering goods, some of you good folks put a ball through my son's body, and another through the arm of my clerk, and a third pierced my shirt collar and marked my neck. No blame, gentlemen; we deserved it. And let a set of men serve me as your community have been served, and I'll be damn'd if I would not fight till I died.

" 'It was repeatedly insinuated by the other officers and troops, that we should hang you prisoners on the first tree we came to on the way to Independence; but I'll be damn'd if anybody shall hurt you. We just intend to exhibit you in Independence, let the people look at you, and see what a damn'd set of fine fellows you are. And, more particularly, to keep you from that G—d damn'd old bigot of a General Clark and his troops, from down country, who are so stuffed with lies and prejudice that they would shoot you down in a moment.'

"Such was the tenor of the conversation addressed by General Wilson to his prisoners. Indeed it was now evident that he was proud of his prey, and felt highly enthusiastic in having the honor of returning in triumph to Independence with his prisoners, whom his superstition had magnified into something more than fellow-citizens—something noble or supernatural and worthy of public exhibition.

"As we arose and commenced our march on the morning of the 3rd of November, Joseph Smith spoke to me and the other prisoners, in a low but cheerful and confidential tone; said he: 'Be of good cheer, brethren; the word of the Lord came to me last night that our lives should be given us, and that whatever we may suffer during this captivity, not one of our lives should be taken.' Of this prophecy I testify in the name of the Lord, and though spoken in secret, its public fulfillment and the miraculous escape of each one of us is too notorious to need my testimony.

"In the after part of the day we came to the Missouri River, which separated us from Jackson County. Here the brigade was halted and the prisoners taken to a public house, where we were permitted to shave, change our linen and partake of some refreshment. This done, we were hurried to the ferry and across the river with the utmost haste in advance of the troops. This movement was soon explained to us. The truth was, General Clark had now arrived near the scene of action, and had sent an express to take us from General Wilson and prevent us from going to Jackson County—both armies being competitors for the honor of possessing the wonderful, or, in their estimation, royal prisoners.

"Clark and his troops, from a distance, who had not arrived in the city of Far West till after our departure, were desirous of seeing the strange men whom it was said had turned the world upside down and of possessing such a wonderful trophy of victory, or of putting them to death themselves. On the other hand, Wilson and his brigade were determined to exhibit us through the streets of Independence as a visible token of their own acheivements. Therefore, when demanded by General Clark's express, they refused to surrender us, and hurried us across the ferry with all possible dispatch. Marching about a mile, we encamped for the night in the wilderness, with about fifty troops for our guard—the remainder not crossing the ferry till the next morning.

"Some of the neighboring citizens visited us next morning—it being Sunday. One of the ladies came up and very candidly inquired of the troops which of the prisoners the 'Mormons' worshipped? One of the guards, pointing to Mr. Smith with a significant smile, said, 'This is he.' The woman then turning to Mr. Smith, inquired whether he professed to be the Lord and Savior?

"Do not smile, gentle reader, at the ignorance of these poor, innocent creatures, who, by the exertions of a corrupt press and pulpit, are kept in ignorance and made to believe in every possible absurdity in relation to the Church or the Saints. Mr. Smith replied, that he professed to be nothing hut a man, and a minister of salvation, sent by Jesus Christ to preach the gospel. After expressing some surprise, the lady inquired what was the peculiar nature of the gospel, as held by himself and his Church At this the visitors and soldiers gathered around, and Mr. Smith preached to them faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, repentance towards God, reformation of life, immersion in water, in the name of Jesus Christ, for remission of sins, and the gift of the Holy Ghost by the laying on of hands.

"All seemed surprised, and the lady, in tears, went her way, praising God for the truth, and praying aloud that the Lord would bless and deliver the prisoners."

Thus was fulfilled a prophecy which Joseph had made in public a few months previous, that a sermon should be preached in Jackson County before the close of the year 1838. Those who at that time heard Joseph make the prediction could not understand how it could be fulfilled, as the excitement and hatred toward the Saints in that county was so great, that if an Elder should have attempted to preach there he would no doubt have been killed. Elder Pratt continues:

"At I0 o'clock the brigade had all crossed the river and come up with us. We were then marched forward in our carriages, while the troops were formed into a front and rear guard, with quite a martial appearance. As we passed along through the settlemetns, hundreds of men, women and children flocked to see us. General Wilson often halted the whole brigade to introduce us to the populace, pointing out each of us by name. Many shook us by the hand, and, in the ladies at least, there appeared some feelings of human compassion and sympathy.

"In this way we proceeded till we arrived at Independence. It was now past noon, and in the midst of a great rain; but hundreds crowded to witness the procession, and to gaze at us as we were paraded in martial triumph through the principal streets, the bugles sounding a blast of triumphant joy.

"This ceremony being finished, a vacant house was prepared for our reception, into which we were ushered through the crowd of spectators which thronged every avenue.

"The troops were then disbanded. In the meantime we were kept under a small guard, and were treated with some degree of humanity, while hundreds flocked to see us day after day. We spent most of our time in preaching and conversation, explanatory of our doctrines and practice. Much prejudice was removed, and the feelings of the populace began to be in our favor, notwithstanding their former wickedness and hatred."

Joseph writes: "Shortly after our arrival in Jackson County, Colonel Sterling Price, from the army of General Clark, came with orders from General Clark, who was commander-in-chief of the expedition, to have us forwarded forthwith to Richmond. Accordingly, on Thursday morning, we started with three guards only, and they had been obtained with great difficulty, after laboring all the previous day to get them. Between Independence and Roy's Ferry, on the Missouri River, they all got drunk, and we got possession of their arms and horses. It was late in the afternoon, near the setting of the sun. We traveled about half a mile after we crossed the river, and put up for the night.

"Friday, 9th. This morning there came a number of men, some of them armed. Their threatenings and savage appearance were such as to make us afraid to proceed without more guards. A messenger was therefore dispatched to Richmond to obtain them.

"We started before their arrival, but had not gone far before we met Colonel Price with a guard of about seventy-four men, and were conducted by them to Richmond, and put in an old vacant house, and a guard set.

"Some time through the course of that day, General Clark came in, and we were introduced to him. We inquired of him the reason why we had been thus carried from our homes, and what were the charges against us. He said that he was not then able to determine, but would be in a short time; and with very little more conversation he withdrew."

Some time after General Clark had withdrawn, Colonel Price came in with two chains in his hands and a number of padlocks. The two chains he fastened together. He also brought with him ten men, who, while these preparations were going on, stood with their thumbs upon the cock of their guns, ready to fire on a moment's notice. He first had the windows nailed down, after which he ordered a man by the name of John Fullkerson, whom he brought with him, to chain the brethren, seven in number, with a kind of trace chain, extending from one man's ankle to another and fastened around one ankle of each with a padlock. In this situation, in a room without beds, chairs and other conveniences, they were guarded night and day by about ten men at a time, who stood over them with loaded pistols in hand. At night they were stretched on the floor in a row, upon their backs, and tried to sleep, but the hard floor, the cold, the inability to change their position because of their chains, and the noise of the guards, effectually prevented sleep. The following is from the pen of Apostle Parley P. Pratt:

"In one of those tedious nights we had laid as if in sleep, till the hour of midnight had passed, and our ears and hearts had been pained, while we listened for hours to obscene jests, the horrid oaths, the dreadful blasphemies and filthy language of our guards, Colonel Price at their head, as they recounted to each other their deeds of rapine, murder, robbery, etc., which they had committed among the Mormons while at Far West and vicinity; they even boasted of defiling, by force, wives, daughters and virgins, and of shooting or dashing out the brains of men, women and children. I had listened till I had become so disgusted, shocked, horrified and so filled with the spirit of indignant justice, that I could scarcely refrain from rising upon my feet and rebuking the guards, but had said nothing to Joseph or anyone else, although I lay next to him, and knew he was awake. On a sudden he arose to his feet, and spoke in a voice of thunder, or as the roaring lion, uttering, as near as I can recollect, the following words:

" 'SILENCE! ye fiends of the infernal pit! In the name of Jesus Christ I rebuke you, and command you to be still. I will not live another minute and hear such language. Cease such talk, or you or I die THIS MINUTE!'

"He ceased to speak. He stood erect in terrible majesty. Chained and without a weapon; calm, unruffled and dignified as an angel, he looked down upon the quailing guards, whose weapons were lowered or dropped to the ground; whose knees smote together, and who, shrinking into a corner, or crouching at his feet, begged his pardon and remained quiet till a change of guards.

"I have seen the ministers of justice, clothed in magisterial robes, and criminals arraigned before them, while life was suspended upon a breath in the courts of England; I have witnessed a congress in solemn session to give laws to nations; I have tried to conceive of kings, of royal courts, of thrones and crowns, and of emperors assembled to decide the fate of kingdoms; but dignity and majesty have I seen but once, as it stood in chains, at midnight, in a dungeon, in an obscure village of Missouri."

General John Clark spent several days after the arrival of Joseph and fellow-prisoners in Richmond, in searching the law to find authority for trying them by a court martial. "Had he been a lawyer of eminence," writes Joseph, "I should have supposed it no very difficult task to decide that quiet, peaceful, unoffending and private citizens, too, except as ministers of the gospel, were not amenable to a military tribunal in a country governed by civil laws."

Clark also wrote to Governor Boggs and suggested the propriety of trying Joseph and the other brethren, who were prisoners, by a court martial for mutiny. He added, however, that it being doubtful whether a court martial had the authority to try them, he wished the governor to forward the opinion of the attorney-general of the State. "It will not do," he writes, "to allow these leaders to return to their treasonable work again, on account of their not being indicted in Caldwell. They have committed treason, arson, burglary, robbery, larceny and perjury."

To have had the brethren tried by court martial was no doubt General Clark's greatest desire, as he by this means thought to get rid of the prisoners in a quick and easy way, having endeavored in vain for some time to take their lives. Brother Jedediah M. Grant, then a young man, happened to put up at the same tavern with General Clark, at Richmond. He saw Clark make choice of his men to shoot Joseph and his fellow-prisoners on Monday, November 12th. He also saw the men who were selected make choice of their rifles, and load them with two bullets each. General Clark then saluted them, and said: "Gentlemen, you shall have the honor of shooting the Mormon leaders on Monday morning, at 8 o'clock."

He soon found out, however, that this plan could not easily be carried out, so he concluded to turn the prisoners over to the civil authorities for trial. A court of inquiry was then instituted, and the trial commenced on the 13th of November before Austin A. King, judge, and Thomas C. Birch, state attorney. Both these men had been on the court martial when Joseph and the other brethren were sentenced to be shot. A little reflection will show how utterly unfit they were to have anything to do with the case.

The trial commenced by summoning witnesses in behalf of the State. These were called and sworn at the point of the bayonet. Doctor Sampson Avard was the first witness brought before the court. He had previously told Mr. Oliver Olney that if he (Olney) wished to save himself, he must swear hard against the heads of the Church, as they were the ones the court wanted to criminate; and if he could swear hard against them, they would not (that is, neither court nor mob) disturb him. "I intend to do it," said he, "in order to escape, for if I do not, they will take my life." This introduction is sufficient to show the character of his testimony, and he swore just according to the statement he had made, doubtless thinking it a wise course to ingratiate himself into the good graces of the mob.

About forty others, principally apostates, testified upon the same principle as Avard, as only one kind of evidence was admitted—such, of course, as suited the mob. The Church organization was converted, by the testimony of the apostates, into a temporal kingdom, which was to fill the whole earth and subdue all other kingdoms. Much was inquired by the judge (who was a (Methodist) concerning the prophecy of Daniel: "In the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom which shall break in pieces all other kingdoms, and stand forever." "And the kingdom and the greatness of the kingdom, under the whole heaven, shall be given to the Saints of the Most High."

Having been informed that the Saints believed this prophecy, the judge turned to his clerk and said, "Write that down; it is a strong point for treason." One of the attorneys protested and observed, "Judge, you had better make the Bible treason." The court made no reply, but continued to inquire diligently into the doctrines of the Saints and the affairs of the Church. When it was found that the Church had sent missionaries to England and other foreign countries, this was construed as another evidence of treason against the State of Missouri.

The prisoners were then requested to name their witnesses, and when the names of forty or fifty persons had been given, the notorious bandit, Samuel Bogart, was dispatched to Far West with about fifty soldiers to bring them, but instead of taking them into court, he arrested all he could find and thrust them into prison. Again they were called upon for witnesses, and when these also were imprisoned or driven out of the country, the brethren, advised by their lawyers, General Doniphan and Amos Reed, concluded not to bring their witnesses to Richmond, for if they did, there would not be one of them left for final trial. As to making an impression on Judge King, General Doniphan said that if a cohort of angels were to come down and declare the prisoners innocent, it would be all the same; for the judge had determined from the beginning to cast them into prison.

When the trial was in process, a member of the Church named Allen was seen to pass the window. The prisoners requested that he might be introduced and sworn, which was finally done; but when he began to give his testimony, which went to establish the innocence of the prisoners and to show the murders, robberies, etc., committed by their accusers, the judge soon ordered the guard to put the witness out, which was done amid the yells, threats, insults and violence of the mob, who thronged in and around the court house. He barely escaped with his life. The result of this mock trial, which continued from the 13th to the 28th of November, was that Joseph Smith, Hyrum Smith, Sidney Rigdon, Lyman Wight, Alexander McRae and Caleb Baldwin were sent to Liberty, Clay County, to jail, to await trial for treason and murder—treason for having whipped the mob out of Daviess County and taking their cannon from them, and murder for the man killed in the Crooked River battle. Parley P. Pratt, Morris Phelps, Luman Gibbs, Darwin Chase and Norman Shearer were incarcerated in the Richmond jail, to stand their trial for the same crimes. All the other prisoners, including Amasa M. Lyman, were released or admitted to bail.

December 16, 1838, Joseph addressed a long letter from Liberty jail to the Saints, in which he gave them much instruction. He wrote in a cheerful and consoling manner. Though in prison his language breathed a spirit of trustfulness and confidence in the Lord. Respecting their persecutions he said:

"But we want you to remember Haman and Mordecai. You know that Haman could not be satisfied as long as he saw Mordecai at the king's gate, and he sought the life of Mordecai and the people of the Jews. But the Lord so ordered it that Haman was hanged upon his own gallows. So shall it come to pass with poor Hamans in the last days—those who have sought, by unbelief and wickedness, and by the principle of mobocracy, to destroy us and the people of God, by killing and scattering them abroad, and wilfully and maliciously delivering us into the hands of murderers, desiring us to be put to death, thereby having us dragged about in chains and cast into prison, and for what cause? It is because we were honest men, and were determined to defend the lives of the Saints at the expense of our own. I say unto you, that those who have thus vilely treated us, like Haman, shall be hanged upon their own gallows; or, in other words, shall fall into their own gin, and share, and ditch, and trap, which they have prepared for us, and shall go backward and stumble and fall, and their names shall be blotted out, and God shall reward them according to all their abominations."

He closed the letter as follows:

"And now, dear and well-beloved brethren—and when we say brethren, we mean those who have continued faithful in Christ, men, women and children—we feel to exhort you, in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, to be strong in the faith in the new and everlasting covenant, and nothing frightened at your enemies. For what has happened unto us is an evident token to them of damnation; but unto us, of salvation, and that of God. Therefore, hold on even unto death; for 'he that seeketh to save his life shall lose it; but he that loseth his life for my sake and the gospel's, shall find it,' saith Jesus Christ.

"Brethren, from henceforth, let truth and righteousness prevail and abound in you; and in all things be temperate; abstain from drunkenness, and from swearing, and from all profane language, and from everything which is unrighteous or unholy; also from enmity and hatred, and covetousness, and from every unholy desire. Be honest one with another, for it seemeth that some have came short of these things, and some have been uncharitable, and have manifested greediness because of their debts towards those who have been persecuted and dragged about with chains without cause, and imprisoned. Such characters God hates, and they shall have their turn of sorrow in the rolling of the great wheel, for it rolleth and none can hinder. Zion shall yet live, though she seemeth to be dead. Remember, that whatsoever measure you mete out to others it shall be measured to you again.

"We say unto you, brethren, be not afraid of your adversaries; contend earnestly against mobs and the unlawful works of dissenters and of darkness; and the very God of peace shall be with you, and make a way for your escape from the adversary of your souls. We commend you to God and the work of his grace, which is able to make us wise unto salvation."

In the meantime the Saints in Caldwell County were making preparations to leave Missouri early next spring, agreeable to the exterminating order of Governor Boggs; they were constantly annoyed by the mobocrats. Many of the State journals tried to hide the iniquity of the State by throwing a covering of lies over her atrocious deeds committed. "But," writes Joseph, "can they hide the governor's cruel order for banishment or extermination? Can they conceal the facts of the disgraceful treaty of the generals with their own officers and men at the city of Far West? Can they conceal the fact that twelve or fifteen thousand men, women and children have been banished from the State without trial or condemnation? And this at an expense of $200,000—and, this sum appropriated by the State legislature, in order to pay the troops for this act of lawless outrage? Can they conceal the fact that we have been imprisoned for many months, while our families, friends and witnesses have been driven away? Can they conceal the blood of the murdered husbands and fathers, or stifle the cries of the widow and the fatherless? Nay! The rocks and mountains may cover them in unknown depths, the awful abyss of the fathomless deep may swallow them up, and still their horrid deeds will stand forth in the broad light of day, for the wondering gaze of angels and of men! They cannot be hid!" He continues:

"Some time in December, Heber C. Kimball and Alanson Ripley were appointed, by the brethren in Far West, to visit us at Liberty jail as often as circumstances would permit or occasion required, which they faithfully performed. We were sometimes visited by our friends, whose kindness and attention I shall ever remember with feelings of lively gratitude; but frequently we were not suffered to have the privilege. Our victuals were of the coarsest kind, and served up in a manner which was disgusting.

"Thus in a land of liberty, in the town of Liberty, Clay County, Missouri, I and my fellow-prisoners, in chains, dungeons and jail, saw the close of 1838."

CHAPTER 12.

The case of the prisoners investigated by Judge Thurnham.—Sidney Rigdon released on bail.—Elders H. C. Kimball and Theodore Turley intercede in behalf of the prisoners.—Alexander McRae's narrative—The prisoners make an unsuccessful attempt to break jail.—Great excitement among the populace.—Hyrum Smith's statement.—Fifty men conspire to kill the Prophet.—Trial in Richmond before a drunken judge and jury.—Change of venue.—Joseph and fellow-prisoners escape from their guards on their journey toward Boone County.—Joseph arrives safely in Quincy, Ill.

"Tuesday, January 1, 1839," writes the Prophet Joseph, "dawned upon us as prisoners of hope, but not as sons of liberty. O Columbia! Columbia! How thou art fallen! 'The land of the free, and the home of the brave!' 'The asylum of the oppressed'—oppressing thy noblest sons, in a loathsome dungeon, without any provocation, only that they have claimed to worship the God of their fathers according to his own word, and the dictates of their own consciences."

But notwithstanding they commenced the year under so unpleasant circumstances, Joseph and his fellow-prisoners were full of hope that their innocence at last would be acknowledged and their deliverance, in consequence, be brought about. Consequently they resigned themselves patiently in the hands of Providence. "It is not our object to complain—to asperse anyone," states a communication which they addressed to the Missouri legislature, "all we ask is a fair and impartial trial. We ask the sympathies of no one; we ask sheer justice. This is all we expect, and all we merit; but we merit that."

Owing to the great excitement prevailing in the northern counties of Missouri, it was supposed that a court in that part of the country would to a greater or lesser degree be influenced thereby and consequently would hardly be able to render a just decision. Consequently the prisoners petitioned the Supreme Court of Missouri twice for a writ of habeas corpus, but this was denied in both instances, by Judge Reynolds, who afterward became governor of the State. After a while they demanded a habeas corpus writ of Judge Thurnham, one of the county judges, which, with considerable reluctance, was granted. At that time great threats were uttered by the mob; that if any of the prisoners were liberated, they should never get out of the country alive.

After the investigation, Sidney Rigdon was released from prison on bail, by the decision of the judge, but as the mob threatened to kill him if he was set at liberty, he returned with the other prisoners to jail, where he remained until a favorable opportunity presented itself for him to get away.

Through the friendship of the sheriff, Mr. Samuel Hadley, and the jailer, Mr. Samuel Tillery, he was let out of the jail secretly in the night, after having declared in prison, that the sufferings of Jesus Christ were a fool to his; and being solemnly warned by them to be out of the State with as little delay as possible, he made his escape. Being pursued by a body of armed men, it was through the direction of a kind Providence that he escaped out of their hands, and safely arrived in Quincy, Illinois.

Judge Thurnham acknowledged before Joseph and the other brethren who remained in prison that he knew they were innocent men, but for fear of his own life and that of the prisoners, he dared not set them at liberty. Their persecution, arrest, etc., he said, was only a repetition of the scenes in Jackson County, and the whole plan was concocted from the governor down to the lowest judge, for the purpose of stopping their increasing power and influence in the State.

About this time (February, 1839) Elders Heber C. Kimball and Alanson Ripley were at Liberty, where they had been almost weekly importuning at the feet of the judges; and while performing this duty on a certain occasion, Judge Hughes stared them full in the face and observed to one of his associates, that "by the look of these men's eyes they are whipped but not conquered; and let us beware how we treat these men, for their looks bespeak innocence;" and at that time he entreated his associates to admit of bail for all the prisoners; but the hardness of their hearts would not admit of so charitable a deed. They, however, continued to importune at the feet of the judges, and also to visit the prisoners; no one of the ruling part of the community disputed their innocence, but said, in consequence of the fury of the mob, that even-handed justice could not be administered; they were therefore compelled to abandon the idea of importuning at the feet of the judges, and leave the prisoners in the hands of God.

Alexander McRae, a fellow-prisoner with the Prophet Joseph, writes as follows:

"During our imprisonment, we had many visitors, both friends and enemies. Among the latter, many were angry with Brother Joseph, and accused him of killing a son, a brother, or some relative of theirs, at what was called the Crooked River battle. This looked rather strange to me, that so many should claim a son, or a brother killed there, when they reported only one man killed.

"Among our friends, who visited us, were President Brigham Young and Heber C. Kimball, of the First Presidency—the latter several times; George A. Smith, of the Quorum of the Twelve; Don Carlos Smith, brother of Joseph, who came several times, and brought some of our families to see us. Benjamin Covey, Bishop of the Twelfth Ward, Salt Lake City, brought each of us a new pair of boots, and made us a present of them. James Sloan, his wife and daughter, came several times. Alanson Ripley also visited us, and many others, whom to name would be too tedious. Orrin P. Rockwell brought us refreshments many times; and Jane Bleven and her daughter brought cakes, pies, etc., and handed them in at the windows. These things helped us much, as our food was very coarse, and so filthy that we could not eat it until we were driven to it by hunger.

"After we had been there some time, and had tried every means we could to obtain our liberty by the law, without effect (except Sidney Rigdon, who was bailed out), and also having heard, from a reliable source, that it had been stated in the public street, by the most influential men in that part of the country, that 'the Mormon prisoners would have to be condemned, or the character of the State would have to go down,' we came to the conclusion that we would try other means to effect it.

"Accordingly, on the 7th day of February, 1839, after counseling together on the subject, we concluded to try to go that evening when the jailer came with our supper; but brother Hyrum, before deciding fully, and to make it more sure, asked Brother Joseph to inquire of the Lord as to the propriety of the move. He did so, and received answer to this effect: that if we were all agreed, we could go clear that evening; and if we would ask, we should have a testimony for ourselves. I immediately asked, and had not more than asked, until I received as clear a testimony as I ever did of anything in my life, that it was true. Brother Hyrum Smith and Caleb Baldwin bore testimony to the same; but Lyman Wight said we might go if we chose, but he would not. After talking with him for some time, he said, 'if we would wait until the next day, he would go with us.' Without thinking we had no promise of success on any other day than the one above stated, we agreed to wait.

"When night came, the jailer came alone with our supper, threw the door wide open, put our supper on the table, and went to the back part of the room, where a pile of books lay, took up a book and went to reading, leaving us between him and the door, thereby giving us every chance to go if we had been ready. As the next day was agreed upon, we made no attempt to go that evening.

"When the next evening came, the case was very different; the jailer brought a double guard with him, and with them six of our brethren, to wit: Erastus Snow, William D. Huntington, Cyrus Daniels, David Holman, Alanson Ripley and Watson Barlow. I was afterwards informed that they were sent by the Church. The jailer seemed to be badly scared; he had the door locked and everything made secure. It looked like a bad chance to get away, but we were determined to try it; so when the jailer started out, we started too. Brother Hyrum took hold of the door, and the rest followed; but before we were able to render him the assistance he needed, the jailer and guard succeeded in closing the door, shutting the brethren in with us, except Cyrus Daniels, who was on the outside.

"As soon as the attempt was made inside, he took two of the guards, one under each arm, and ran down the stairs that led to the door, it being in the second story. When he reached the ground they got away from him; and seeing we had failed to get out, he started to run, but put his foot in a hole and fell. Just as he fell, a bullet from one of the guards passed very close to his head, and he thinks the fall saved his life.

"The scene that followed this defies description. I should judge, from the number, that all the town and many from the country, gathered around the jail, and every mode of torture and death that their imagination could fancy, was proposed for us, such as blowing up the jail, taking us out and whipping us to death, shooting us, burning us to death, tearing us to pieces with horses, etc. But they were so divided among themselves that they could not carry out any of their plans, and we escaped unhurt. * * * (See page 148.)

"We never suffered ourselves to go into any important measure without asking Brother Joseph to inquire of the Lord in relation to it. Such was our confidence in him as a Prophet, that when he said 'Thus saith the Lord,' we were confident it would be as he said; and the more we tried it, the more confidence we had, for we never found his word fail in a single instance.

"A short time before we were to go to Daviess County for trial, word came to us that either General Atchison or Doniphan would raise a military force, and go with us to protect us from the wrath of the people. The matter was discussed by the brethren (except Brother Joseph), and they naturally enough concluded it would be best; and although I had nothing to say, I concurred with them in my feelings. Brother Hyrum asked Joseph what he thought of it. Brother Joseph hung his head a few moments, and seemed in a deep study, and then raised up and said, 'Brother Hyrum, it will not do: we must trust in the Lord; if we take a guard with us, we shall be destroyed.'

"This was very unexpected to us; but Brother Hyrum remarked, 'If you say it in the name of the Lord, we will rely on it.' Said Brother Joseph, 'In the name of the Lord, if we take a guard with us, we will be destroyed; but if we put our trust in the Lord, we shall be safe and no harm shall befall us, and we shall be better treated than we have ever been since we have been prisoners.'

"This settled the question, and all seemed satisfied, and it was decided that we should have no extra guard, and they had only such a guard as they chose for our safe-keeping. When we arrived at the place where the court was held, I began to think he was mistaken for once, for the people rushed upon us en masse crying, 'Kill them; G—d d—n them, kill them.' I could se no chance for escape, unless we could fight our way through, and we had nothing to do it with. At this, Brother Joseph, at whom all seemed to rush, rose up and said, 'We are in your hands; if we are guilty, we refuse not to be punished by the law.' Hearing these words, two of the most bitter mobocrats in the country—one by the name of William Peniston, and the other Kinney or McKinney, I do not remember which—got upon benches and began to speak to the people, saying, 'Yes, gentlemen, these men are in our hands; let us not use violence, but let the law have its course; the law will condemn them, and they will be punished by it. We do not want the disgrace of taking the law into our own hands,' etc.

"In a few minutes they were quieted, and they seemed now as friendly as they had a few minutes before been enraged. Liquor was procured, and we all had to drink in token of friendship. This took place in the court room (a small log cabin about twelve feet square), during the adjournment of the court; and from that time until we got away, they could not put a guard over us who would not become so friendly that they dared not trust them, and the guard was very frequently changed. We were seated at the first table with the judge, lawyers and others, and had the best the country afforded, with feather beds to sleep on—a privilege we had not before enjoyed in all our imprisonment.

"On one occasion, while we were there, the above-named Peniston, partly in joke and partly in earnest, threw out a rather hard insinuation against some of the brethren. This touched Joseph's feelings, and he retorted a good deal in the same way, only with such power that the earth seemed to tremble under his feet, and said, 'Your heart is as black as your whiskers,' which were as black as any crow. He seemed to quake under it and left the room.

"The guard who had become friendly, were alarmed for our safety, and exclaimed, 'Oh, Mr. Smith, do not talk so; you will bring trouble upon yourself and companions.' Brother Joseph replied, 'Do not be alarmed; I know what I am about.' He always took up for the brethren, when their characters were assailed, sooner than for himself, no matter how unpopular it was to speak in their favor."

Hyrum Smith, another of the prisoners, writes:

"Our place of lodging (in the prison) was the square side of hewed white oak logs, and our food was anything but good and decent. Poison was administered to us three or four times. The effect it had upon our systems was, that it vomited us almost to death, and then we would lay some two or three days in a torpid, stupid state, not even caring or wishing for life.

"The poison would inevitably have proved fatal had not the power of Jehovah interposed in our behalf, to save us from their wicked purpose. We were also subjected to the necessity of eating human flesh! for the space of five days, or go without food, except a little coffee or a little corn bread. I chose the latter alternative. None of us partook of the flesh except Lyman Wight. We also heard the guard, which was placed over us, making sport of us, saying that 'they had fed us upon Mormon beef.'

"I have described the appearance of this flesh to several experienced physicians, and they have decided that it was human flesh. We learned afterwards, through one of the guards, that it was supposed that such acts of cannibalism as feeding us with human flesh would be considered a popular deed. But those concerned, on learning that it would not take, tried to keep it secret; but the fact was noised abroad before they took that precaution."

In the meantime the Saints made preparations to leave Missouri, in compliance with the governor's exterminating order. On the 7th of February, Joseph's family left Far West in charge of Stephen Markham, and after a journey of almost unsupportable hardships, reached the Mississippi River, opposite Quincy, on the 15th.

March 20th, Joseph and fellow-prisoners sent a lengthy epistle to the Saints at Quincy, Illinois, and scattered abroad, and to Bishop Partridge in particular, of which Sections 121, 122 and 123 of the Doctrine and Covenants are extracts.

In the latter part of March, 1839, Elders Kimball and Turley started on a mission to see the governor. They called on the sheriff of Ray County and jailer for a copy of the mittimus, by which the prisoners were held in custody, but he confessed he had none. They went to Judge King, and he made out a kind of mittimus. At this time Joseph and his brethren had been in prison several months without even a mittimus; and that, too, for crimes said to have been committed in another county.

Elders Kimball and Turley took all the papers by which they were held, or which were then made out for them, with the petitions of the prisoners to the supreme judges, and went to Jefferson City.

The governor was absent. The secretary of State treated them very kindly; and when he saw the papers, could hardly believe those were all the documents by which the prisoners were held in custody, for they were illegal.

Lawyer Doniphan had also deceived them in his papers, and sent them off with such documents that a change of venue could not be effected in time. The secretary was astonished at Judge King acting as he did, but said he could do nothing in the premises, and if the governor were present, he could do nothing; but the secretary wrote a letter to Judge King. The brethren then started to find the supreme judges and get writs of habeas corpus.

At last they found the judges (Mathias McGirk, George Thompkins and John C. Edwards), but could not obtain the writ in consequence of the papers being imperfect. There was no order of commitment, without which the judges would not grant the writs. After riding hundreds of miles the brethren returned to Liberty, March 30th, and soon called on Judge King, who was angry because they had reported the case to the governor. "I could," said he, "have done all the business for you properly, if you had come to me; and I would have signed the petition for all, except Joe, and he is not fit to live.

They then visited the prison, but were not permitted to enter; all the communication they had with the prisoners took place through the grate of the dungeon. Joseph bid the brethren to be of good cheer; "for," said he, "we shall be delivered; but no arm but God can deliver us now. Tell the brethren to be of good cheer, and get the Saints away as fast as possible."

On April 5th, Brothers Kimball and Turley returned to Far West. On that day a company of about fifty men in Daviess County swore that they would never eat or drink until they had murdered Joe Smith. Their captain, William Bowman, swore, in the presence of Theodore Turley, that he would "never eat or drink, after he had seen Joe Smith, until he had murdered him." Also eight men—Captain Bogart, who was the county judge, Doctor Laffity, John Whitmer and five others— came into the committee-room at Far West and there presented to Elder Theodore Turley the paper concerning the revelation of July 8, 1838, to Joseph Smith, that the Twelve were to take their leave on the Temple site at Far West, on April 26th, to go to the Isles of the Sea, and then asked him to read it. Turley said, "Gentlemen, I am well acquainted with it." They said, "Then you, as a rational man, will give up Joseph Smith being a Prophet and an inspired man, now he and the Twelve are scattered all over creation; let them come here, if they dare; if they do, they will be murdered. As that revelation cannot be fulfilled, you will now give up your faith."

Turley jumped up and said, "In the name of God that revelation will be fulfilled." They laughed him to scorn. John Whitmer hung down his head. They said, "If they (the Twelve) come, they will get murdered; they dare not come to take their leave here; that is like all the rest of Joe Smith's damned prophecies." They commenced on Turley and said, "You had better do as John Corrill has done; he is going to publish a book called 'Mormonism Fairly Delineated;' he is a sensible man, and you had better assist him."

Turley said ,"Gentlemen, I presume there are men here who have heard Corrill say that 'Mormonism' was true, that Joseph Smith was a Prophet and inspired of God, etc. I now call upon you, John Whitmer: You say Corrill is a moral and good man; do you believe him when he says the Book of Mormon is true, or when it is not true? There are many things published that they say are true, and again turn round and say they are false."

Whitmer asked, "Do you hint at me?"

Turley replied, "If the cap fits, you may wear it; all I know is that you have published to the world that an angel did present those plates to Joseph Smith."

Whitmer replied, "I now say, I handled those plates; there were fine engravings on both sides. I handled them; they were shown to me by a supernatural power." He described how they were hung and accordingly acknowledged all.

Turley then asked him why the translation was not now at hand. He said, "I cannot read it, and I do not know whether it is true or not." Whitmer testified all this in the presence of eight men.

Judge King, evidently fearing a change of venue, or some movement on the part of the prisoners to get away, and thus escape his unhallowed persecution—and most probably expecting that they would be murdered on the way—hurried them off to Daviess County, on the 6th of April, under a guard of about ten men, commanded by Samuel Tillery, deputy jailer of Clay County. They were promised that they should go through Far West, which was directly on their route; their friends at that place knew this, and thus expected them; but instead of fulfilling their promise they took them around the city, and out of the direct course 18 miles—far from habitations, where every opportunity presented for a general massacre.

Nevertheless, after a tedious journey—for their long confinement had enfeebled their bodily powers—they arrived in Daviess County on the 8th, and about a mile from Gallatin they were delivered into the hands of William Morgan, sheriff of Daviess County, and his guard, consisting of three men. The Liberty guard then returned.

On the 9th of April the trial of the prisoners was commenced before a drunken jury, consisting principally of men who had taken part in the bloody tragedy at Haun's Mill. Austin A. King, who was as drunk as the jury, was presiding judge, and Lawyer Birch occupied the important position of circuit judge. About this mock-trial, which was continued for several days, Hyrum Smith, one of the prisoners, writes:

"The same jury sat as a jury in the daytime and were over us as a guard by night. They tantalized and boasted over us of their great achievements at Haun's Mill and at other places; telling us how many houses they had burned, and how many sheep, cattle and hogs they had driven off belonging to the 'Mormons;' and how many rapes they had committed, etc.

"These fiends of the lower region boasted of these acts of barbarity and tantalized our feelings with them for several days. We had heard of these acts of cruelty previous to this time; but we were slow to believe that such acts had been perpetrated.

"This grand jury constantly celebrated their achievements with grog and glass in hand, like the Indian warriors at the war dances, singing and telling each of their exploits in murdering the 'Mormons,' in plundering their houses and carrying off their property. All this was done in the presence of Judge Birch, who had previously said in our hearing, that there was no law for the Mormons in the State of Missouri."

Brother Stephen Markham, who by the committee at Far West had been sent to Gallatin to visit the prisoners and had also brought them a hundred dollars from Brother Kimball, was permitted to give his testimony in court. After he had closed, Blakely, one of the guard, came in and said to Markham that he wanted to speak to him. Brother Markham walked out with him and around the end of the house, when Blakely called out, "G—d d—n you, you d—d old Mormon, I'll kill you," and struck at Markham with his fist and then with a club. Markham took the club and threw it over the fence. There were ten of the mob, who immediately rushed upon Markham to kill him, Col. Wm. P. Peniston, captain of the guard, being one of the number. But Markham told them he could kill the whole bunch of them at one blow apiece, and drove them off. The court and grand jury stood and saw the affray, and heard the mob threaten Markham's life by all the oaths they could invent, but they took no cognizance of it.

The ten mobbers went home after their guns to shoot Markham, and the grand jury brought in a bill for "murder, treason, burglary, arson, larceny, theft and stealing," against Joseph Smith, Lyman Wight, Alexander McRae, Caleb Baldwin and Hyrum Smith.

Joseph writes: "During this night visions of the future were opened to my understanding; when I saw the ways and means and near approach of my escape from imprisonment, and the danger that my beloved Brother Markham was in. I awoke Brother Markham, and told him if he would rise very early and not wait for the judge and lawyers, as he had contemplated, but ride briskly, he would get safe home, almost before he was aware of it; and if he did not, the mob would shoot him on the way; and tell the brethren to be of good cheer, and lose no time in removing from the country."

The next morning Elder Markham arose at the dawn of day and rode rapidly to Far West, where he arrived before 9 a. m. The mobbers pursued to shoot him, but did not overtake him.

The prisoners asked for a change of venue from Daviess to Marion County, which was not granted, but at last they succeeded in getting a change of venue from Daviess to Boone County. A mittimus was accordingly made out by the pretended Judge Birch, without date, name or place, and the prisoners were fitted out with a two-horse wagon and horses, and four men besides the sheriff to be their guard. With this outfit they started from Gallatin late in the afternoon of April 15, 1839. They spent the first night in Adam-ondi-Ahman, where they bought two horses of the guard. The following day (Tuesday, April 16th) they traveled 20 miles, and the sheriff told them on the night before retiring to rest that he should take a drink of grog and they might do as they pleased. Accordingly the sheriff and three of the guards went to bed drunk, and the other guard was willing to assist them in saddling their horses and getting away. Joseph writes:

"We thought it a favorable opportunity to make our escape, knowing that the only object of our enemies was our destruction, and likewise knowing that a number of our brethren had been massacred by them on Shoal Creek, amongst whom were two children, and that they sought every opportunity to abuse others who were left in that State, and that they were never brought to an account for their babarous proceedings, which were winked at and encouraged by those in authority. We thought that it was necessary for us, inasmuch as we loved our lives, and did not wish to die by the hand of murderers and assassins, and inasmuch as we loved our families and friends, to deliver ourselves from our enemies, and from that land of tyranny and oppression, and again take our stand among a people in whose bosoms dwell those feelings of republicanism and liberty which gave rise to our nation; feelings which the inhabitants of the State of Missouri were strangers to. Accordingly, we took advantage of the situation of our guard and departed, and that night we traveled a considerable distance. * * *

"We continued our journey, both by night and by day; and after suffering much fatigue and hunger, I arrived in Quincy, Illinois (Monday, April 22nd), amidst the congratulations of my friends and the embraces of my family, whom I found as well as could be expected, considering what they had been called to endure. Before leaving Missouri I had paid the lawyers at Richmond $34,000 in cash, lands, etc.; one lot which I let them have, in Jackson County, for $7,000 they were soon offered $10,000, but would not accept it. For other vexatious suits, which I had to contend against, the few months I was in this State, I paid lawyers' fees to the amount of about $16,000, making in all about $50,000, for which I received very little in return; for sometimes they were afraid to act on account of the mob, and sometimes they were so drunk as to incapacitate them for business. But there were a few honorable exceptions.

"Among those who have been the chief instruments and leading characters in the cruel persecutions against the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, the following stand conspicuous, viz., Generals Clark, Wilson and Lucas, Colonel Price and Cornelius Gillium; also Captain Bogart, whose zeal in the cause of oppression and injustice was unequalled, and whose delight has been to rob, murder and spread devastation among the Saints. He stole a valuable horse, saddle and bridle from me, which cost $200, and then sold the same to General Wilson. On understanding this, I applied to General Wilson for the horse, who assured me upon the honor of a gentleman and an officer, that I should have the horse returned to me; but this promise has not been fulfilled.

"All the threats, murders and robberies, which these officers have been guilty of, are entirely overlooked by the Executive of the State, who, to hide his own iniquity, must of course shield and protect those whom he employed to carry into effect his murderous purposes.

"I was in their hands, as a prisoner, about six months; but notwithstanding their determination to destroy me, with the rest of my brethren who were with me, and although at three different times (as I was informed) we were sentenced to be shot, without the least shadow of law (as we were not military men), and had the time and place appointed for that purpose, yet through the mercy of God, in answer to the prayers of the Saints, I have been preserved and delivered out of their hands, and can again enjoy the society of my friends and brethren, whom I love, and to whom I feel united in bonds that are stronger than death; and in a State where I believe the laws are respected, and whose citizens are humane and charitable.

"During the time I was in the hands of my enemies, I must say, that although I felt great anxiety respecting my family and friends, who were so inhumanly treated and abused, and who had to mourn the loss of their husbands and children who had been slain, and, after having been robbed of nearly all that they possessed, were driven from their homes, and forced to wander as strangers in a strange country, in order that they might save themselves and their little ones from the destruction they were threatened with in Missouri, yet as far as I was concerned, I felt perfectly calm, and resigned to the will of my Heavenly Father. I knew my innocence, as well as that of the Saints, and that we had done nothing to deserve such treatment from the hands of our oppressors. Consequently, I could look to that God who has the lives of all men in his hands, and who had saved me frequently from the gates of death, for deliverance; and notwithstanding that every avenue of escape seemed to be entirely closed, and death stared me in the face, and that my destruction was determined upon, as far as man was concerned, yet from my first entrance into the camp, I felt an assurance that I, with my brethren and our families, should be delivered. Yes, that still small voice, which has so often whispered consolation to my soul, in the depth of sorrow and distress, bade me be of good cheer, and promised deliverance, which gave me great comfort. And although the heathen raged, and the people imagined vain things, yet the Lord of Hosts, the God of Jacob, was my refuge; and when I cried unto him in the day of trouble, he delivered me; for which I call upon my soul, and all that is within me, to bless and praise his holy name. For although I was 'troubled on every side, yet not distressed; perplexed, but not in despair; persecuted, but not forsaken; cast down, but not destroyed.'

"The conduct of the Saints, under their accumulated wrongs and sufferings, has been praiseworthy; their courage in defending their brethren from the ravages of the mobs; their attachment to the cause of truth, under circumstances the most trying and distressing which humanity can possibly endure; their love to each other; their readiness to afford assistance to me and my brethren who were confined in a dungeon; their sacrifices in leaving Missouri, and assisting the poor widows and orphans, and securing them houses in a more hospitable land; all conspire to raise them in the estimation of all good and virtuous men, and has secured them the favor and approbation of Jehovah, and a name as imperishable as eternity. And their virtuous deeds and heroic actions, while in defense of truth and their brethren, will be fresh and blooming, when the names of their oppressors shall be either entirely forgotten, or only remembered for their barbarity and cruelty.

"Their attention and affection to me, while in prison, will ever be remembered by me; and when I have seen them thrust away and abused by the jailer and guard, when they came to do any kind offices, and to cheer our minds while we were in the gloomy prison house, gave me feelings which I cannot describe; while those who wished to insult and abuse us by their threats and blasphemous language, were applauded, and had every encouragement given them.

"However, thank God, we have been delivered. And although some of our beloved brethren have had to seal their testimony with their blood, and have died martyrs to the cause of truth

"Short though bitter was their pain,
"Everlasting is their joy.

"Let us not sorrow as 'those without hope;' the time is fast approaching when we shall see them again and rejoice together, without being afraid of wicked men. Yes, those who have slept in Christ, shall he bring with him, when he shall come to be glorified in his Saints, and admired by all those who believe, but to take vengeance upon his enemies and all those who obey not the gospel.

"At that time the hearts of the widows and fatherless shall be comforted, and every tear shall be wiped from their faces. The trials they have had to pass through shall work together for their good, and prepare them for the society of those who have come up out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb.

"Marvel not, then, if you are persecuted; but remember the words of the Savior: 'The servant is not above his Lord; if they have persecuted me, they will persecute you also;' and that all the afflictions through which the Saints have to pass, are the fulfilment of the words of the Prophets which have spoken since the world began.

"We shall therefore do well to discern the signs of the times as we pass along, that the day of the Lord may not 'overtake us as a thief in the night.' Afflictions, persecutions, imprisonments and deaths we must expect, according to the Scriptures, which tell us, that the blood of those whose souls were under the altar could not be avenged on them that dwell on the earth, until their brethren should be slain as they were.

"If these transactions had taken place among barbarians, under the authority of a despot, or in a nation where a certain religion is established according to law, and all others proscribed, then there might have been some shadow of defense offered. But can we realize that in a land which is the cradle of liberty and equal rights, and where the voice of the conquerors who had vanquished our foes had scarcely died away upon our ears, where we frequently mingled with those who had stood amidst 'the battle and the breeze,' and whose arms have been nerved in the defense of their country and liberty, whose institutions are the theme of philosophers and poets, and held up to the admiration of the whole civilized world—in the midst of all these scenes, with which we were surrounded, a persecution the most unwarrantable was commenced, and a tragedy the most dreadful was enacted, by a large portion of the inhabitants of one of those free and sovereign States which comprise this vast Republic; and a deadly blow was struck at the institutions for which our fathers had fought many a hard battle, and for which many a patriot had shed his blood. Suddenly was heard, amidst the voice of joy and gratitude for our national liberty, the voice of mourning, lamentation and woe. Yes! in this land, a mob, regardless of those laws for which so much blood has been spilt, dead to every feeling of virtue and patriotism which animated the bosom of freemen, fell upon a people whose religious faith was different from their own, and not only destroyed their homes, drove them away, and carried off their property, but murdered many a free-born son of America—a tragedy which has no parallel in modern and hardly in ancient times; even the face of the Red Man would be ready to turn pale at the recital of it.

"It would have been some consolation, if the authorities of the State had been innocent in this affair; but they are involved in the guilt thereof, and the blood of innocence, even of children, cry for vengeance upon them.

"I ask the citizens of this Republic, whether such a state of things is to be suffered to pass unnoticed, and the hearts of widows, orphans and patriots to be broken, and their wrongs left without redress? No! I invoke the genius of our constitution. I appeal to the patriotism of Americans to stop this unlawful and unholy procedure; and pray that God may defend this nation from the dreadful effects of such outrages.

"Is there no virtue in the body politic? Will not the people rise up in their majesty, and with that promptitude and zeal, which are so characteristic of them, discountenance such proceedings by bringing the offenders to that punishment which they so richly deserve, and save the nation from that disgrace and ultimate ruin, which otherwise must inevitably fall upon it?"

CHAPTER 13.

Fulfillment of a revelation.—Joseph selects Commerce, Hancock County, Illinois, as a new gathernig place for the Saints.—Meets with the Twelve Apostles in Quincy, Illinois.—Removes with his family to Commerce.—Important item of instruction.—Miraculous cases of healing.—Joseph and others visit Washington, D. C., to lay the grievances of the Saints before the Federal Government.—President Van Buren's answer.—Congress refuses to redress the wrongs of the Saints. Joseph preaches in Philadelphia.—Returns to Nauvoo.

April 24, 1839, two days after Joseph's arrival from Missouri, a council was held in Quincy, Illinois, in which it was "resolved that Joseph Smith, jun., Vinson Knight and Alanson Ripley should visit Iowa Territory immediately for the purpose of making a location for the Church." These three brethren, who started for Iowa the following day, examined several places in Lee County, Iowa, and Hancock County, Illinois. These two counties were situated opposite each other, Hancock County on the east and Lee County on the west side of the Mississippi River. Commerce in Hancock County was chosen as the most suitable place for the Saints to locate, and large tracts of land were subsequently purchased by the Saints there. (See Nauvoo.) Joseph returned to his family (who stopped temporarily with Brother Cleveland, near Quincy) on the 3rd of May. On that day he met the Twelve Apostles for the first time after his escape from Missouri, they having returned from Far West the day previous. This meeting was a joyful and happy one indeed, and Joseph felt like a father who, after suffering under the hands of wicked tyranny and oppression, again was free in the midst of his children. The three following days (May 4th, 5th and 6th) the Church held a conference on the Presbyterian camp ground, near Quincy, at which Joseph presided. Among other resolutions passed on that occasion was one sanctioning the proceedings of the Twelve and their friends on the Temple spot at Far West, on Friday, April 26, 1839.

May 9th, Joseph, together with his family, left Quincy for Commerce, where he arrived the following day, and took up his residence in a small log house on the bank of the river, about a mile south of the village of Commerce. Having arranged his private affairs as well as he could under the circumstances, he directed his time and attention to the welfare and wants of the Saints, who had just been stripped of almost everything in the shape of earthly possessions, and they naturally looked to him with trustful anxiety as the man to counsel and guide them in their trying situation. Thus he was constantly kept busy giving counsel, administering to the sick, writing letters, dictating history, preparing documents (setting forth the grievances of the Saints) to send to Washington, laying out city lots and discharging numerous other duties. He also gave much instruction concerning doctrine. Of a sermon which he preached June 27, 1839, the following are extracts:

"Faith comes by hearing the word of God, through the testimony of the servants of God; that testimony is always attended by the spirit of prophecy and revelation.

"Repentance is a thing that cannot be trifled with every day. Daily transgression and daily repentance is not that which is pleasing in the sight of God.

"Baptism is a holy ordinance preparatory to the reception of the Holy Ghost; it is the channel and key by which the Holy Ghost will be administered.

"The gift of the Holy Ghost by the laying on of hands cannot be received through the medium of any other principle than the principle of righteousness, for if the proposals are not complied with, it is of no use, but withdraws.

"Tongues were given for the purpose of preaching among those whose language is not understood, as on the day of Pentecost, etc., and it is not necessary for tongues to be taught to the Church particularly, for any man that has the Holy Ghost can speak of the things of God in his own tongue as well as to speak in another; for faith comes not by signs, but by hearing the word of God.

"The doctrine of the resurrection of the dead and the eternal judgment are necessary to preach among the first principles of the gospel of Jesus Christ.

"The doctrine of election. St. Paul exhorts us to make our calling and election sure. This is the sealing power spoken of by Paul in other places (Eph. 1:13, 14): 'In whom ye also trusted, after that ye heard the word of truth, the gospel of your salvation; in whom also, after that ye believed, ye were sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise, which is the earnest of our inheritance, until the redemption of the purchased possession, unto the praise of his glory,' that we may be sealed up unto the day of redemption. This principle ought (in its proper place) to be taught, for God hath not revealed anything to Joseph but what he will make known unto the Twelve, and even the least Saint may know all things as fast as he is able to bear them, for the day must come when no man need say to his neighbor, Know ye the Lord; for all shall know him (who remain), from the least to the greatest. How is this to be done? It is to be done by this sealing power, and the other Comforter spoken of, which will be manifest by revelation. There are two Comforters spoken of. One is the Holy Ghost, the same as given on the day of Pentecost, and that all Saints receive after faith, repentence and baptism. This first Comforter or Holy Ghost has no other effect than pure intelligence. It is more powerful in expanding the mind, enlightening the understanding, and storing the intellect with present knowledge, of a man who is the literal seed of Abraham, than one that is a Gentile, though it may not have half as much visible effect upon the body; for as the Holy Ghost falls upon one of the literal seed of Abraham, it is calm and serene; and his whole soul and body are only exercised by the pure spirit of intelligence; while the effect of the Holy Ghost upon a Gentile is to purge out the old blood and make him actually of the seed of Abraham. That man that has none of the blood of Abraham (naturally), must have a new creation by the Holy Ghost. In such a case there may be more of a powerful effect upon the body, and visible to the eye, than upon an Israelite, while the Israelite at first might be far before the Gentile in pure intelligence.

"The other Comforter spoken of is a subject of great interest, and perhaps understood by few of this generation. After a person has faith in Christ, repents of his sins and is baptized for the remission of his sins, and receives the Holy Ghost (by the laying on of hands), which is the first Comforter, then let him continue to humble himself before God, hungering and thirsting after righteousness, and living by every word of God, and the Lord will soon say unto him: Son, thou shall be exalted, etc. When the Lord has thoroughly proved him, and finds that the man is determined to serve him at all hazards, then the man will find his calling and his election made sure; then it will be his privilege to receive the other Comforter, which the Lord hath promised the Saints, as is recorded in the testimony of St. John (John 14: 16-18, 21, 23): 'And I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter, that he may abide with you forever; even the spirit of Truth, whom the world cannot receive because it seeth him not, neither knoweth him; but ye know him, for he dwelleth with you, and shall be in you; I will not leave you comfortless, I will come to you. * * * He that hath my commandments, and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me; and he that loveth me shall be loved of my Father, and I will love him, and will manifest myself to him. * * * If a man love me, he will keep my words, and my Father will love him, and we will come unto him, and make our abode with him.'

"Now, what is this other Comforter? It is no more or less than the LORD JESUS CHRIST himself; and this is the sum and substance of the whole matter; that when any man obtains this last Comforter, he will have the personage of Jesus Christ to attend him, or appear unto him from time to time, and even he will manifest the Father unto him, and they will take up their abode with him, and the visions of the heavens will be opened unto him, and the Lord will teach him face to face, and he may have a perfect knowledge of the mysteries of the Kingdom of God; and this is the state and place the ancient Saints arrive at when they had such glorious visions —Isaiah, Ezekiel, John upon the Isle of Patmos, St. Paul in the three heavens, and all the Saints who held communion with the general assembly and Church of the First Born.

"The Spirit of Revelation is in connection with these blessings. A person may profit by noticing the first intimations of the spirit of revelation; for instance, when you feel pure intelligence flowing into you, it may give you sudden strokes of ideas, so that by noticing it, you may find it fulfilled the same day or soon; that is, those things that were presented unto your minds by the Spirit of God, will come to pass; and thus by learning the Spirit of God and understanding it, you may grow into the principle of revelation, until you become perfect in Christ Jesus.

"An Evangelist is a Patriarch, even the oldest man of the blood of Joseph or of the seed of Abraham. Wherever the Church of Christ is established in the earth, there should be a Patriarch for the benefit of the posterity of the Saints, as it was with Jacob in giving his patriarchal blessing unto his sons."

At the time Joseph and his brethren were making their escape from prison, the last of the Saints left Missouri. (See Far West.) The time also arrived for the fulfilment of the revelation given to Joseph July 8, 1838, in which the Twelve were commanded to take leave of the Saints on the Temple site in Far West, April 26, 1839, to start on their mission across the great waters. It seemed almost impossible that the prediction could be fulfilled, as the Saints had all been driven out of Missouri, and it would, according to the threats of the mob, be as much as an Apostle's life was worth to be seen in Far West. Some of the leading men in the Church thought that in view of the persecutions and scattered condition of the Saints at that time, the Lord would not require the Twelve to fulfil his words to the letter, but that, under the circumstances, he would take the will for the deed. The apostates and mobbers rejoiced at what they thought would be the failure of one of the revelations given through the Prophet Joseph; they thought that surely in this instance, at least, his words would be vain.

But this was not the feeling of President Young and those of the Twelve Apostles who were with him. He asked them individually what their feelings were upon the subject. Their desires were, they said, to fulfil the revelation. He told them the Lord had spoken, and it was their duty to obey, and leave the event in his hands, and he would protect them. Consequently, Brigham Young, Orson Pratt, John Taylor, Wilford Woodruff, George A. Smith and Alpheus Cutler left Quincy for Far West to fulfil the revelation. They met John E. Page, who was an Apostle at that time, on the road, and told him they wanted him to go to Far West with them, which he did.

Just before reaching Far West, they met three brethren who had been left at that place as a committee to attend to the removal of the poor Saints, but had been driven from the town. They informed the Apostles that the mob had come into Far West and tantalized them on the subject of the revelation, saying that it was one of Joseph Smith's revelations which could not be fulfilled, as the Twelve Apostles were scattered to the four winds; and they threatened them severely if they were found in Far West the next day. They, however, turned around and accompanied the Apostles and the other brethren to the house of Father Timothy B. Clark, near Far West.

Early on the morning of the 26th of April—the day mentioned in the revelation—a conference was held, 31 persons were cut off from the Church, and the Apostles and Saints proceeded to the building spot of the Lord's house. Elder Cutler, the master workman of the house, then recommenced laying the foundation, agreeable to revelation, by rolling up a large stone near the southeast corner. The following of the Twelve were present: Brigham Young, Heber C. Kimball, Orson Pratt, John E. Page and John Taylor, who proceeded to ordain Wilford Woodruff and George A. Smith Apostles, to fill the places of those who had fallen. Darwin Chase and Norman Shearer, who had just been liberated from Richmond prison, and arrived the evening previous, were each ordained to the office of a Seventy. The Twelve then offered up vocal prayer in the following order: Brigham Young, Heber C. Kimball, Orson Pratt, John E. Page, John Taylor, Wilford Woodruff and George A. Smith. They then sang "Adam-ondi-Ahman;" after which they took their leave of eighteen Saints, agreeable to the revelation. The conference was then adjourned.

As the Saints were passing away from the meeting, Theodore Turley said to Elders Page and Woodruff, "Stop a bit, while I bid Isaac Russell good-bye," and knocking at his door called Brother Russell, whose wife answered, "Come in; it is Brother Turley."

Russell replied, "It is not; he left here two weeks ago." He appeared quite alarmed; but on finding it was Turley, asked him to sit down, but he replied, "I cannot; I shall lose my company."

"Who is your company?" inquired Russell.

"The Twelve."

"The Twelve?"

"Yes; don't you know that this is the 26th, and the day the Twelve were to take leave of their friends on the foundation of the Lord's house, to go to the islands of the sea? The revelation is now fulfilled, and I am going with them."

Russell was speechless and Turley bid him farewell.

Thus was that revelation fulfilled, concerning which the enemies said: If all the other revelations of Joseph Smith were fulfilled, that one should not be, as it had place and date to it.

June 24, 1839, the Church purchased the little town of Nashville, in Lee County, Iowa, and about twenty thousand acres of land adjoining it, and on July 2nd following, Joseph, in company with Sidney Rigdon, Hyrum Smith, Bishops Newel K. Whitney and Vinson Knight and others, examined another tract of land purchased by Bishop Knight on the Iowa side of the Mississippi River, with a view to making it a gathering place for the Saints. Joseph advised that a town be built there and called Zarahemla. (See Zarahemla.) In the afternoon, at a meeting held in Commerce, he blessed Wilford Woodruff and Geo. A. Smith, who had recently been ordained to the Apostleship; also Theodore Turley, one of the Seventies. After this the Prophet spoke as follows:

"Ever keep in exercise the principle of mercy, and be ready to forgive our brother on the first intimation of repentance, and asking forgiveness; and should we even forgive our brother, or even our enemy, before they repent or ask forgiveness, our Heavenly Father would be equally as merciful unto us.

"Again: Let the Twelve and all Saints be willing to confess all their sins, and not keep back a part; and let the Twelve be humble and not be exalted, and beware of pride, and not seek to excel one above another, but act for each other's good, and pray for one another, and honor our brother or make honorable mention of his name, and not backbite and devour our brother. Why will not man learn wisdom by precept at this late age of the world, when we have such a cloud of witnesses and examples before us, and not be obliged to learn by sad experience everything we know? Must the new ones that are chosen to fill the places of those that are fallen, of the quorum of the Twelve, begin to exalt themselves, until they exalt themselves so high that they will soon tumble over and have a great fall, and go wallowing through the mud and mire and darkness, Judas-like, to the buffetings of Satan, as several of the quorum have done, or will they learn wisdom and be wise? O God! give them wisdom, and keep them humble, I pray.

"When the Twelve or any other witnesses stand before the congregations of the earth, and they preach in the power and demonstration of the Spirit of God, and the people are astonished and confounded at the doctrine, and say, 'That man has preached a powerful discourse, a great sermon,' then let that man or those men take care that they do not ascribe the glory unto themselves, but be careful that they are humble, and ascribe the praise and glory to God and the Lamb; for it is by the power of the Holy Priesthood and Holy Ghost they have power thus to speak. What art thou, O man, but dust? And from whom receivest thou thy power and blessings but from God?

"Then, O ye Twelve! notice this KEY, and be wise for Christ's sake, and your own soul's sake. Ye are not sent out to be taught, but to teach. Let every word be seasoned with grace. Be vigilant; be sober. It is a day of warning, and not of many words. Act honestly before God and man. Beware of Gentile sophistry; such as bowing and scraping unto men in whom you have no confidence. Be honest, open and frank in all your intercourse with mankind.

"O ye Twelve! and all Saints! profit by this important KEY—that in all your trials, troubles, temptations, afflictions, bonds, imprisonments and death, see to it that you do not betray heaven: that you do not betray Jesus Christ; that you do not betray the brethren; that you do not betray the revelations of God, whether in the Bible, Book of Mormon, or Doctrine and Coveants, or any other that ever was or ever will be given and revealed unto man in this world or that which is to come. Yea, in all your kicking and flounderings, see to it that you do not this thing, lest innocent blood be found upon your skirts, and you go down to hell. All other sins are not to be compared to sinning against the Holy Ghost, and proving a traitor to the brethren.

"I will give you one of the KEYS of the mysteries of the kingdom. It is an eternal principle, that has existed with God from all eternity: That man who rises up to condemn others, finding fault with the Church, saying that they are out of the way, while he himself is righteous, then know assuredly that that man is in the high road to apostasy; and if he does not repent, will apostatize, as God lives. The principle is as correct as the one that Jesus put forth in saying, that he who seeketh a sign is an adulterous person; and that principle is eternal, undeviating and firm as the pillars of heaven; for whenever you see a man seeking after a sign, you may set it down that he is an adulterous man."

About this time Joseph, in reply to many inquiries, gave an explanation of the Priesthood and several principles connected therewith, of which the following is a brief synopsis:

"The Priesthood was first given to Adam; he obtained the First Presidency, and held the keys of it from generation to generation. He obtained it in the creation, before the world was formed, as in Gen. 1: 26, 28. He had dominion given him over every living creature. He is Michael the Archangel, spoken of in the Scriptures. Then to Noah, who is Gabriel; he stands next in authority to Adam in the priesthood: he was called of God to this office, and was the father of all living in his day, and to him was given the dominion. These men held keys first on earth and then in heaven.

"The Priesthood is an everlasting principle, and existed with God from eternity, and will to eternity, without beginning of days or end of years. The keys have to be brought from heaven whenever the gospel is sent. When they are revealed from heaven, it is by Adam's authority. Daniel, in his 7th chapter, speaks of the Ancient of Days; he means the oldest man, our Father Adam, Michael; he will call his children together and hold council with them to prepare them for the coming of the Son of Man. He (Adam) is the father of the human family, and presides over the spirits of all men, and all that have had the keys must stand before him in this grand council. This may take place before some of us leave this stage of action. The Son of Man stands before him, and there is given him glory and dominion. Adam delivers up his stewardship to Christ, that which was delivered to him as holding the keys of the universe, but retains his standing as head of the human family.

"The spirit of man is not a created being; it existed from eternity, and will exist to eternity. Anything created cannot be eternal; and earth, water, etc., had their existence in an elementary state, from eternity. Our Savior speaks of children and says, Their angels always stand before my Father. The Father called all spirits before him at the creation of man, and organized them. He (Adam) is the head, and was told to multiply. The keys were first given to him, and by him to others. He will have to give an account of his stewardship, and they to him.

"The Priesthood is everlasting. The Savior, Moses and Elias gave the keys to Peter, James and John, on the mount, when they were transfigured before him. The Priesthood is everlasting—without beginning of days or end of years; without father, mother, etc. If there is no change of ordinances, there is no change of Priesthood. Wherever the ordinances of the gospel are administered, there is the Priesthood.

"How have we come at the Priesthood in the last days? It came down, down, in regular succession. Peter, James and John had it given to them, and they gave it to others. Christ is the Great High Priest; Adam next. Paul speaks of the Church coming to an innumerable company of angels—to God the Judge of all—the spirits of just men made perfect; to Jesus the mediator of the new covenant, etc. (Heb. 12:23-24.)

"I saw Adam in the valley of Adam-ondi-Ahman. He called together his children and blessed them with a patriarchal blessing. The Lord appeared in their midst, and he (Adam) blessed them all, and foretold what should befall them to the latest generation. (See Doc. & Cov., Sec. 107, Verse 56.)

"This is why Adam blessed his posterity; he wanted to bring them into the presence of God. They looked for a city, etc. Moses sought to bring the children of Israel into the presence of God, through the power of the Priesthood, but he could not. In the first ages of the world they tried to establish the same thing; and there were Eliases raised up who tried to restore these very glories, but did not obtain them; but they prophesied of a day when this glory would be revealed. Paul spoke of the dispensation of the fulness of times, when God would gather together all things in one, etc., and those men to whom these keys have been given will have to be there; and they without us cannot be made perfect.

"These men are in heaven, but their children are on earth. Their bowels yearn over us. God sends down men for this reason (Matt. 13:41): 'And the Son of Man shall send forth his angels,' etc. All these authoritative characters will come down and join hand in hand in bringing about this work.

"The Kingdom of Heaven is like a grain of mustard seed. The mustard seed is small, but brings forth a large tree, and the fowls lodge in the branches. The fowls are the angels. Thus angels come down, combine together to gather their children, and gather them. We cannot be made perfect without them, nor they without us; when these things are done, the Son of Man will descend, the Ancient of Days sit; we may come to an innumerable company of angels, have communion with and receive instruction from them. Paul told about Moses' proceedings; spoke of the children of Israel being baptized. (I Cor. 10:1-4.) He knew this, and that all the ordinances and blessings were in the Church. Paul had these things, and we may have the fowls of heaven lodge in the branches.

"The Horn made war with the Saints and overcame them, until the Ancient of Days came; judgment was given to the Saints of the Most High from the Ancient of Days; the time came that the Saints possessed the Kingdom. This not only makes us ministers here, but in eternity.

"Salvation cannot come without revelation; it is in vain for any one to minister without it. No man is a minister of Jesus Christ without being a Prophet. No man can be the minister of Jesus Christ except he has the testimony of Jesus; and this is the spirit of prophecy. Whenever salvation has been administered, it has been by testimony. Men of the present time testify heaven and of hell, and have never seen either; and I will say that no man knows these things without this.

"Men profess to prophesy. I will prophesy that the signs of the coming of the Son of Man are already commenced. One pestilence will desolate after another. We shall soon have war and bloodshed. The moon will be turned to blood. I testify of these things, and that the coming of the Son of Man is nigh, even at your doors. If our souls and our bodies are not looking forth for the coming of the Son of Man; and after we are dead, if we are not looking forth, we shall be among those who are calling for the rocks to fall upon them.

"The hearts of the children of men will have to be turned to the fathers, and the fathers to the children, living or dead, to prepare them for the coming of the Son of Man. If Elijah did not come, the whole earth would be smitten.

"There will be here and there a Stake of Zion for the gathering of the Saints. Some may have cried peace, but the Saints and the world will have little peace from henceforth. Let this not hinder us from going to the Stakes, for God has told us to flee, not dallying, or we shall be scattered, one here, and another there. There your children shall be blessed, and you in the midst of friends where you may be blessed. The gospel net gathers of every kind.

"I prophesy, that that man who tarries after he has an opportunity of going, will be afflicted by the devil. Wars are at hand; we must not delay; but are not required to sacrifice. We ought to have the building up of Zion as our greatest object. When wars come, we shall have to flee to Zion. The cry is to make haste. The last revelation says, 'Ye shall not have time to have gone over the earth, until these things come.' It will come as did the cholera, war, fires and earthquakes; one pestilence after another, until the Ancient of Days comes, then judgment will be given to the Saints.

"Whatever you may hear about me or Kirtland, take no notice of it; for if it be a place of refuge, the devil will use his greatest efforts to trap the Saints. You must make yourselves acquainted with those men who like Daniel pray three times a day towards the House of the Lord. Look to the Presidency and receive instruction. Every man who is afraid, covetous, will be taken in a snare. The time is soon coming, when no man will have any peace but in Zion and her Stakes.

"I saw men hunting the lives of their own sons, and brother murdering brother, women killing their own daughters, and daughters seeking the lives of their mothers. I saw armies arrayed against armies. I saw blood, desolation, fires, etc. The Son of Man has said that the mother shall be against the daughter, and the daughter against the mother. These things are at our doors. They will follow the Saints of God from city to city. Satan will rage, and the spirit of the devil is now enraged. I know not how soon these things will take place; but with a view of them, shall I cry peace? No! I will lift up my voice and testify of them. How long you will have good crops, and the famine be kept off, I do not know; when the fig tree leaves, know then that the summer is nigh at hand.

"We may look for angels and receive their ministration, but we are to try the spirits and prove them, for it is often the case that men make a mistake in regard to these things. God has so ordained that when he has communicated, no vision is to be taken, but what you see by the seeing of the eye, or what you hear by the hearing of the ear. When you see a vision, pray for the interpretation; if you get not this, shut it up; there must be certainty in this matter. An open vision will manifest that which is more important. Lying spirits are going forth in the earth. There will be great manifestations of spirits, both false and true.

"Being born again comes by the Spirit of God through ordinances. An angel of God never has wings. Some will say that they have seen a spirit; that he offered them his hand, but they did not touch it. This is a lie. First, it is contrary to the plan of God; a spirit cannot come but in glory; an angel has flesh and bones; we see not their glory. The devil may appear as an angel of light. Ask God to reveal it; if it be of the devil, he will flee from you; if of God, he will manifest himself, or make it manifest. We may come to Jesus and ask him; he will know all about it; if he comes to a little child, he will adapt himself to the language and capacity of a little child.

"Every spirit, or vision, or singing, is not of God. The devil is an orator; he is powerful; he took our Savior on to a pinnacle of the Temple, and kept him in the wilderness for forty days. The gift of discerning spirits will be given to the presiding Elder. Pray for him that he may have this gift. Speak not in the gift of tongues without understanding it, or without interpretation. The devil can speak in tongues; the adversary will come with his work; he can tempt all classes; can speak in English or Dutch. Let no one speak in tongues unless he interpret, except by the consent of the one who is placed to preside; then he may discern or interpret, or another may. Let us seek for the glory of Abraham, Noah, Adam, the Apostles, who have communion with these things, and then we shall be among that number when Christ comes."

On the 4th of July Parley P. Pratt and Morris Phelps made their escape from the prison in Columbia, Boone County, Missouri, and arrived among their friends in Illinois after several days' severe sufferings. King Follett was acquitted a few months later. And last of all, Luman Gibbs, who had apostatized during his imprisonment, was set at liberty. Thus Joseph's prophecy to the prisoners on the morning of November 3, 1838, was literally fulfilled, for although they suffered much and were often exposed to the greatest danger, none of them lost their lives; they all enjoyed the privilege of again meeting their families and friends as free men.

"In consequence of the persecutions of the Saints in Missouri," writes Wilford Woodruff, "and the exposures to which they were subjected, many of them were taken sick soon after their arrival at Commerce, afterwards called Nauvoo; and as there were but a small number of dwellings for them to occupy, Joseph had filled his house and tents with them, and through constantly attending to their wants, he soon fell sick himself. After being confined to his house several days, and while meditating upon his situation, he had a great desire to attend to the duties of his office. On the morning of the 22nd of July, 1839, he arose from his bed and commenced to administer to the sick in his own house and door-yard, and he commanded them in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ to arise and be made whole; and the sick were healed upon every side of him.

"Many lay sick along the bank of the river, and Joseph walked along up to the lower stone house, occupied by Sidney Rigdon, and he healed all the sick that lay in his path. Among the number was Henry G. Sherwood, who was nigh unto death. Joseph stood in the mouth of his tent and commanded him in the name of Jesus Christ to arise and come out of his tent, and he obeyed him and was healed. Brother Benjamin Brown and his family also lay sick, the former appearing to be in a dying condition. Joseph healed them in the name of the Lord. After healing all that lay sick upon the bank of the river as far as the stone house, he called upon Elder Kimball and some others to accompany him across the river to visit the sick at Montrose. Many of the Saints were living at the old military barracks. Among the number were several of the Twelve. On his arrival, the first house he visited was that occupied by Elder Brigham Young, the president of the Quorum of the Twelve, who lay sick. Joseph healed him, when he arose and accompanied the Prophet on his visit to others who were in the same condition. They visited Elder Wilford Woodruff, also Elders Orson Pratt and John Taylor, all of whom were living in Montrose. They also accompanied him. The next place they visited was the home of Elijah Fordham, who was supposed to be about breathing his last. When the company entered the room, the Prophet of God walked up to the dying man and took hold of his right hand and spoke to him; but Brother Fordham was unable to speak, his eyes were set in his head like glass, and he seemed entirely unconscious of all around him. Joseph held his hand and looked into his eyes in silence for a length of time. A change in the countenance of Brother Fordham was soon perceptible to all present. His sight returned, and upon Joseph asking him if he knew him, he, in a low whisper, answered 'Yes.' Joseph asked him if he had faith to be healed. He answered, 'I fear it is too late; if you had come sooner, I think I could have been healed.' The Prophet said, 'Do you not believe in Jesus Christ?' He answered in a feeble voice, 'I do.' Joseph then stood erect, still holding his hand in silence several moments; then he spoke in a very loud voice, saying, 'Brother Fordham, I command you in the name of Jesus Christ to arise from this bed and be made whole.' His voice was like the voice of God, and not of man. It seemed as though the house shook to its very foundation. Brother Fordham arose from his bed, and was immediately made whole. His feet were bound in poultices, which he kicked off; then putting on his clothes, he ate a bowl of bread and milk and followed the Prophet into the street. The company next visited Brother Joseph Bates Noble, who lay very sick. He also was healed by the Prophet. By this time the wicked became alarmed, and followed the company into Brother Noble's house. After Brother Noble was healed, all kneeled down to pray. Brother Fordham was mouth, and, while praying, he fell to the floor. The Prophet arose, and looking around, he saw quite a number of unbelievers in the house, whom he ordered out. When the room was cleared of the wicked, Brother Fordham came to and finished his prayer.

"After healing the sick in Montrose, all the company followed Joseph to the bank of the river, where he was going to take the boat to return home. While waiting for the boat, a man from the West, who had seen that the sick and dying were healed, asked Joseph if he would not go to his house and heal two of his children, who were very sick. They were twins and were three months old. Joseph told the man he could not go, but he would send some one to heal them. He told Elder Woodruff to go with the man and heal his children. At the same time he took from his pocket a silk bandanna handkerchief, and gave it to Brother Woodruff, telling him to wipe the faces of the children with it and they should be healed; and remarked at the same time: 'As long as you keep that handkerchief it shall remain a league between you and me.' Elder Woodruff did as he was commanded, and the children were healed, and he keeps the handkerkerchief to this day.

"There were many sick whom Joseph could not visit, so he counseled the Twelve to go and visit and heal them, and many were healed under their hands. On the day following that upon which the above-described events took place, Joseph sent Elders George A. and Don Carlos Smith up the river to heal the sick. They went up as far as Ebenezer Robinson's—one or two miles—and did as they were commanded, and the sick were healed."

While sickness yet prevailed to a considerable extent, the Twelve Apostles took leave of their families and friends in Commerce and Montrose, and started on their mission to England.

At a meeting held in Joseph's house, Sunday, September 29, 1839, the Prophet gave some excellent instructions to the Elders. He explained the uselessness of preaching to the world about great judgments; it was better to preach the simple gospel. "It is a false idea," said he further, "that the Saints will escape all the judgments, whilst the wicked suffer; for all flesh is subject to suffer, and 'the righteous shall hardly escape;' still many of the Saints will escape, for the just shall live by faith; yet many of the righteous shall fall a prey to disease, to pestilence, etc., by reason of the weakness of the flesh, and yet be saved in the Kingdom of God. So that it is an unhallowed principle to say that such and such have transgressed because they have been preyed upon by disease or death, for all flesh is subject to death; and the Savior has said, 'Judge not, lest ye be judged.' "

On Saturday, October 5, 1839, a general conference of the Church met at Commerce, and was continued for three days. Joseph, who presided over the conference, spoke at some length upon the situation of the Church, the difficulties the Saints had to contend with, and the manner in which they had been led to the place where they were now locating. He asked the brethren present for their views respecting making Commerce a Stake of Zion; he himself thought it a suitable place. It was then unanimously agreed upon that it should be appointed a Stake and a place of gathering for the Saints, over which Wm. Marks was appointed president. (See Nauvoo.)

A short time previous, Joseph Smith and Sidney Rigdon had been appointed by the unanimous vote of the Saints to go to the city of Washington for the purpose of laying the grievances which the Saints had endured in Missouri before the Congress of the United States. On the second day of the conference Elias Higbee was appointed to accompany them.

On the 29th (October) Joseph, accompanied by Sidney Rigdon, Elias Higbee and Orrin P. Rockwell, left Commerce in a two-horse carriage for Washington. Passing through Carthage they stayed over night with Judge Higbee, and the following day arrived in the city of Quincy, where they remained one day to complete the necessary papers for their mission. On the 2nd of November they continued their journey towards Springfield, where they arrived on the 4th. In the meantime they had been joined by Doctor Robert D. Foster, who accompanied them on their journey to wait on Sidney Rigdon, whose health was poor. At Springfield, where they remained until the 8th, Joseph preached several times. Continuing their journey in their carriage through Indiana to Columbus, Ohio, they found the roads in a bad condition for traveling, and this, in connection with Elder Rigdon's enfeebled state of health, caused their progress to be somewhat slow. Joseph, deeming it necessary for the committee, of which he was a member, to be in Washington as soon as possible, therefore concluded to change his mode of travel, and on the 18th of November, in company with Judge Higbee, he started by the quickest route for Washington, leaving Elders Rigdon, Rockwell and Foster near Columbus, to come on in their carriage at their leisure.

On the 27th, while traveling over the mountains some distance from Washington, the driver of the stage they were in stepped into a public house to get some liquor. While he was gone, the horses took fright and ran down the hill at full speed. A number of passengers who were on board the coach became very excited. Joseph did all he could to calm them, and to have them keep their seats; but he had to hold one woman to keep her from throwing her infant out of the coach. As soon as possible he opened the door of the coach, and, securing his hold on the side the best way he could, he succeeded in getting into the driver's seat. He then got hold of the reins and was soon able to check the horses. They ran some two or three miles, but the coach, horses and passengers all escaped without injury. The passengers were loud in their praises of his daring. They thought his conduct most heroic, and, when they found the horses quiet and themselves safe, their gratitude was unbounded. There were in the stage some members of Congress, who thought there should be some public mention made of the daring deed, and they proposed naming it to Congress. But upon inquiring of Joseph what his name was, to mention as the author of their safety, and thus found that their deliverer was Joseph Smith, the "Mormon Prophet," as they called him, their manner underwent a great change, and Joseph heard no more of their praise, gratitude or reward.

On the morning of November 28th, he and Judge Higbee arrived at Washington, and on the following day (29th) they went to the White House, the residence of the President of the United States. They were soon shown into an upper apartment, where they met President Van Buren and were introduced into his parlor. There they presented their letters of introduction to him. As soon as he had read one of them, he looked upon Brothers Joseph and Higbee with a kind of half frown, and said, "What can I do? I can do nothing for you! If I do anything I shall come in contact with the whole State of Missouri." But the brethren were not to be thus intimidated; they demanded a hearing and constitutional rights, when the President finally promised to reconsider what he had said, and observed that he felt to sympathize with the Saints because of their sufferings. During the interview Van Buren asked Joseph wherein the religion of the Saints differed from the other religions of the day. Joseph explained the difference and bore a faithful testimony that it was the work of God.

Van Buren did not make a favorable impression upon Joseph, who describes him as a small man with sandy complexion, ordinary features, a frowning brow and an ill-proportioned body; "and, to come directly to the point," he adds, "he is so much a fop or a fool (for he judged our case before he knew it), that we could find no place to put truth into him."

After their interview with the President they visited the members of Congress from Illinois, and delivered the letters of introduction which they had for them. These members were generally disposed to favor Joseph and the Saints, and this was not without cause. The Saints who had moved to Illinois were numerous, and the men and party in whose favor their votes would be cast at an election would be sure to win, as the great political parties in the State were about equally divided as to number at that time. The members of Congress knew this, and as politicians it was to their interest to do what they could for the Saints. Consequently they met together and decided, after discussing the subject, that a memorial and petition should be drawn up in a concise manner, and that Judge Young, who was senator from Illinois, should present the same to the Senate. It was expected that the matter would be referred to the proper committee, with all the accompanying documents, and be printed. But all of Joseph's exertions, as well as the testimonies, affidavits and other documents which they laid before Congress, failed to have any effect. Neither the President, nor the Senate and House of Representatives would do anything to call the State of Missouri to account for the inhuman wrongs which her people had inflicted upon unoffending, free-born American citizens. The Church had appealed to governors and judges and rulers, and now, through its President, it appealed to the Chief Executive of the nation and the Congress, in which every State in the Republic was represented—the highest authority in the land. There was no redress to be obtained from them; nothing further could be done, therefore, but to leave them in the hands of the Lord, who, in his own due time, will plead the cause of his people.

It is interesting to read Joseph's views respecting the men he was thrown in contact with at Washington. "For a general thing," he said "there is but little solidity and honorable deportment among those who are sent to represent the people; but a great deal of pomposity and show. * * There is such an itching disposition to display their oratory on the most trivial occasions, and so much etiquette, bowing and scraping, twisting and turning to make a display of their witticisms, that it seems to us rather a display of folly and show, more than substance and gravity, such as becomes a great nation like ours. However, there are some exceptions."

From Washington Joseph proceeded by railroad to Philadelphia, where he arrived December 21, 1839. He left Brothers Rockwell and Higbee to follow in the carriage, and Sidney Rigdon stayed there sick, with Dr. Foster to attend to him. He spent several days at Philadelphia, preaching and visiting from house to house among the brethren and others. He also visited the Saints in New Jersey, and Chester County, Pennsylvania.

While staying in Washington, a large church was opened for him to preach in, and about three thousand people assembled to hear him. Sidney Rigdon spoke first, and dwelt on the gospel, illustrating his doctrine by the Bible. When he was through, Joseph arose like a lion about to roar, and, being full of the Holy Ghost, spoke in great power, bearing testimony of the visions he had seen, the ministering of angels which he had enjoyed, and how he found the plates of the Book of Mormon and translated them by the gift and power of God. He commenced by saying that if nobody else had the courage to testify of so glorious a message from heaven, and of the finding of so glorious a record, he felt to do it in justice to the people and leave the event with God. The entire congregation were astounded—electrified, as it were, and overwhelmed with the sense of the truth and power by which he spoke and the wonders which he related. A lasting impression was made and multitudes were subsequently baptized in Philadelphia and in the regions around, while at the same time branches were springing up in Pennsylvania, New Jersey and other places.

In the latter part of January, 1840, Joseph left Philadelphia, accompanied by Brothers Rockwell, Higbee and Foster, and again visited Washington. Sidney Rigdon joined Joseph at Philadelphia, but was still sick, and had to be left there. On his second visit to the capital, Joseph had another interview with President Van Buren, who treated him very insolently. He listened very reluctantly to what Joseph had to say, and in reply uttered that sentiment which has obtained such a deservedly widespread notoriety among the Latter-day Saints:

"Gentlemen, your cause is just, but I can do nothing for you; and if I take up for you, I shall lose the vote of Missouri."

Respecting this interveiw, Joseph remarks: "His whole course went to show that he was an office-seeker, that self-aggrandizement was his ruling passion, and that justice and righteousness were no part of his composition. I found him such a man as I could not conscientiously support at the head of our great Republic." Joseph also had an interview with John C. Calhoun, senator from South Carolina; but his treatment of Joseph was such as very ill became his station. While conversing with him concerning the persecutions of the Saints, this renowned stateman said: "It involves a nice question—the question of States rights; it will not do to agitate it." Henry Clay, another prominent senator, whose assistance Joseph also sought, coldly remarked, in alluding to the Saints: "You had better go to Oregon."

During his sojourn at Washington, Joseph had several opportunities to speak in public. A member of Congress by the name of M. L. Davis, who was present on one of these occasions, expressed his views concerning the Prophet in the following language, writing to his wife under date of February 6, 1840:

"I went last evening to hear 'Joe Smith,' the celebrated Mormon, expound his doctrine. I, with several others, had a desire to understand his tenets as explained by himself.

"He is not an educated man; but he is a plain, sensible, strong-minded man. Every thing he says is said in a manner to leave an impression that he is sincere. There is no levity, no fanaticism, no want of dignity in his deportment. He is apparently from forty to forty-five years of age, rather above the middle stature, and what you ladies would call a very good looking man. In his garb there are no peculiarities; his dress being that of a plain, unpretending citizen. He is by profession a farmer, but is evidently well read. * * *

"During the whole of his address, and it occupied more than two hours, there was no opinion or belief that he expressed, that was calculated, in the slightest degree, to impair the morals of society, or in any manner to degrade and brutalize the human species. There was much in his precepts, if they were followed, that would soften the asperities of man towards man, and that would tend to make him a more rational being than he is generally found to be. There was no violence, no fury, no denunciation. His religion appears to be the religion of meekness, lowliness and mild persuasion. * * *

"Throughout his whole address he displayed strongly a spirit of charity and forbearance. The Mormon Bible, he said, was communicated to him direct from heaven.

If there was such a thing on earth as the author of it, then he (Smith) was the author; but the idea that he wished to impress was that he had penned it as dictated by God.
* * *

"I have changed my opinion of the Mormons. They are an injured and much-abused people."

About four hundred and ninety-one persons held claims against Missouri. These Joseph had presented to Congress. These claims amounted, in all, to one million three hundred and eighty-one thousand and forty-four dollars and fifty one and a half cents. But they were not all. There was a multitude of similar bills which were to be presented, and respecting which Joseph said: "If not settled immediately, they will ere long amount to a handsome sum, increasing by compound interest."

Becoming satisfied that there was very little use for him to tarry to press the just claims of the Saints on the attention of the President and Congress, he left Washington, in company with Brother Orrin P. Rockwell and Doctor Foster, and started on the homeward journey February 6, 1840.

Brother Elias Higbee stayed at Washington to have further interviews with the congressional committee, and for several years he labored faithfully, introducing additional testimony concerning the Missouri persecutions. But his efforts were unavailing. The committee reported against Congress doing anything about the business; and that redress could only be had in the Missouri courts and legislature.

Joseph and his companions traveled by railway and stage to Dayton, Ohio, where they found the horses they left on their journey to Washington. Brother Rockwell stopped at Dayton, and Joseph and Doctor Foster continued their journey on horseback. The roads being exceedingly bad, the traveling was slow and wearisome.

"Wednesday, March 4, 1840," writes Joseph, "I arrived safely at Nauvoo, after a wearisome journey through alternate snows and mud, having witnessed many vexatious movements in government officers, whose sole object should be the peace and prosperity and happiness of the whole people; but instead of this, I discovered that popular clamor and personal aggrandizement were the ruling principles of those in authority; and my heart faints within me when I see, by the visions of the Almighty, the end of this nation, if she continues to disregard the cries and petitions of her virtuous citizens, as she has done, and is now doing.

"I have also enjoyed many precious moments with the Saints during my journey.

"On my way home I did not fail to proclaim the iniquity and insolence of Martin Van Buren towards myself and an injured people, which will have its effect upon the public mind; and may he never be elected again to any office of trust or power by which he may abuse the innocent and let the guilty go free."

In speaking about the refusal of the government to grant the Saints redress for the wrongs they had suffered, he says:

"Since Congress has decided against us, the Lord has begun to vex the nation, and he will continue to do so, except they repent; for they now stand guilty of murder, robbery and plunder, as a nation, because they have refused to protect their citizens and to execute justice according to their own Constitution."

CHAPTER 14.

General conferences in Nauvoo.—John C. Bennet joins the Church.—Governor Boggs, of Missouri, makes a demand on Joseph.—New Stakes organized.—Instructions on Priesthood.—Nauvoo Incorporated.—Joseph elected trustee-in-trust.—Acts as a member of the city council of Nauvoo.—Receives revelations.—The corner stones of the Nauvoo Temple laid.—Joseph arrested in Quincy.—Tried before Judge Stephen A. Douglas in Monmouth and discharged.

April 6th and 7th, 1840, a conference was held at Commerce (or Nauvoo, which name by this time had been given to the place). Joseph presided and gave much good instruction to the Saints. Frederick G. Williams came before the conference and humbly asked forgiveness for his past conduct, and expressed his determination to do the will of God in the future. He was frankly forgiven and received back into fellowship. A committee, appointed for the purpose, drafted and presented a number of resolutions, in which the conference disapproved of the action of the Judiciary Committee in relation to the Saints' petition to the Federal Government. These resolutions were ordered published in the Quincy papers. A hearty vote of thanks was tendered Joseph and the other delegates, who accompanied him to Washington, for the prompt and efficient manner in which they had discharged their duties. Elders Orson Hyde and John E. Page were appointed by the conference to go on a mission to Jerusalem. (See Palestine Mission.) During the conference seventy persons were baptized and about fifty received into the Seventies' quorums.

In July, 1840, Joseph began to receive communications from Dr. John C. Bennett. In every letter this man (who afterwards became prominent in the Church, but subsequently apostatized) took pains to state how much sympathy he felt for the Saints while they were being persecuted in Missouri. Had not the conflict terminated so speedily, he said, he would have been with them there, and they would have had the aid of his "military knowledge and prowess."

September 14, 1840, Patriarch Joseph Smith, sen., the Prophet's father, died in Nauvoo. (See sketch on pages 89 and 90.)

Joseph had scarcely the opportunity to bury his father before his enemies again were on his track. After a silence of two years, Governor Boggs, of Missouri, at last made a demand on Governor Carlin, of Illinois, for Joseph Smith, jun., Sidney Rigdon, Lyman Wight, Parley P. Pratt, Caleb Baldwin and Alanson Brown as fugitives from justice. Governor Carlin seemed to favor the demand, and an order was promptly issued for their apprehension; but when the sheriff made his appearance in Nauvoo, September 15, 1840, to arrest them, they made themselves invisible to that officer, as they did not feel disposed to again try the solemn realities of mob law in a State where they already had suffered so much injustice and loss. Consequently the sheriff had to return without accomplishing the object of his visit.

"What right have they," records the Church historian, "to demand of Governor Carlin, as fugitives from justice, men against whom no process had ever been found in that State—no, not so much as the form of a process? They were taken by a mob-militia and dragged from everything that was dear and sacred, and tried (without their knowledge) by a court martial, condemned to be shot, but this failing, they were forced into confinement, galled with chains, deprived of the comforts of life, and even that which was necessary to save life, then brought to a pretended trial, without even having a legal process served, and then deprived of the privilege of defence. They were taken by a mob, tried, condemned and imprisoned by the same, and this Missouri cannot deny.

"What a beautiful picture Governor Boggs had presented to the world, after driving twelve or fifteen thousand inhabitants from their homes, forcing them to leave the State under the pain of extermination, and confiscating their property and murdering innocent men, women and children; then, because that a few made their escape from his murdering hand, and have found protection in a land of equal rights, so that his plans and designs have all been unfruitful, to that extent that he has caused 'Mormonism' to spread with double vigor, he now has the presumption to demand them back, in order that his thirst for innocent blood may yet be satiated.

"He has no business with them; they have not escaped from justice, but from the hands of a cursed, infuriated, inhuman set or race of beings, who are enemies of their country, to their God, to themselves and to every principle of righteousness and humanity. They loathe Christianity and despise the people of God; they war against truth and inherit lies; virtue they tread under their feet, while vice (with her ten thousand offspring) is their welcome associate; therefore, men on whom Missouri has no claim, she cannot, no, she never shall have."

On the 2nd, 3rd and 4th of October, 1840, a general conference of the Church was held in Nauvoo, in which Elders Hyrum Smith, Lyman Wight and Almon W. Babbitt were appointed a committee to organize Stakes of Zion between Nauvoo and Kirtland. Also the condition of the Stake of Kirtland itself was taken into consideration and the Saints in the East counseled to gather there. (See Kirtland.) It was also resolved that the Saints should build a House of the Lord in Nauvoo. (See Nauvoo Temple.) The glorious principle of baptism for the dead, concerning which Joseph had received a revelation some time previously, was dwelt upon by him in an interesting discourse; it was listened to with great attention by the vast multitude assembled, while the Spirit of God bore testimony to its truthfulness, and joy filled the hearts of the Saints in learning to understand that the great plan of salvation contained provisions for their dead friends and relatives to become participants in the benefits and blessings of the gospel. Elder Robert B. Thompson read to the conference an article, written by Joseph, on the subject of the Priesthood, of which the following are extracts:

"Many may have supposed that the doctrine of translation was a doctrine whereby men were taken immediately into the presence of God, and into an eternal fulness, but this is a mistaken idea. Their place of habitation is that of the terrestrial order, and a place prepared for such characters, he held in reserve to be ministering angels unto many planets, and who as yet have not entered into so great a fulness as those who are resurrected from the dead. * * * This distinction is made between the doctrine of the actual resurrection and translation; translation obtains deliverance from the tortures and sufferings of the body, but their existence will prolong as to the labors and toils of the ministry, before they can enter into so great a rest and glory. * * *

"It is generally supposed that sacrifice was entirely done away when the Great Sacrifice [i. e., the sacrifice of the Lord Jesus] was offered up, and that there will be no necessity for the ordinance of sacrifice in the future; but those who assert this are certainly not acquainted with the duties, privileges and authority of the Priesthood, or with the prophets. * * *

"These sacrifices, as well as every ordinance belonging to the Priesthood, will, when the Temple of the Lord shall be built, and the sons of Levi be purified, be fully restored and attended to in all their powers, ramifications and blessings. This ever did and will exist when the powers of the Melchizedek Priesthood are sufficiently manifest; else how can the restitution of all things spoken of by the holy Prophets be brought to pass? It is not to be understood that the law of Moses will be established again with all its rites and variety of ceremonies; this has never been spoken of by the Prophets; but those things which existed prior to Moses' day, namely, sacrifice, will be continued."

Shortly after this conference, Stakes for the gathering of the Saints were organized at Lima, Quincy, Mount Hope, Geneva and other places in Illinois.

At this time Joseph exerted himself to obtain a charter from the legislature of the State of Illinois for the city of Nauvoo. He had a charter drawn up which, to use his own words, was intended "for the salvation of the Church, and on principles so broad, that every honest man might dwell secure under its protective influence without distinction of sect or party." December 16, 1840, the acts incorporating the "City of Nauvoo," the "Nauvoo Legion" and the "University of the City of Nauvoo" were signed by the governor of Illinois, having previously passed the House and Senate. (See Nauvoo.)

January 15, 1841, Joseph and his two counselors—Sidney Rigdon and Hyrum Smith—published a proclamation to the Saints abroad, in which full details were given respecting the progress of the work and other matters of interest. On the 19th Joseph received a lengthy revelation concerning the building of the Nauvoo Temple, the Nauvoo House, etc. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 124.)

As Joseph's father, Joseph Smith, sen., had passed away, it became necessary to appoint another in his stead to officiate as Patriarch to the Church. Hyrum Smith, his eldest living son, accordingly received the appointment and was chosen to act in that position. This caused a vacancy in the First Presidency, of which Hyrum was a member, and William Law was, by revelation, appointed to the position. George Miller had been chosen presiding Bishop of the Church, by revelation, in place of Edward Partridge, deceased.

At a special conference held at Nauvoo, January 30, 1841, Joseph was unanimously elected sole Trustee-in-Trust for the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, to hold that office during life, his successors to be the First Presidency of the Church.

When the first election for members of the city council of Nauvoo was held, February 1, 1841, Joseph was elected one of the councilors, and subsequently took a very active part in the city council, introducing a great variety of important bills in relation to the local government of the city, the organization of the university, the Nauvoo Legion, etc. In one of the first meetings of the council he also introduced a bill in relation to temperance, which, after some discussion, passed.

This prohibited the vending of whisky in a less quantity than a gallon, or other spirituous liquors in a less quantity than a quart, excepting on the recommendation of a physician. He was determined to discountenance barrooms and drinking saloons, and to make the drinking of liquor in places of resort punishable. In the discussion of this bill he spoke at great length on the use of liquors, and showed that they were unnecessary. They operate as a poison in the stomach, and roots and herbs can be found to effect all necessary purposes.

On the 4th of February, the Nauvoo Legion was organized, and Joseph was elected its lieutenant-general, subsequently receiving his commission from the governor. (See Nauvoo Legion.)

In March, 1841, Joseph received the following revelation, in answer to the question, "What is the will of the Lord concerning the Saints in the Territory of Iowa?"

"Verily, thus saith the Lord, to those who call themselves by my name, and are essaying to be my Saints, if they will do my will and keep my commandments concerning them: let them gather themselves together unto the places which I shall appoint unto them by my servant Joseph, and build up cities unto my name, that they may be prepared for that which is in store for a time to come. Let them build up a city unto my name upon the land opposite to the city of Nauvoo, and let the name of Zarahemla be named upon it. And let all those who come from the east, and the west, and the north, and the south, that have desires to dwell therein, take up their inheritances in the same, as well as in the city of Nashville, or in the city of Nauvoo, and in all the Stakes which I have appointed, saith the Lord."

April 6, 1841, the corner stones of the Nauvoo Temple were laid. (See Nauvoo Temple.) This occasion was a time of much rejoicing for Joseph and the Saints generally. After all their sufferings from mobocracy they had at last reached a place where they could rest for a season and commence the erection of a House of the Lord. The Lord had a great endowment in store for his Saints, but a suitable house was necessary in which to bestow this endowment—a place where the holy ordinances of the gospel could be administered. After the foundation stones were laid, many and fervent were the prayers which were offered up that the Saints might be permitted to complete it, and Joseph especially was eager to push the work ahead. The people were sick and poor, and it seemed like a very heavy undertaking for so few people as there were there to attempt the erection of such a house. But God had commanded it, and they stepped forth cheerfully to obey.

On the following day (April 7th) a general conference was held in Nauvoo, at which a report of the First Presidency was read, setting forth the progress of the work in Europe, through the labors of those of the Twelve Apostles who were there; also the joyous and encouraging results which attended the preaching of the gospel throughout the States. Attention was called to the building of the Temple, and the zeal of the Saints in Nauvoo was held up as an example for the brethren and sisters in the various Stakes and branches of the Church to imitate.

A committee was then chosen to build another house to the name of the Lord, to be known as the Nauvoo House. "It shall be," the Lord said, "a house for boarding, a house that strangers may come from afar to lodge herein; therefore let it be a good house, worthy of all acceptation, that the worthy traveler may find health and safety while he shall contemplate the work of the Lord, and the corner-stone I have appointed for Zion."

On the 8th of April, Lyman Wight was nominated as one of the Twelve Apostles, instead of Elder David W. Patten, who was killed in Missouri. The weather being so unfavorable for meetings, Joseph informed the conference that much instruction that was to have been given would be omitted.

On the 24th of May Joseph wrote a short epistle, in which he called upon the Saints who resided outside of Hancock County to make ready to move into it without delay. He wished the energy and enterprise of the people concentrated to accomplish the erection of the Temple and other buildings. He also wished it understood that all the Stakes, excepting those in Hancock County, and across the river in Lee County, Iowa, were discontinued.

On Tuesday, June 1, 1841, Joseph accompanied his brother Hyrum and William Law as far as Quincy, on their mission to the East. On the 4th he called on Governor Carlin, at his residence in Quincy.

"During my visit with the governor," writes the Prophet, "I was treated with the greatest kindness and respect; nothing was said about any requisition having come from the governor of Missouri for my arrest. In a very few hours after I had left the governor's residence, he sent Thomas King, sheriff of Adams County, Thomas Jasper, a constable of Quincy, and some others, as a posse, with an officer from Missouri, to arrest me and deliver me up to the authorities of Missouri.

"Saturday, 5th. While I was staying at Heberlin's Hotel, Bear Creek, about twenty-eight miles south of Nauvoo, Sheriff King and posse arrested me. Some of the posse, on learning the spirit of the officer from Missouri, left the company in disgust and returned to their own homes. I accordingly returned to Quincy and obtained a writ of habeas corpus from Chas. A. Warren, Esq., master in chancery; and Judge Stephen A. Douglas, happening to come to Quincy that evening, he appointed to give a hearing on the writ on the Tuesday following, in Monmouth, Warren County, where the court would then commence a regular term.

"Sunday, 6th. News of my arrest having arrived in Nauvoo last night, and being circulated through the city, Hosea Stout, Tarleton Lewis, Wm. A. Hickman, John S. Higbee, Elijah Able, Uriel C. Nickerson and George W. Clyde started from the Nauvoo landing in a skiff, in order to overtake me and rescue me, if necessary. They had a heavy head wind, but arrived in Quincy at dusk; went up to Benjamin Jones' house, and found that I had gone to Nauvoo in charge of two officers.

"I returned to Nauvoo in charge of the officers, and notified several of my friends to get ready and accompany me the next morning. Sheriff King had been suddenly seized with sickness; I nursed and waited upon him in my own house, so that he might be able to go to Monmouth.

"Monday, 7. I started very early for Monmouth, 75 miles distant (taking Mr. King along with me, and attending him during his sickness), accompanied by Charles C. Rich, Amasa M. Lyman, Shadrach Roundy, Reynolds Cahoon, Charles Hopkins, Alfred Randall, Elias Higbee, Morris Phelps, John P. Greene, Henry G. Sherwood, Joseph Younger, Darwin Chase, Ira Miles, Joel S. Miles, Lucien Woodworth, Vinson Knight, Robert B. Thompson, George Miller and others. We traveled very late, camping about midnight in the road.

"Tuesday morning, 8th. Arrived at Monmouth, and procured breakfast at the tavern; found great excitement prevailing in the public mind, and great curiosity was manifested by the citizens, who were extremely anxious to obtain 'a sight of the Prophet,' expecting to see me in chains. Mr. King, whose health was now partly restored, had considerable difficulty in protecting me from the mob that had gathered there. Mr. Sidney H. Little, for the defense, mentioned 'that the case of Mr. Smith should be taken up,' but was objected to by the State attorney pro tem., on account of his not being prepared, not having had sufficient notice of the trial. It was accordingly, by mutual consent, postponed until Wednesday morning.

"In the evening great excitement prevailed, and the citizens employed several attorneys to plead against me.

"I was requested to preach to the citizens of Monmouth; but as I was a prisoner I kept closeted in my room, for I could not even come down stairs to my meals but the people would be crowding the window to get a peep at me, and therefore appointed Elder Amasa M. Lyman to preach in the court house on Wednesday evening.

"Wednesday, 9th. At an early hour the court house was filled with spectators desirous to hear the proceedings.

"Mr. Morrison, on behalf of the people, wished for time to send to Springfield for the indictment, it not being found with the rest of the papers. This course would have delayed the proceedings, and, as it was not important to the issue, the attorneys for the defense admitted that there was an indictment, so that the investigation might proceed.

"Mr. Warren, for the defense, then read the petition, which stated that I was unlawfully held in custody, and that the indictment, in Missouri, was obtained by fraud, bribery and duress, all of which I was prepared to prove.

"Mr. Little then called upon the following witnesses, viz., Mr. Morris Phelps, Elias Higbee, Reynolds Cahoon and George W. Robinson, who were sworn. The counsel on the opposite side objected to hearing evidence on the merits of the case, as they could not go beyond the indictment. Upon this, a warm and long discussion occurred, which occupied the attention of the court during the entire day.

"All the lawyers on the opposite side, excepting two, viz., Messrs. Knowlton and Jennings, confined themselves to the merits of the case, and conducted themselves as gentlemen; but it was plainly evident that the design of Messrs Knowlton and Jennings was to excite the public mind still more on the subject, and inflame the passions of the people against me and my religion.

"The counsel on behalf of the defense, Messrs. Charles A. Warren, Sidney H. Little, O. H. Browning, James H. Ralston, Cyrus Walker and Archibald Williams, acted nobly and honorably, and stood up in the defense of the persecuted, in a manner worthy of high-minded and honorable gentlemen. Some had even been told that if they engaged on the side of the defense, they need never look to the citizens of that county for any political favors. But they were not to be overawed by the popular clamor, or be deterred from an act of public duty by any insinuations or threats whatever, and stated that if they had not before determined to take a part in the defense, they, after hearing the threats of the community, were now fully determined to discharge their duty. The counsel for the defense spoke well, without exception, and strongly urged the legality of the court examining testimony to prove that the whole proceedings, on the part of Missouri, were base and illegal, and that the indictment was obtained through fraud, bribery and corruption.

"The court, after hearing the counsel, adjourned about half past six o'clock p. m.

"When I was at dinner, a man rushed in and said, 'Which is Joe Smith? I have got a five-dollar Kirtland bill, and I'll be d—d if he don't take it back, I'll sue him, for his name is to it.' I replied, 'I am the man,' took the bill and paid him the specie, which he took very reluctantly, being anxious to kick up a fuss.

"The crowd in the court was so intense, that Judge Douglas ordered the sheriff of Warren County to keep the spectators back; but he neglected doing so, when the judge fined him ten dollars. In a few minutes he again ordered the sheriff to keep the men back from crowding the prisoner and witnesses. He replied, 'I have told a constable to do it,' when the judge immediately said, 'Clerk, add ten dollars more to that fine.' The sheriff, finding neglect rather expensive, then attended to his duty.

"A young lawyer from Missouri volunteered to plead against me; he tried his utmost to convict me, but was so high with liquor, and chewed so much tobacco, that he often called for cold water. Before he had spoken many minutes he turned sick, requested to be excused by the court and went out of the court-house, puking all the way down stairs. (As the Illinoisians call the Missouri people pukes, this circumstance caused considerable amusement to the members of the bar.) During his plea his language was so outrageous that the judge was twice under the necessity of ordering him to be silent.

"Mr. O. H. Browning then commenced his plea, and in a short time the puking lawyer returned, and requested the privilege of finishing his plea, which was allowed.

"Afterwards Mr. Browning resumed his pleadings, which were powerful; and when he gave a recitation of what he himself had seen at Quincy, and on the banks of the Mississippi River, when the Saints were exterminated from Missouri, * * * they were so affecting that the spectators were often dissolved in tears. Judge Douglas himself and most of the officers wept."

This Mr. Browning, who afterwards became a member of President Johnson's cabinet, concluded his speech as follows:

"Great God! have I not seen it? Yes, my eyes have beheld the blood-stained traces of innocent women and children, in the drear winter, who had traveled hundreds of miles barefoot, through frost and snow, to seek a refuge from their savage pursuers. 'Twas a scene of horror, sufficient to enlist sympathy from an adamantine heart. And shall this unfortunate man, whom their fury has seen proper to select for sacrifice, be driven into such a savage land, and none dare to enlist in the cause of justice? If there was no other voice under heaven ever to be heard in this cause, gladly would I stand alone, and proudly spend my latest breath in defence of an oppressed American citizen."

The next morning, June 10th, Judge Douglas delivered his opinion in the case, which was to the effect that Joseph should be discharged. Joseph continues:

"This decision was received with satisfaction by myself and the brethren, and all those whose minds were free from prejudice. It is now decided that before another writ can issue, a new demand must be made by the governor of Missouri. Thus have I been once more delivered from the fangs of my cruel persecutors, for which I thank God, my heavenly Father.

"I was discharged about 11 a. m., when I ordered dinner for my company, now increased to about sixty men; and when I called for the tavern bill, the unconscientious fellow replied, 'Only one hundred and sixty dollars.'

"About 2 p. m. the company commenced their return, traveled about twenty miles and camped by the wayside.

"Friday, 11th. Started very early, arrived at La Harpe for dinner, and returned safely to Nauvoo by 4 p. m., where I was met by the acclamations of the Saints."

The proceedings in this case, including the expense of counsel, fees of attendants, witnesses, etc., cost upwards of three thousand dollars, which was no inconsiderable sum for a person who had just been robbed of nearly all he owned in Missouri.

July 1, 1841, Apostles Brigham Young, Heber C. Kimball and John Taylor returned to Nauvoo from their mission to England. The other brethren, who had been with them to England, were detained by business and visiting relatives, and arrived in Nauvoo later. Under date of August 1st, Joseph writes:

"All the quorum of the Twelve Apostles who were expected here this season, with the exception of Elders Willard Richards and Wilford Woodruff, have arrived. We have listened to the accounts which they give of their success, and the prosperity of the work of the Lord in Great Britain, with pleasure. They certainly have been the instruments in the hands of God of accomplishing much, and must have the satisfaction of knowing that they have done their duty. Perhaps no men ever undertook such an important mission under such peculiarly distressing and unpropitious circumstances. Most of them when they left this place, nearly two years ago, were worn down with sickness and disease, or were taken sick on the road. Several of their families were also afflicted and needed their aid and support. But knowing that they had been called by the God of heaven to preach the gospel to other nations, they conferred not with flesh and blood, but obedient to the heavenly mandate, without purse or scrip, commenced a journey of five thousand miles entirely dependent on the providence of that God, who had called them to such a holy calling. While journeying to the seaboard, they were brought into many trying circumstances; after a short recovery from severe sickness, they would be taken with a relapse, and have to stop among strangers, without money and without friends. Their lives were several times despaired of, and they have taken each other by the hand, expecting it would be the last time they should behold one another in the flesh. However, notwithstanding their afflictions and trials, the Lord always interposed in their behalf, and did not suffer them to sink in the arms of death. Some way or other was made for their escape—friends rose up when they most needed them, and relieved their necessities; and thus they were enabled to pursue their journey and rejoice in the Holy One of Israel. They truly 'went forth weeping, bearing precious seed,' but have 'returned with rejoicing, bearing their sheaves with them.' "

August 7th, 1841, Don Carlos Smith, Joseph's youngest brother, died in Nauvoo. (See Don Carlos Smith.)

In August, 1841, a considerable number of Sac and Fox Indians encamped in the neighborhood of Montrose, Iowa. On the morning of August 12th the ferrymen brought over a great number of them on the ferry-boat and two flat-boats. They came for the purpose of visiting Joseph. The military band and a detachment of 'Invincibles' were on shore ready to receive and escort them to the grove, but they refused to come on shore until Joseph came. He accordingly went down and met Keokuk, Kish-ku-kosh, Appenoose and about one hundred chiefs and braves of those tribes, with their families, at the landing, introduced his brother Hyrum to them, and, after the usual salutations, conducted them to the meeting ground in the grove, and instructed them in many things which the Lord had revealed in relation to their fathers, and the promises that were made concerning them in the Book of Mormon. He advised them to cease killing each other and warring with other tribes, and keep peace with the whites, all of which was interpreted to them.

Keokuk replied that he had a Book of Mormon at his wick-i-up, which Joseph had given him some years before. "I believe," said he, "that you are a great and good man. I look rough, but I also am a son of the Great Spirit. I've heard your advice—we intend to quit fighting and follow the good talk you have given us."

After the conversation they were feasted on the green with good food, dainties and melons by the brethren; and they entertained the spectators with a specimen of their dancing.

On the 2nd, 3rd and 4th of October, 1841, a general conference was held in Nauvoo. By request of the Twelve, Joseph gave instructions on the doctrine of baptism for the dead, which was listened to with intense interest by the large assembly. The historian writes:

"He presented baptism for the dead as the only way that men can appear as saviors on Mount Zion.

"The proclamation of the first principles of the gospel was a means of salvation to men individually; and it was the truth, not men, that saved them; but men, by actively engaging in rites of salvation substitutionally, became instrumental in bringing multitudes of their kindred into the kingdom of God.

"He explained the difference between an angel and a ministering spirit—the one a resurrected or translated body, with its spirit ministering to embodied spirits; the other a disembodied spirit, visiting and ministering to disembodied spirits. Jesus Christ became a minstering spirit (while his body was lying in the sepulchre) to the spirits in prison, to fulfill an important part of his mission, without which he could not have perfected his work or entered into his rest.

"After his resurrection he appeared as an angel to his disciples, etc. Translated bodies cannot enter into rest until they have undergone a change equivalent to death. Translated bodies are designed for future missions. The angel that appeared to John on the Isle of Patmos was a translated or resurrected body [i. e., personage]. Jesus Christ went in body, after his resurrection, to minister to resurrected bodies. There has been a chain of authority and power from Adam down to the present time. * * * It is no more incredible that God should save the dead than that he should raise the dead.

"There is never a time when the spirit is too old to approach God. All are within the reach of pardoning mercy who have not committed the unpardonable sin, which hath no forgiveness, neither in this world, nor in the world to come. There is a way to release the spirit of the dead; that is by the power and authority of the Priesthood—by binding and loosing on earth. This doctrine appears glorious, inasmuch as it exhibits the greatness of divine compassion and benevolence in the extent of the plan of human salvation.

"The glorious truth is well calculated to enlarge the understanding and to sustain the soul under troubles, difficulties and distresses. For illustration, suppose the case of two men, brothers, equally intelligent, learned, virtuous and lovely, walking in uprightness and in all good conscience, so far as they have been able to discern duty from the muddy stream of tradition, or from the blotted page of the book of nature. One dies and is buried, having never heard the gospel of reconciliation; to the other the message of salvation is sent, he hears and embraces it and is made the heir of eternal life. Shall the one become a partaker of glory and the other be consigned to hopeless perdition? Is there no chance for his escape? Sectarianism answers, "none!" Such an idea is worse than atheism. The truth shall break down and dash in pieces all such bigoted Pharisaism; the sects shall be sifted, the honest in heart brought out and their priests left in the midst of their corruption.

"Many objections are urged against the Latter-day Saints for not admitting the validity of sectarian baptism, and for withholding fellowship from sectarian churches. Yet to do otherwise would be like putting new wine into old bottles, and putting old wine into new bottles. What! new revelations in the old churches? New revelation would knock out the bottom of their bottomless pit. New wine into old bottles! The bottles burst and the wine runs out. What! Sadducees in the new church? Old wine in new leathern bottles will leak through the pores and escape; so the Sadducee Saints mock at authority, kick out of the traces and run to the mountains of perdition, leaving the long echo of their braying behind them.

"He then referred to the [lack of] charity of the sects in denouncing all who disagree with them in opinion, and in joining in persecuting the Saints who believe that even such may be saved in this world and in the world to come (murderers and apostates excepted).

"This doctrine presents in a clear light the wisdom and mercy of God in preparing an ordinance for the salvation of the dead, being baptized by proxy, their names recorded in heaven, and they judged according to the deeds done in the body. This doctrine was the burden of the scriptures. Those Saints who neglect it in behalf of their deceased relatives, do it at the peril of their own salvation. The dispensation of the fulness of times will bring to light the things that have been revealed in all former dispensations; also other things that have not been before revealed. He shall send Elijah the Prophet, etc., and restore all things in Christ."

Joseph then announced that there would be no more baptisms for the dead, until the ordinance could be attended to in the font of the Lord's House, and that the Church should not hold another general conference until it could meet in that house, "for thus saith the Lord." The baptismal font was dedicated November 8th, following. (See Nauvoo Temple.)

At a meeting held in Nauvoo, November 7th, Joseph said, in speaking of temperance, faith, virtue, charity and truth:

"If you do not accuse each other, God will not accuse you. If you have no accuser, you will enter heaven, and if you will follow the revelations and instructions which God gives you through me, I will take you into heaven as my back load. If you will not accuse me, I will not accuse you. If you will throw a cloak of charity over my sins, I will over yours, for charity covereth a multitude of sins. What many people call sin, is not sin. I do many things to break down superstition, and I will break it down."

In council with the Twelve Apostles at the house of Brigham Young, November 28th, the Prophet, in conversing with the brethren on a variety of subjects, told them "that the Book of Mormon was the most correct of any book on earth, and the keystone of our religion, and a man would get nearer to God abiding by its precepts than by any other book." On the 19th of December he preached an interesting discourse, in which he said:

"Some people say I am a fallen Prophet because I do not bring forth more of the word of the Lord. Why do I not do it? Are we able to receive it? No! not one in this room. * * *

"Because we will not receive chastisement at the hand of the Prophet and Apostles, the Lord chastiseth us with sickness and death. Let not any man publish his own righteousness, for others can see that for him; sooner let him confess his sins, and then he will be forgiven, and he will bring forth more fruit. When a corrupt man is chastised, he gets angry and will not endure it. The reason we do not have the secrets of the Lord revealed unto us, is because we do not keep them, but reveal them. We do not keep our own secrets, but reveal our difficulties to the world, even to our enemies, then how would we keep the secrets of the Lord. I can keep a secret till Doomsday. What greater love hath any man than that he lay down his life for his friend; then why not fight for our friend until we die?"

"There were a number of bad men in those days," writes George Q. Cannon in the Juvenile Instructor, "who, professing to be Latter-day Saints, were guilty of many evil practices. Not content with doing wrong themselves, they tried to lead others to engage with them by telling them that Joseph knew all about their acts, and that he had given them authority to steal. They endeavored to screen themselves by using the names of Joseph and Hyrum and other leading men. They said it was not wrong to take anything from a Gentile; the Prophet Isaiah had said that Zion should suck the milk of the Gentiles; and Micah had said that the gain of the Gentiles was to be consecrated to the Lord and their substance to the Lord of the whole earth. When, therefore, they stole property from men who did not belong to the Church, they said they were 'consecrating,' or they were 'milking the Gentiles,' and justified themselves for so doing, and called it perfectly right. Of course, when such actions became known, the whole Church had to take the blame, for these wicked men told that it was a doctrine of the Church and that Joseph had taught it. This wickedness was a cause of sorrow to Joseph and Hyrum and the leading Elders. They did all they could to bring such things to light, and they cut every one off from the Church whom they knew to be guilty. Joseph and Hyrum each published statements informing the Church and the public that such doctrines had never been taught by them, and that they held themselves and their property ready to be used to support the laws in punishing men guilty of stealing and other crimes. They made oath to these statements before the mayor of the city and a justice of the peace, and published their affidavits. The Twelve Apostles also published an epistle, in which they spoke in very strong language about those thieves, and quoted from the Book of Doctrine and Covenants to show what the Lord had said about those who would rob and steal.

"In the days of Joseph, to appear like a Prophet, according to the popular idea, a man should wear a long beard, long hair, and dress in an outlandish style. If he did not wash himself and clean and pare his nails it would be all the better. He should not smile and be merry. When he spoke, his voice should be deep and solemn; when he walked, his tread should be slow and measured. If he lived in a cave, it would suit many people better than if he lived in a house. He should be different to other men in every respect. Of course, those who had these ideas of what a Prophet should be were much disappointed in Joseph, for if a Prophet should talk, dress and act in this manner, he was very unlike one. He wore no beard, did not have long hair, and was very cleanly in his person, dressed with taste, had a pleasant face, a sweet smile, a cheerful and joyous manner, and was natural. He was the very opposite of what a religious bigot would think a Prophet ought to be; and he never took any pains to be otherwise. He was a great hater of sham. He disliked long-faced hypocrisy, and numerous stories are told of his peculiar manner of rebuking it. He knew that what many people call sin is not sin, and he did many things to break down superstition. He would wrestle, play ball, and enjoy himself in physical exercises, and he knew that he was not committing sin in so doing. The religion of heaven is not to make men sorrowful, to curtail their enjoyment and to make them groan and sigh and wear long faces, but to make them happy. This Joseph desired to teach the people, but in doing so, he, like our Savior, when he was on the earth, was a stumbling-block to bigots and hypocrites. They could not understand him; he shocked their prejudices and traditions. A great change has taken place in the feelings of the world on these subjects since his death. The course taken by the Latter-day Saints, with their teachings, have had the effect of helping to bring about this change. We prove to the world that we can dance and have other amusements, and yet be happy and free from sin. The strong blows which Joseph dealt to sectarianism and sham were felt, and good effects have followed."

Joseph labored incessantly in various ways to advance the cause of truth; and was constantly kept busy by looking after the general welfare of the Church, receiving revelations, translating, preaching, writing letters, etc. He also commenced the publication of the Book of Abraham (which he had translated from the papyrus) in the Times and Seasons. The Saints exerted themselves to build the Temple, and private dwellings arose in every quarter of the city. Also a number of flourishing villages were commenced in various parts of Hancock County, Illinois, and Lee County, Iowa.

March 17, 1842, Joseph assisted in commencing the organization of the "Female Relief Society of Nauvoo." Emma Smith, Joseph's wife, was elected president, with Elizabeth Ann Whitney and Sarah M. Cleveland as counselors. On that occasion Joseph gave much instruction, read in the New Testament and Book of Doctrine and Covenants concerning the Elect Lady, and showed that the elect meant to be elected to a certain work, etc., and that the revelation was then fulfilled by Sister Emma's election to the presidency of the Society, she having previously been ordained to expound the Scriptures. Emma was blessed and her counselors were set apart by Elder John Taylor.

The organization of the Relief Society was completed March 24th; its object was to help the poor, nurse the sick, relieve the wants of the widows and orphans, and for the exercise of all benevolent purposes.

Sunday, March 20, 1842, Joseph preached to a large congregation in the grove west of the Temple. The body of Windsor P. Lyon's deceased child, which was placed before the assembly, gave occasion for the Prophet to make some interesting remarks of which the following are extracts:

"President Smith read the 14th chapter of Revelations, and said: We have again the warning voice sounded in our midst, which shows the uncertainty of human life; and in my leisure moments I have meditated upon the subject, and asked the question why it is that infants, innocent children, are taken away from us, especially those that seem to be the most intelligent and interesting. The strongest reasons that present themselves to my mind are these: This world is a very wicked world; and it is a proverb that the 'world grows weaker and wiser;' if that is the case, the world grows more wicked and corrupt. In the earlier ages of the world a righteous man, and a man of God and of intelligence, had a better chance to do good, to be believed and received than at the present day; but in these days such a man is much opposed and persecuted by most of the inhabitants of the earth, and he has much sorrow to pass through here. The Lord takes many away, even in infancy, that they may escape the envy of man and the sorrows and evils of this present world; they were too pure, too lovely, to live on earth; therefore, if rightly considered, instead of mourning we have reason to rejoice, as they are delivered from evil, and we shall soon have them again.

"What chance is there for infidelity when we are parting with our friends almost daily? None at all. The infidel will grasp at every straw for help until death stares him in the face, and then his infidelity takes its flight, for the realities of the eternal world are resting upon him in mighty power; and when every earthly support and prop fails him, he then sensibly feels the eternal truths of the immortality of the soul. We should take warning and not wait for the death-bed to repent; as we see the infant taken away by death, so may the youth and middle-aged, as well as the infant, be suddenly called into eternity. Let this, then, prove as a warning to all not to procrastinate repentance, or wait till a death-bed, for it is the will of God that man should repent and serve him in health, and in the strength and power of his mind, in order to secure his blessing, and not wait until he is called to die.

"The doctrine of baptizing children, or sprinkling them, or they must welter in hell, is a doctrine not true, not supported in holy writ, and is not consistent with the character of God. All children are redeemed by the blood of Jesus Christ, and the moment that children leave this world, they are taken to the bosom of Abraham. The only difference between the old and young dying is: one lives longer in heaven and eternal light and glory than the other, and is freed a little sooner from this miserable, wicked world. Notwithstanding all this glory, we for a moment lose sight of it and mourn the loss, but we do not mourn as those without hope."

In relation to the first principles of the gospel, the Prophet, in the same discourse, said:

"Baptism is a sign to God, to angels and to heaven, that we do the will of God; and there is no other way beneath the heavens whereby God hath ordained for man to come to him to be saved and enter into the kingdom of God, except faith in Jesus Christ, repentance and baptism for the remission of sins, and any other course is in vain; then you have the promise of the gift of the Holy Ghost.

"What is the sign of the healing of the sick? The laying on of hands is the sign or way marked out by James, and the custom of the ancient Saints as ordered by the Lord, and we cannot obtain the blessing by pursuing any other course except the way marked out by the Lord. What if we should attempt to get the gift of the Holy Ghost through any other means except the signs or way which God hath appointed—would we obtain it? Certainly not; all other means would fail. The Lord says do so and so, and I will bless you.

"There are certain key words and signs belonging to the Priesthood which must be observed in order to obtain the blessing. The sign of Peter was to repent and be baptized for the remission of sins, with the promise of the gift of the Holy Ghost; and in no other way is the gift of the Holy Ghost obtained.

"There is a difference between the Holy Ghost and the gift of the Holy Ghost. Cornelius received the Holy Ghost before he was baptized, which was the convincing power of God unto him of the truth of the gospel, but he could not receive the gift of the Holy Ghost until after he was baptized. Had he not taken this sign or ordinance upon him, the Holy Ghost which convinced him of the truth of God would have left him. Until he obeyed these ordinances and received the gift of the Holy Ghost by the laying on of hands, according to the order of God, he could not have healed the sick or commanded an evil spirit to come out of a man, and it obey him; for the spirits might say unto him, as they did to the sons of Sceva; 'Paul we know, and Jesus we know, but who are ye?' It mattereth not whether we live long or short on the earth after we come to a knowledge of these principles and obey them unto the end. I know that all men will be damned if they do not come in the way which he hath opened, and this is the way marked out by the word of the Lord.

"As concerning the resurrection, I will merely say that all men will come from the grave as they lie down, whether old or young; there will not be 'added unto their stature one cubit,' neither taken from it; all will be raised by the power of God, having spirit in their bodies, and not blood. Children will be enthroned in the presence of God and the Lamb, with bodies of the same stature that they had on earth, having been redeemed by the blood of the Lamb; they will there enjoy the fulness of that light, glory and intelligence which is prepared in the celestial kingdom."

At the close of the meeting Joseph announced that he should attend to the ordinance of baptism in the river, near his house, at 2 o'clock; and at the appointed hour the bank of the Mississippi was lined with a multitude of people, and Joseph went into the river and baptized eighty persons for the remission of their sins; and what added joy to the scene was that the first person baptized was L. D. Wasson, a nephew of Emma Smith—the first of her kindred who embraced the fulness of the gospel. After baptism, the congregation again repaired to the grove near the Temple, to attend to the ordinance of confirmation, and notwithstanding the Prophet had spoken in the open air to the people and stood in the water so long, about fifty of those baptized received their confirmation under his hands in the after part of the day.

On the 6th, 7th and 8th of April, 1842, a special conference was held in Nauvoo, on which occasion 275 brethren were ordained Elders under the hands of the Twelve Apostles, and soon afterwards sent out to preach the gospel. On account of the bad weather this conference was not so well attended as usual.

Preaching a funeral sermon on April 9, 1842, the Prophet said:

"Some have supposed that Brother Joseph could not die; but this is a mistake; it is true there have been times when I have had the promise of my life to accomplish such and such things, but, having now accomplished those things, I have not at present any lease on my life; I am as liable to die as other men. * * *

"When we lose a near and dear friend, upon whom we have set our hearts, it should be a caution unto us not to set our affections too firmly upon others, knowing that they may in like manner be taken from us. Our affections should be placed upon God and his work more intensely than upon our fellow-beings."

On the following day (April 10th), in preaching to a large assembly in the grove, Joseph pronounced a curse upon all adulterers, fornicators and unvirtuous persons, and those who had made use of his name to carry on their iniquitous designs. He also said:

"If you wish to go where God is, you must be like God, or possess the principles which God possesses, for if we are not drawing towards God in principle, we are going from him and drawing towards the devil. * * *

"A man is saved no faster than he gets knowledge, for if he does not get knowledge, he will be brought into captivity by some evil power in the other world, as evil spirits will have more knowledge and consequently more power than many men who are on the earth. Hence it needs revelation to assist us, and give us knowledge of the things of God."

In speaking to the members of the Female Relief Society, April 28, 1842, the Prophet showed how the sisters would come in possession of the privileges, blessings and gifts of the Priesthood, and that the signs should follow them, such as the healing of the sick, the casting out of devils, etc. They might attain unto these blessings by a virtuous life and conversation, and diligence in keeping the commandments of God. He also said that:

"Some little foolish things were circulating in the Society against some sisters not doing right in laying hands on the sick. Said that if the people had common sympathies, they would rejoice that the sick could be healed. * * *

"No matter who believeth, these signs, such as healing the sick, casting out devils, etc., should follow all that believe, whether male or female. He asked the Society if they could not see by this sweeping promise, that wherein they are ordained, it is the privilege of those set apart to administer in that authority, which is conferred on them; and if the sisters should have faith to heal the sick, let all hold their tongues, and let everything roll on. * * *

"Respecting females administering for the healing of the sick, he furtber remarked, there could be no evil in it, if God gave his sanction by healing; that there could be no more sin in any female laying hands on and praying for the sick than in wetting the face with water; it is no sin for anybody to administer that has faith, or if the sick have faith to be healed by their administration. * * *

"President Smith continued by speaking of the difficulties he had to surmount ever since the commencement of the work, in consequence of aspiring men—'great big Elders,' as he called them, who had caused him much trouble; to whom he had taught the things of the kingdom in private councils, they would then go forth into the world and proclaim the things he had taught them, as their own revelations; said the same aspiring disposition will be in this Society, and must be guarded against; that every person should stand and act in the place appointed, and thus sanctify the society and get it pure. * * *

"As he had this opportunity, he was going to instruct the ladies of this society, and point out the way for them to conduct themselves, that they might act according to the will of God; that he did not know that he should have many opportunities of teaching them, as they were going to be left to themselves; they would not long have him to instruct them; that the Church would not have his instructions long, and the world would not be troubled with him a great while, and would not have his teachings [in person].

"He spoke of delivering the keys of the Priesthood to the Church, and said that the faithful members of the Relief Society should receive them in connection with their husbands; that the Saints whose integrity has been tried and proved faithful might know how to ask the Lord and receive an answer; for according to his prayers God had appointed him elsewhere.

"He exhorted the sisters always to concentrate their faith and prayers for and place confidence in their husbands, whom God has appointed for them to honor, and in those faithful men whom God has placed at the head of the Church to lead his people; that we should arm and sustain them with our prayers; for the keys of the kingdom are about to be given to them, that they may be able to detect everything false; as well as to all the Elders who shall prove their integrity in due season. * * *

"How precious are the souls of men! The female parts of the community are apt to be contracted in their views. You must not be contracted, but you must be liberal in your feelings. Let this society teach women how to behave towards their husbands, to treat them with mildness and affection. When a man is borne down with trouble, when he is perplexed with care and difficulty, if he can meet a smile instead of an argument or a murmur—if he can meet with mildness, it will calm down his soul and soothe his feelings; when his mind is going to despair, it needs a solace of affection and kindness. * * *

"I now turn the key in your behalf in the name of the Lord, and this society shall rejoice, and knowledge and intelligence shall flow down from this time henceforth; this is the beginning of better days to the poor and needy, who shall be made to rejoice and pour forth blessings on your heads.

"When you go home, never give a cross or unkind word to your husband, but let kindness, charity and love crown your works henceforward; don't envy the finery and fleeting show of sinners, for they are in a miserable situation; but as far as you can, have mercy on them, for in a short time God will destroy them, if they will not repent and turn unto him. * * *

"If any have a matter to reveal, let it be in your own tongue; do not indulge too much in the exercise of the gift of tongues, or the devil will take advantage of the innocent and unwary. You may speak in tongues for your own comfort, but I lay this down for a rule, that if anything is taught by the gift of tongues, it is not to be received for doctrine.

"President Smith then gave instruction respecting the propriety of females administering to the sick by the prayer of faith, the laying on of hands, or the anointing with oil; and said it was according to revelation that the sick should be nursed with herbs and mild food, and not by the hand of an enemy. Who are better qualified to administer than our faithful and zealous sisters, whose hearts are full of faith, tenderness, sympathy and compassion? No one."

The Spirit of God was poured out in a very powerful manner, never to be forgotten by those who were present on this interesting occasion.

Under date of April 29th, Joseph writes:

"A conspiracy against the peace of my household was made manifest, and it gave me some trouble to counteract the design of certain base individuals, and restore peace. The Lord makes manifest to me many things, which it is not wisdom for me to make public until others can witness the proof of them."

CHAPTER 16.

The first endowments given in this dispensation.—The Nauvoo Legion on parade.—Joseph's life saved through the admonition of the Holy Spirit.—John C. Bennett's wickedness, apostasy and lying.—Joseph predicts that the Saints shall become a mighty people in the Rocky Mountains.—He is falsely accused of being accessory to the shooting of ex-Governor Lilburn W. Boggs.—Hides to escape arrest.—Orrin P. Rockwell's trying experience.

On Sunday, May 1, 1842, Joseph preached in the Grove on the keys of the kingdom, charity, etc., saying among other things:

"The keys are certain signs and words by which false spirits and personages may be detected from true, which cannot be revealed to the Elders till the Temple is completed. The rich can only get them in the Temple, the poor may get them on the mountain top, as did Moses. The rich cannot be saved without charity, giving to feed the poor when and how God requires, as well as building. There are signs in heaven, earth and hell; the Elders must know them all, to be endowed with power, to finish their work and prevent imposition. The devil knows many signs, but does not know the sign of the Son of Man, or Jesus. No on can truly say he knows God until he has handled something, and this can only be in the Holiest of Holies."

"Wednesday, May 4, 1842," writes Joseph, "I spent in the upper part of the store, that is, in my private office (so called, because in that room I keep my sacred writings, translate ancient records and receive revelations), and in my general business office or lodge room (that is, where the masonic fraternity meet occasionally, for want of a better place), in council with General James Adams of Springfield, Patriarch Hyrum Smith, Bishops Newel K. Whitney and George Miller, and President Brigham Young, and Elders Heber C. Kimball and Willard Richards, instructing them in the principles and order of the Priesthood, attending to washings, anointings, endowments and the communication of keys pertaining to the Aaronic Priesthood, and so on to the highest order of Melchizedek Priesthood, setting forth the order pertaining to the Ancient of Days, and all those plans and principles by which any one is enabled to secure the fulness of those blessings which have been prepared for the Church of the First Born, and come up and abide in the presence of the Elohim in the eternal worlds. In this council was instituted the ancient order of things for the first time in these last days. And the communications I made to this council were of things spiritual, and to be received only by the spiritual-minded; and there was nothing made known to these men but what will be made known to all the Saints of the last days, so soon as they are prepared to receive and a proper place is prepared to communicate them, even to the weakest of the Saints; therefore, let the Saints be diligent in building the Temple, and all houses which they have been or shall hereafter be commanded of God to build; and wait their time with patience in all meekness, faith, perseverance unto the end, knowing assuredly that all these things referred to in this council are always governed by the principle of revelation.

"Thursday, 5th. General Adams started for Springfield, and the remainder of the council of yesterday continued their meeting at the same place, and myself and Brother Hyrum received in turn from the other the same I had communicated to them the day previous."

On the 7th of May the Nauvoo Legion was on parade and was reviewed by Joseph. Judge Stephen A. Douglas was holding court at the time at Carthage, but there was so much curious excitement prevailing respecting this military parade and review that he adjourned the circuit court. He and some of the principal lawyers came to Nauvoo for the occasion, and there were also a large number of other strangers present. After the review the generals and their staffs, with their wives, and Judge Douglas and his friends, dined at Joseph's house. In the afternoon the Legion was separated into cohorts and fought an animated sham battle. In relation to this sham battle and John C. Bennett's conduct on that occasion in regard to himself Joseph writes:

"I was solicited by General Bennett to take command of the first cohort during the sham battle; this I declined. General Bennett next requested me to take my station in the rear of the cavalry, without my staff, during the engagement; but this was counteracted by Captain Albert P. Rockwood, commander of my life guards, who kept close to my side, and I chose my own position. And if General Bennett's true feelings towards me are not made manifest to the world in a very short time, then it may be possible that the gentle breathings of that Spirit, which whispered me on parade that "there was mischief concealed in that sham battle," were false; a short time will determine the point. Let John C. Bennett answer at the day of judgment, 'Why did you request me to command one of the cohorts, and also take my position without my staff, during the sham battle on the 7th of May, 1842, where my life might have been the forfeit, and no man have known who did the deed?' "

Joseph was right; John C. Bennett's subsequent conduct proved the correctness of the Prophet's apprehensions. This man came to Nauvoo and professed to have a great desire to see the Saints enjoy their rights. He was a man of some ability, and had a little influence, yet those who knew him best had but little confidence in him. After he came to Nauvoo he joined the Church, and he was, apparently, very zealous and devoted to the cause of God. He soon became prominent among the people, obtained the office of major-general in the Nauvoo Legion, which he was very active in getting organized, and was also mayor of the city of Nauvoo. When the news spread about that Doctor Bennett had joined the Church, a letter was written to Nauvoo by a former neighbor of Bennett's, in which it was stated that he had a wife and two children in Ohio. The writer warned the people respecting him, and stated that he was a very mean man. Not much importance was attached to this letter at the time it was received. It was known that good men were sometimes spoken evil against, and it was thought that the statements of the writer of the letter might be untrue. On this account the letter was kept quiet, but it was held in reserve.

For a while after his baptism he kept up a good appearance, and was anxious to have Joseph and the people think he was a true Saint. But this did not last long. He tried to keep his wickedness secret, but it soon came to light. Joseph was not long in finding out that he was acting the hypocrite. To gain his ends with the sisters he told them many very wicked lies about Joseph. He said that Joseph taught doctrines in secret which he dared not make public; or, in other words, he preached one thing in public and practiced another in private. By means of these lies he deceived several women, led them astray and ruined them to gratify his lusts. Joseph had done all he could to save him, but it was for no avail; he was a corrupt, bad man.

When Joseph learned that Bennett was continuing his wickedness, he charged him with it. Bennett admitted it was true. Joseph was resolved to put a stop to such actions, and he publicly proclaimed against him.

At a special session of the city council held in Nauvoo, May 19, 1842, Bennett, "having discovered that his whoredoms and abominations were fast coming to light, and the indignation of an insulted and abused people was rising rapidly against him, thought best to make a virtue of necessity, and try to make it appear that he was innocent by resigning his office as mayor." The council most gladly accepted his resignation and Joseph was elected mayor in his stead.

Because of the numerous reports circulating in the city, and to quiet the public mind, Joseph asked Bennett if he had aught against him, when Bennett arose before the council and a house filled with spectators, and said that he had not had any difficulties with any of the leading men of the Church. Joseph asked: "Will you please state definitely whether you know anything against my character, either in public or private?" Bennett replied: "I do not; in all my intercourse with General Smith, in public and in private, he has been strictly virtuous."

Bennett also gave the following testimony under oath before Alderman Daniel H. Wells:

"NAUVOO, Ill., May 17, 1842.

"Personally appeared before me, Daniel H. Wells, an alderman of said city of Nauvoo, John C. Bennett, who, being duly sworn according to law, deposeth and saith, that he never was taught anything in the least contrary to the strictest principles of the gospel, or of virtue, or of the laws of God or man, under any circumstances, or upon any occasion, either directly or indirectly, in word or deed, by Joseph Smith; and that he never knew the said Smith to countenance any improper conduct whatever, either in public or in private; and that he never did teach men in private that an illegal, illicit intercourse with females was, under any circumstances, justifiable, and that I never knew him so to teach others.

"JOHN C. BENNETT."

When Bennett gave this testimony he professed that he intended to repent and do right, but it was not long before he again committed himself. On the 25th of May he was notified that the First Presidency, the Twelve and the Bishops had withdrawn fellowship from him, and were about to publish him in the papers. He begged them so humbly not to do this for his mother's sake, that the notice was withdrawn from the papers. The next day he attended a meeting at the Masonic Lodge rooms, where about one hundred of the brethren were present, and acknowledged his wicked and licentious conduct; he cried like a child, and said he was worthy of the severest chastisement; but he begged that he might be spared. His sorrow appeared so deep for the moment, or he pretended to feel so penitent, that Joseph plead for mercy, and he was forgiven still.

Soon after this he left Nauvoo, and shortly afterwards commenced circulating every kind of slander and falsehood against Joseph and the Saints. According to his statements they were unfit to live. While he was professing to be a member of the Church, and to have great faith in the work, he wrote several fierce articles about the persecutions which the Saints had endured in Missouri. He did not publish his own name to these, but signed them "Joab, General in Israel." After he left Nauvoo, in writing against Joseph and the Church, he quoted from these articles. He did this to show the public what a treasonable, bloodthirsty people the "Mormons" were; but he took care not to tell them that he was the "Joab" who had written the articles. Afterwards he published a book filled with the blackest lies about Joseph and the Saints, which created a little excitement, but did not last long. He lived to be despised by every one who knew him, and those who did not know him, but only heard his stories or read his book, looked upon him as a traitor and a bad man. For some years before his death he suffered from violent fits; he also partly lost the use of his limbs and of his tongue, and it was difficult for him to make himself understood. He dragged out a miserable existence, without a person scarcely to take the least interest in his fate, and died without a soul to mourn his departure.

Sidney Rigdon and his family, who sympathized with Bennett, had partaken of his spirit. The sickness of one of Sidney Rigdon's daughters, and her wonderful restoration to health, and the reproofs she gave the family, had the effect to stir him up again to a sense of his duties, and for a little while he sought to do better.

The following is an extract from an editorial, written by Joseph and published in the Times and Seasons, June 15, 1842:

"Seek to know God in your closets, call upon him in the fields. Follow the direction of the Book of Mormon, and pray over and for your families, your cattle, your flocks, your herds, your corn and all things that you possess; ask the blessing of God upon all your labors, and everything that you engage in. Be virtuous and pure; be men of integrity and truth; keep the commandments of God, and then you will be able more perfectly to understand the difference between right and wrong—between the things of God and the things of men; and your path will be like that of the just, 'which shineth brighter and brighter unto the perfect day.'

"Be not so curious about tongues, do not speak in tongues except there be an interpreter present; the ultimate design of tongues is to speak to foreigners; and if persons are very anxious to display their intelligence, let them speak to such in their own tongues. The gifts of God are all useful in their place, but when they are applied to that which God does not intend, they prove an injury, a snare and a curse instead of a blessing."

"Saturday, 6th, (August, 1842)," writes Joseph, "I passed over the river to Montrose, Iowa, in company with General Adams, Colonel Brewer and others, and witnessed the installation of the officers of the Rising Sun Lodge of Ancient York Masons, at Montrose, by General James Adams, deputy grand master of Illinois. While the deputy grand master was engaged in giving the requisite instructions to the master-elect, I had a conversation with a number of brethren in the shade of the building on the subject of our persecutions in Missouri, and the constant annoyance which has followed us since we were driven from that State. I prophesied that the Saints would continue to suffer much affliction and would be driven to the Rocky Mountains, many would apostatize, others would be put to death by our persecutors, or lose their lives in consequence of exposure or disease, and 'some of you will live to go and assist in making settlements and build cities and see the Saints become a mighty people in the midst of the Rocky Mountains.'"

Only a few could realize then that this prophecy would be fulfilled so soon afterwards. The Saints did continue to suffer much affliction, many apostatized, others were killed by their persecutors, others lost their lives through exposure, being driven away from their homes by mobs, and others have lived to reach the Rocky Mountains, have assisted in making settlements and building cities, and have seen the Saints become a mighty people there, but Joseph himself did not live in the flesh to see his own prediction fulfilled.

May 6, 1842, Lilburn W. Boggs, who was governor of Missouri at the time the Saints were driven out of that State, was shot at and wounded at his home at Independence, Jackson County, Missouri. On the 20th of July following he went before Samuel Weston, a justice of the peace at Independence, and stated under oath that he believed it was Orrin P. Rockwell who had shot him; and he applied to the governor of Missouri to make a demand on the governor of Illinois for the said Orrin P. Rockwell to be delivered up and brought to Jackson County. Later, Boggs also swore that he believed Joseph Smith was "an accessory before the fact, to an assault with an intent to kill made by one Orrin P. Rockwell on Lilburn W. Boggs." Governor Reynolds, of Missouri, then sent a requisition to Governor Carlin, of Illinois, for Joseph and Orrin P. Rockwell to be given up to him. Governor Carlin promptly issued a warrant, on the strength of which Joseph and Orrin P. Rockwell were arrested in Nauvoo on the 8th of August. Immediately after their arrest the municipal court of Nauvoo issued a writ of habeas corpus demanding that Joseph and Rockwell should be brought before that tribunal for trial. The officers, however, refused to acknowledge the right of the municipal court in the case, and consequently returned to Governor Carlin for further instructions.

This demand that Joseph should be taken to Missouri was not only unjust but illegal, for even if he had been guilty of the crime of which Boggs falsely accused him, there was no law by which he could have been brought to Missouri for trial. The whole affair was a mere pretext on the part of Boggs to get Joseph in his hands for the purpose of murdering him. Remembering the words of Solomon, that "a prudent man foreseeth the evil and hideth himself, but the simple pass on and are punished," Joseph deemed it wise for him and Orrin P. Rockwell to absent themselves from the city before the sheriff returned. Consequently he crossed the river to his uncle John Smith's house, in Iowa, where he remained a couple of days, and then recrossed the river and stopped with Brother Edward Sayer, who lived in the woods a few miles north of Nauvoo. There he remained until there was a rumor in the city that his place of refuge was known, when he removed to Carlos Granger's.

While Joseph was absent from the city there were a great many stories in circulation about the course the officers intended to take to get him. If they could not find him themselves, it was said, they were going to bring to Nauvoo a force of men so numerous that they could search every house, and if he could not be found there, they would search the State, and not rest until they had him in their power. These rumors caused some little uneasiness and anxiety among some of the brethren, but Joseph himself felt quite calm and advised the people not to pay any attention to such rumors.

From his hiding places he wrote and received numerous letters, and thus attended to his usual routine of business. In a letter which he received from Wilson Law, who had been elected major-general in the Legion instead of John C. Bennett, the writer says:

> "I do respond with my whole heart to every sentiment you have so nobly and so feelingly expressed, and while my heart beats, or this hand, which now writes, is able to draw and wield a sword, you may depend on it being at your service in the glorious cause of liberty and truth."

It is hardly credible, that the man who wrote these lines in less than eighteen months should descend so low as to conspire against his pretended friend, and yet such was the case. Both Wilson and William Law (the latter one of Joseph's counselors) turned out to be wicked and corrupt men. Both apostatized and became two of Joseph's most bitter enemies. They entered into league with the mob and did more, probably, than any other two men to bring about the murder of the Prophet and his brother Hyrum.

Orrin Porter Rockwell, to be free from the annoyances to which he was subjected because of Boggs' affidavit, made a visit to the Eastern States. He remained there until the latter part of the winter 1842-43, when he started back to Nauvoo. On his way, he touched at St. Louis, and on March 4, 1843, was arrested by a man named Fox, on the oath of a man named Elias Parker, who swore that he was the Orrin P. Rockwell who was said to have tried to kill Lilburn W. Boggs. He was taken before a magistrate at St. Louis, and afterwards put in jail. A pair of iron hobbles was fastened on his ankles, and he was kept prisoner there two days, after which he was carried to Independence, Jackson County. There he was treated with great indignity and several plans were formed to kill him.

Soon after Joseph heard of Brother Rockwell's arrest, he prophesied, in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, that he would get away honorably from the Missourians. This prediction was fulfilled. God preserved Brother Rockwell; for his power alone could have preserved him. He was often threatened with death, and on two occasions, while he was being carried to be tried at Liberty, Clay County, and on his return from there men had planned to waylay him and kill him; but they failed. The grand jury could not find any evidence to prove that he had shot at Boggs, much as the mob would have liked them to do so.

Brother Rockwell was told by Joseph H. Reynolds, the sheriff of Jackson County, that he was going to arrest Joseph. He proposed to Brother Rockwell to go with him and betray Joseph into his hands. Reynolds said that he could have any sum of money he would name if he would do so. Brother Rockwell rejected his offer with indignation. When Reynolds started to go to Nauvoo in June, 1843, Brother Rockwell knew that he and his partners were after Joseph; yet he was a prisoner, and had no means of informing him of the danger he was in. He knew that they were determined to kill Joseph, and his anxiety was so intense upon the subject, that his flesh twitched on his bones. Twitch it would, and he could not help it. While he was in this condition he heard a dove alight on the the window in the upper room of the jail where he was confined. The dove commenced cooing and then went off. In a short time it came back to the window, where a pane was broken and crept through between the bars of iron, which were about two and half inches apart. It flew around the trap door several times; did not alight, but continued cooing until it crept through the bars again, and flew out through the broken window. This proved a comfort to Brother Rockwell and he accepted it as a favorable sign. The twitching of his flesh ceased, and he was fully satisfied from that moment that they would not get Joseph in Missouri, and that he should regain his own freedom. As near as could be found out, this happened at the time that Joseph was in the custody of Reynolds, an account of which will be given hereafter. It was the only time he had a visit from the dove.

December 13, 1843, Brother Rockwell was released from jail, having been a prisoner upwards of nine months and suffering everything almost but death. He had been imprisoned without any form of law, chained hand and foot in a filthy dungeon, without fire or enough clothing to keep him warm, and without being allowed to change his clothes and half-fed on miserable food, until he was reduced to a mere skeleton. When the irons were taken off, he was so weak that he had to be led! And yet nothing could be proved against him.

After suffering many hardships, he reached Nauvoo on the evening of December 25, 1843, and immediately went to Joseph's residence—the Mansion. Joseph had a company of his friends that evening at his house. In the midst of the festivities a man with his hair long and falling over his shoulders, and apparently drunk, came in and acted like a Missourian. Joseph requested the captain of police, who was present, to put him out of doors. A scuffle ensued, and Joseph had an opportunity of looking the man full in the face. It was no drunken man; it was no Missourian; "but," as Joseph writes in his history, "to my great surprise and untold joy, I discovered it was my long-tried, warm, but cruelly persecuted friend, Orrin Porter Rockwell, just arrived from nearly a year's imprisonment, without conviction, in Missouri."

Agreeable to Joseph's counsel, a special conference was held in Nauvoo, August 29, 1842, for the purpose of calling a number of Elders to go out in different directions and by their preaching deluge the States with a flood of truth, to allay the excitement which had been raised by the falsehoods put in circulation by John C. Bennett and others. Joseph, who had kept himself concealed for about three weeks, again appeared in public on the day of the conference. He writes:

"I was rejoiced to look upon the Saints once more, whom I had not seen for about three weeks. They also were rejoiced to see me, and we all rejoiced together. My sudden appearance on the stand, under the circumstances which surrounded us, caused great animation and cheerfulness in the assembly. Some had supposed that I had gone to Washington, and some that I had gone to Europe, while some thought I was in the city; but whatever difference of opinion had prevailed on that point, we were now all filled with thanksgiving and rejoicing.

"When Hyrum had done speaking, I arose and congratulated the brethren and sisters on the victory I had once more gained over the Missourians. I had told them formerly about fighting the Missourians, and about fighting alone. I had not fought them with the sword, or by carnal weapons; I had done it by stratagem, by outwitting them; and there had been no lives lost, and there would be no lives lost, if they would hearken to my counsel.

"Up to this day God has given me wisdom to save the people who took counsel. None had ever been killed who abode by my counsel. At Haun's Mill, the brethren went contrary to my counsel; if they had not, their lives would have been spared.

"I had been in Nauvoo all the while, and outwitted Bennett's associates, and attended to my own business in the city all the time. We want to whip the world mentally, and they will whip themselves physically."

During Joseph's address, an indescribable transport of good feeling was manifested by the assembly, and about three hundred and eighty Elders volunteered to go immediately on the proposed mission.

CHAPTER 17.

Joseph writes two epistles to the Saints in relation to baptism for the dead.—His house is searched by the officers.—He again absents himself from home to escape arrest.—Goes to Springfield, where he is granted a fair trial and gets an honorable discharge.—Rejoicing among the Saints.—Questions answered concerning John the Baptist.—Grand keys revealed by which to know the spirits.—The Prophet's financial embarrassment.—His experience in blessing children at Ramus.

September 1, 1842, Joseph wrote an address to the Saints on the subject of baptism for the dead. (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 127.) In that address he also informed the Saints that inasmuch as the Lord had revealed to him that his enemies, both in Missouri and Illinois, were again in pursuit of him, he had thought it wisdom for his own safety and the safety of the people to again leave Nauvoo for a short season.

On the 3rd (September), about noon, Deputy Sheriff Pitman and two other men came in a sneaking manner into Joseph's house. It appeared that they had come up the river side, and hitched their horses below the Nauvoo House, and then proceeded on foot, undiscovered, until they got into the house. When they arrived, Joseph was in another apartment of the building, eating dinner with his family. John Boynton happened to be the first person discovered by the sheriffs, and they began to ask him where Mr. Smith was. He answered that he saw him early in the morning; but did not say that he had seen him since.

While this conversation was going on Joseph passed out of the back door, and through the corn in his garden to Newel K. Whitney's house. He went upstairs undiscovered. In the meantime his wife Emma went and conversed with the sheriffs. Pitman said he wanted to search the house for Mr. Smith. In answer to a question by Sister Emma, he said he had no warrant authorizing him to search, but insisted upon searching the house anyway. She did not refuse, and accordingly they searched through, but to no effect.

"This," writes the Church historian, "is another testimony and evidence of the mean, corrupt, illegal proceedings of our enemies, notwithstanding the Constitution of the United States, Article 4th, says:

"'The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated; and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.'

"Yet these men audaciously, impudently and altogether illegally searched the house of President Joseph Smith, even without any warrant or authority whatever. Being satisfied that he was not in the house, they departed. They appeared to be well armed, and, no doubt, intended to take him either dead or alive."

It was rumored that there were fifteen men in the city along with the sheriffs, and that they started from Quincy the day before, expecting and fully determined to reach Nauvoo in the night, and fall upon Joseph's house unawares; but it was reported they lost the road and got scattered away one from another, and could not get along until daylight. This was in all probability true, as they appeared much fatigued, and complained of being weary and sore from riding.

Joseph, accompanied by Erastus H. Derby, left Bishop Whitney's house about 9 o'clock, and went to Brother Edward Hunter's, where he was welcomed and made comfortable by the family. There he considered himself safe from the hands of his enemies for the time being.

On the 6th (September, 1842), Joseph wrote another epistle to the Saints, giving further instructions respecting baptism for the dead (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 128). This communication made a deep and solemn impression on the Saints, who manifested their intention to obey the instructions to the letter. Joseph sent word to those of the Twelve who were going on missions that he wished them to labor in Illinois and to preach against mobocracy. On the 10th he concluded to return to his own house again, thinking he would be safe there. On the 2nd of October word reached Nauvoo that Governor Carlin had offered a reward of $200 for Joseph and $200 for Orrin Porter Rockwell, and that Governor Reynolds of Missouri also offered a reward of $300 apiece for them. Rumor, furthermore, had it that Carlin intended to have Joseph arrested with an illegal writ, hoping to draw him to Carthage to get acquitted by habeas corpus by Judge Stephen A. Douglas; then he would have men waiting with a legal writ to serve on him as soon as he was released under the other one, and bear him away without further ceremony, to Missouri. Many of the Missourians were also coming to unite with the militia of Illinois of their own free will and at their own expense, so that if they did not take him there, they would come and search the city. These were reports only; but Joseph knew very well that his enemies were capable of taking these measures to get him into their power, or any others that might be suggested to them. Consequently, on October 7th, he concluded to leave his home again for a short season. After a tedious journey of one night and part of a day, which he made in the company of several of the brethren, he reached Father Taylor's, the father of President John Taylor. He remained there nearly two weeks, and then he returned to Nauvoo to see his wife whom he left sick. He went back to Father Taylor's the next day, and stayed another week. On the 28th of October he returned to Nauvoo.

On the 30th of October the Saints met for public worship for the first time within the walls of the Nauvoo Temple, where a temporary floor had been laid for that purpose. (See Nauvoo Temple.) November 15th Joseph informed the public that the multitude of other business devolving upon him made it impossible for him to fulfil the arduous duties as editor of the Times and Seasons. Consequently that responsibility was placed upon Apostle John Taylor.

December 9, 1842, Willard Richards, Heber C. Kimball, William Clayton and a number of other brethren started for Springfield, the capital of the State of Illinois, to present testimony to the government that Joseph was in Illinois at the time Boggs was shot. As he was in Illinois at the time, he could not be a fugitive from the justice of Missouri. The object of the brethren in making this move was to procure a discharge from Governor Ford, the newly created governor of the State, on Governor Carlin's writ for Joseph's arrest. A petition was presented to Governor Ford to revoke the writ and proclamation of Governor Carlin for his apprehension. They also made affidavit that Joseph was in Illinois on the 6th of May, the day when Boggs was said to have been shot. Governor Ford stated, in reply, that he had no doubt but that the writ of Governor Carlin was illegal; but he also doubted his own power to interfere with his acts. However, he submitted the case and all the papers relating thereto to six of the judges of the Supreme Court. They were unanimous in the opinion that the requisition from Missouri was illegal and insufficient to cause Joseph's arrest, but were divided in opinion as to Governor Ford's power to interfere with Governor Carlin's acts. Ford wrote a letter to Joseph informing him of the judges' views, and declining, himself, to interfere in the case. He advised Joseph to have a judicial investigation of his case, and if he should conclude to go to Springfield to have the case tried, he said he did not believe there would be any disposition to use violence towards him, for he should feel it his duty to protect him with any necessary amount of force from mob violence.

In order to have his case properly tried at Springfield, on the charge of being accessory to the shooting of Lilburn W. Boggs, and of being a fugitive from justice, Joseph was arrested at Nauvoo on the 26th of December, and on the 27th he started in custody of Wilson Law for Springfield, in company with Hyrum Smith, Willard Richards, John Taylor, William Marks, Levi Moffit, Peter Haws and Lorin Walker. Joseph writes:

"There was considerable snow and the traveling heavy; but we arrived at my brother Samuel's, in Plymouth, a little after sunset, and we were soon joined by Edward Hunter, Theodore Turley, Dr. Tate and Shadrach Roundy. I supped with Brother William Smith's family, who lived under the same roof, slept with Dr. Willard Richards on a buffalo skin spread upon the floor, and dreamed that I was by a beautiful stream of water and saw a noble fish, which I threw out. Soon after, I saw a number more, and threw them out. I afterwards saw a multitude of fish, and threw out a great abundance, and sent for salt and salted them.

"Wednesday, 28th. The morning was wet. We started about 8 o'clock, and arrived at Mr. Stevenson's tavern, in Rushville, at 3 o'clock in the afternoon, about twenty miles. Brother William's wife, who was sick, went with us, accompanied by Sister Durphy, who went with us from Nauvoo to take care of her. * * *

"On my return to the tavern, the brethren took my height, which was six feet, and my brother Hyrum the same.

"Thursday, 29th. Started early; crossed the Illinois River at 11 o'clock, and arrived at Captain Dutche's before 5 o'clock in the evening, about thirty-two miles; the weather extremely cold."

Referring to a previous incident Joseph writes:

"We applied to all the taverns for admission in vain; we were 'Mormons,' and could not be received. Such was the extreme cold that in one hour we must have perished. We pleaded for our women and children in vain. We counseled together, and the brethren agreed to stand by me, and we concluded that we might as well die fighting as freeze to death.

"I went into a tavern and pleaded our cause to get admission. The landlord said he could not keep us for love or money. I told him we must and would stay, let the consequence be what it might; for we must stay or perish. The landlord replied, 'We have heard the Mormons are very bad people; and the inhabitants of Paris have combined not to have anything to do with them, or you might stay.' I said to him, 'We will stay; but no thanks to you. I have men enough to take the town; and if we must freeze, we will freeze by the burning of these houses.' The taverns were then opened, and we were accommodated, and received many apologies in the morning from the inhabitants for their abusive treatment."

Joseph continues his narrative as follows:

"Friday, Dec. 30, 1842. Started at 8 o'clock this morning, and arrived at Judge Adams', in Springfield, at half past 2 o'clock in the afternoon, where I saw Justin Butterfield, Esq., United States' district attorney, who told me that Judge Pope had continued the court two or three days on account of my case, and would close on the morrow, and that he should try my case on its merits, and not on any technicality. * * *

"While in conversation at Judge Adams' during the evening, I said 'Christ and the resurrected Saints will reign over the earth during the thousand years. They will not probably dwell upon the earth, but will visit it when they please, or when it is necessary to govern it. There will be wicked men on the earth during the thousand years. The heathen nations who will not come up to worship will be visited with the judgments of God, and must eventually be destroyed from the earth.' * * *

"Saturday, 31st. At 9 o'clock in the morning, Mr. Butterfield called and informed me that King had the original writ; and I signed a petition to Governor Ford to issue a new writ, that my case might be tried thereon, as well as on the proclamation. My petition was granted, and at 11 o'clock I was arrested thereon by a deputy, Mr. Maxey, in presence of Mr. Butterfield, my attorney, who immediately wrote a petition to Judge Pope for a writ of habeas corpus, which I signed, and at half past 11 in the morning went before Judge Pope.

"Mr. Butterfield read my petition, and stated that the writ and warrant were different from the requisition of the governor of Missouri. He then read Governor Ford's warrant, Watson's affidavit, Governor Reynolds' requisition on the governor of Illinois, and the proclamation of Governor Carlin, showing that Reynolds had made a false statement, as nothing appeared in the affidavits to show that Smith was in Missouri. He also stated that all the authority for transportation of persons from one State to another rests on the Constitution and the laws of Congress. We ask for habeas corpus because the papers are false, and because we can prove that Joseph Smith was in this State at the time of the commission of the crime.

"The writ was granted, returned and served in one minute, and I walked up to the bar, Mr. Butterfield read the habeas corpus, and moved the court to take bail till I could have a hearing, which was granted. * * *

"This afternoon, a team ran away, and went past the State House, when the hue-and-cry was raised, 'Joe Smith is running away!' which produced great excitement and a sudden adjournment of the House of Representatives."

On Sunday, January 1, 1843, Elders Orson Hyde and John Taylor preached in the State House, the use of which was tendered to Joseph by the speaker of the House of Representatives. Most of the members of the legislature and the various departments of the State were present. In conversation with Judge Stephen A. Douglas, Justin A. Butterfield, U. S. district attorney for Illinois, and some other prominent men, Joseph, in reply to their questions, explained the nature of a prophet:

"If any person should ask me if I were a prophet, I should not deny it, as that would give me the lie; for, according to John, the testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy; therefore, if I profess to be a witness or teacher, and have not the spirit of prophecy, which is the testimony of Jesus, I must be a false witness; but if I be a true teacher and witness, I must possess the spirit of prophecy, and that constitutes a prophet; and any man who says he is a teacher or preacher of righteousness, and denies the spirit of prophecy, is a liar, and the truth is not in him, and by this key false teachers and imposters may be detected."

In reply to Mr. Butterfield, he also stated that the most prominent point of difference in sentiment between the Latter-day Saints and sectarians was, that the latter were all circumscribed by some peculiar creed, which deprived its members the privilege of believing anything not contained therein, whereas the Latter-day Saints have no creed, but are ready to believe all true principles that exist, as they are made manifest from time to time.

On the following day (Monday, January 2nd), Joseph prophesied in the name of the Lord, that he should not go to Missouri dead or alive. He repaired to the court-room, where Judge Pope, accompanied by several ladies, took his seat on the bench at 10 o'clock a. m. Joseph's case was called, but at the request of Josiah Lamborn, the attorney-general of Illinois, it was continued for two days.

At 9 o'clock on Wednesday, January 4, 1843, the court was opened. Judge Pope on the bench. He had ten ladies by his side, the first time, the marshal of the district said, during his administration, that ladies had attended court on a trial.

Mr. Lamborn, in opening the case for the State, was not severe. He said little more, apparently, than his relation to the case demanded. Joseph's lawyers wanted to read, in evidence, affidavits of several persons, showing conclusively that he was at Nauvoo on the whole of the 6th and 7th days of May, 1842; and on the evenings of those days was more than three hundred miles distant from Jackson County, Missouri, where it was alleged that Boggs was shot; and that he had not been in the State of Missouri at any time between the 10th day of February and the 1st day of July, 1842. Mr. Lamborn objected to the reading of these affidavits; but the court decided that they should be read.

B. S. Edwards, Esq., opened the defense for Joseph in an animated speech, and made some very pathetic allusions to the sufferings of the Saints in Missouri. He was followed by Mr. Butterfield, who managed the case very judiciously and his plea was a powerful one. He showed that Governor Reynolds, of Missouri, had subscribed to a lie in his demand for Joseph, and that Governor Carlin would not have given up his dog on such a requisition. He said that such an attempt struck at all the liberty of the institutions of the country. What was Joseph's fate that day might be their fate the next day. It was a matter of history that Joseph and his people had been murdered or driven from the State of Missouri. If he were to go there, it would be only to be murdered, and he had better be sent to the gallows. He was an innocent and unoffending man, and if there was any difference between him and other men, it was that this people believe in prophecy and others do not.

The court-room was crowded during the trial; the utmost good order and good feelings prevailed, and much prejudice was allayed. The court adjourned till the next day, at 9 o'clock, for the making up of its opinion. In the afternoon Mr. Prentiss, the marshal of the district, sent his carriage to bring Joseph to his house. A number of the leading men of the town were there and took supper with him.

The next day (January 5th), a bevy of ladies accompanied Judge Pope to the court-room to give his decision. The place was crowded with spectators and Joseph was the hero of the day, being the observed by everybody. In reviewing the case at considerable length, the judge passed some very severe strictures on the action of the different governors and officers who had taken part in the case, and Joseph was discharged.

Thus another instance had happened in which, after suffering contumely and abuse and being persecuted and dogged and almost harassed out of his life, nothing could be proved against him. He stood an innocent man in the face of the world and before his enemies, who were unable to sustain any of their cruel charges.

During his stay in Springfield, Joseph had ample opportunity of conversing with the judge, the lawyers and various officers, and he talked freely to them about religion and generally made a very favorable impression upon them. His plain, simple and yet powerful and truthful teaching, his affable manners, the kind smile that illuminated his face, his angelic countenance and noble and dignified form and the Spirit of God which rested down upon him, convinced them, in spite of themselves, that he was a much-abused, wronged and innocent man. Prejudice began to melt away, and there was a disposition manifested to grant him justice.

From many distinguished men he also received invitations to visit them, but time would not permit him to do so. In conversing with some of the brethren in relation to doctrine, on a certain occasion while in Springfield, he said:

"Because faith is wanting, the fruits are. No man since the world was had faith without having something along with it. The ancients quenched the violence of fire, escaped the edge of the sword, women received their dead, etc. By faith the worlds were made. A man who has none of the gifts has no faith; and he deceives himself, if he supposes he has. Faith has been wanting, not only among the heathen, but in professed Christendom also, so that tongues, healings, prophecy and Prophets and Apostles, and all the gifts and blessings, have been wanting."

On Saturday, January 7th, Joseph and his friends left Judge Adams at Springfield. The weather was cold and disagreeable, making the traveling tedious and hard, through snow and mud. They arrived at Captain Dutche's in the evening and remained over night. On the following day they crossed the Illinois River on the ice and spent the night in Rushville. On Monday the 9th, the journey was continued toward Plymouth. When about two miles west of Brooklyn, at half past 12 p. m., the horses of one of the carriages slipped and became unmanagable; and horses and carriage, with Lorin Walker and Doctor Richards in it, went off the embankment some six or eight feet perpendicular, doing no damage except breaking the fore-axletree and top of the carriage. It was a remarkable interposition of Providence that neither of the brethren was injured in the least. "The company," writes Joseph, "agreed that Lilburn W. Boggs should pay the damage, cut down a small tree, spliced the axle, drove on and arrived at Brother Samuel Smith's, in Plymouth, about 4 p. m. After supper, I visited my sister, Catherine Salisbury, accompanied by Doctor Richards and Sister Durphy. This was the first time I had visited her in the State of Illinois, and the circumstances brought vividly to my mind many things pertaining to my father's house, of which I spake freely, and particularly of my brother Alvin. He was a very handsome man, surpassed by none but Adam and Seth, and of great strength. When two Irishmen were fighting, and one was about to gouge the other's eyes, Alvin took him by his collar and breeches and threw him over the ring, which was composed of men standing around to witness the fight."

"While there," said Dr. Richards, "my heart was pained to see a sister of Joseph's almost barefoot, and four lovely children entirely so, in the middle of a severe winter. What has not Joseph and his father's family suffered to bring forth the work of the Lord in these latter days!"

On the 10th the company arrived in Nauvoo. It was a time of jubilee when Joseph returned safe once more to his home and the Saints, and the people rejoiced as none but those could who have suffered so severely from the hands of their enemies. A day of humiliation, prayer and thanksgiving was appointed for the Saints on the 17th of January, when well attended meetings were held in various parts of the city.

By Joseph's invitation a numerous company of his friends spent the 18th of January, 1843, at his house. While they were together Joseph read to them a letter written by John C. Bennett to Sidney Rigdon, in which he threatened Joseph in the most vindictive manner. He said new proceedings had been gotten up on the old charges, and nothing could save him; they would carry him off to Missouri and there deal with him. If Rigdon could have had his way he would have kept this letter from Joseph, as he did not want it known that he had received such a letter, but there was good reason to believe that Sidney Rigdon was acting traitorously with him, and that he was in secret correspondence with his enemies.

On Sunday, January 22nd, Joseph preached at the Temple. In the course of his remarks he said: "I shall not be sacrificed until my time comes; then I shall be offered freely." Remarkable words! and remarkably fulfilled!

The next Sunday (January 29th), he answered two questions which had been asked him concerning his discourse the previous Sunday:

"The first question arose from the saying of Jesus: 'Among those that are born of women, there hath not arisen a greater Prophet than John the Baptist: nevertheless, he that is least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he.' (Matth. 11: 11.) How is it that John was considered one of the greatest of Prophets? His miracles could not have constituted his greatness.

"First. He was entrusted with a divine mission of preparing the way before the face of the Lord. Whoever had such a trust committed to him before or since? No man.

"Secondly. He was entrusted with the important mission, and it was required at his hands, to baptize the Son of Man. Whoever had the honor of doing that? Whoever had so great a privilege and glory? Whoever led the Son of God into the waters of baptism, and had the privilege of beholding the Holy Ghost descend in the form of a dove, or rather in the sign of a dove, in witness of that administration? The sign of the dove was instituted before the creation of the world a witness for the Holy Ghost, and the devil cannot come in the sign of a dove. The Holy Ghost is a personage, and is in the form of a personage. It does not confine itself to the form of a dove but in sign of a dove. The Holy Ghost cannot be transformed into a dove; but the sign of a dove was given to John to signify the truth of the deed, as the dove is an emblem or token of truth and innocence.

"Thirdly. John, at that time, was the only legal administrator in the affairs of the kingdom there was then on the earth and holding the keys of power. The Jews had to obey his instructions or be damned, by their own law; and Christ himself fulfilled all righteousness in becoming obedient to the law which he had given to Moses on the mount, and thereby magnified it and made it honorable, instead of destroying it. The son of Zacharias wrested the keys, the kingdom, the power, the glory from the Jews, by the holy anointing and decree of heaven; and these three reasons constitute him the greatest Prophet born of a woman.

"Second question: How was the least in the kingdom of heaven greater than he?

"In reply, I asked: Whom did Jesus have reference to as being the least? Jesus was looked upon as having the least claim in all God's kingdom, and was least entitled to their credulity as a Prophet, as though he had said: 'He that is considered the least among you is greater than John—that is, I myself.'"

February 6, 1843, at the municipal election, Joseph was unanimously elected mayor of the city of Nauvoo. He marked out very plainly the course which he wished to see officers take in relation to salaries, fees, etc. He prophesied to James Sloan, the city recorder, that it would be better for him, ten years from that time, if he were not to say anything more about fees. He also urged upon the city council the necessity of their acting upon the principle of liberality and of relieving the city from all unnecessary expenses and burdens. He prophesied that if they would be liberal in their proceedings, they would become rich; and spoke against the principle of pay for every little service rendered, and especially of committees having extra pay for their services.

On February 9, 1843, Joseph gave three grand keys, by which good and bad angels or spirits may be known (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 129), and adds:

"A man came to me in Kirtland, and told me he had seen an angel, and described his dress. I told him he had seen no angel, and that there was no such dress in heaven. He grew mad, and went into the street, and commanded fire to come down out of heaven to consume me. I laughed at him, and said, 'You are one of Baal's prophets; your God does not hear you; jump up and cut yourself;' and be commanded fire from heaven to consume my house.

"When I was preaching in Philadelphia, a Quaker called out for a sign. I told him to be still. After the sermon, he again asked me for a sign. I told the congregation the man was an adulterer; that a wicked and adulterous generation seeketh after a sign; and that the Lord had said to me, in a revelation, that any man who wanted a sign was an adulterous person. 'It is true,' cried one, 'for I caught him in the very act,' which the man afterwards confessed when he was baptized."

The following incident in the experience of the Prophet may give the reader an idea of his warm and impulsive nature. He writes:

"Monday, 20th (February, 1843). * * * While the court was in session, I saw two boys fighting in the street, near Mill's Tavern. I left the business of the court, ran over immediately, caught one of the boys (who had begun the fight with clubs) and then the other; and after giving them proper instruction, I gave the bystanders a lecture for not interfering in such cases, and told them to quell all disturbances in the street at the first onset. I returned to the court and told them that nobody was allowed to fight in Nauvoo but myself."

Because of the loss which Joseph had sustained in Missouri, on occount of his long and dreary imprisonment, he was forced to take advantage of the general bankrupt law, dividing all he had among his creditors. This reduced him to poverty, and gave occasion for President Brigham Young, in behalf of the quorum of the Twelve, to write to the branches of the Church at Ramus, Lima, Augusta and other places, under date of March 1, 1843, as follows:

"Beloved Brethren.—As our beloved President Joseph Smith is now relieved from his bondage and his business, temporarily, and his property, too, he has but one thing to hinder his devoting his time to the spiritual interests of the Church, to the bringing forth of the revelations, translation and history. And what is that? He has not provision for himself and family, and is obliged to spend his time in providing therefor. His family is large and his company great, and it requires much to furnish his table. And now, brethren, we call on you for immediate relief in this matter; and we invite you to bring our President as many loads of wheat, corn, beef, pork, lard, tallow, eggs, poultry, venison, and everything eatable at your command (not excepting unfrozen potatoes and vegetables, as soon as the weather will admit), flour, etc., and thus give him the privilege of attending to your spiritual interest.

"The measure you mete shall he measured to you again. If you give liberally to your President in temporal things, God will return to you liberally in spiritual and temporal things, too. One or two good new milch cows are much needed also.

"Brethren, will you do your work, and let the President do his for you before God? We wish an immediate answer by loaded teams or letter."

This call had the desired effect. On March 3rd Bishop Newel K. Whitney returned from Ramus with five teams loaded with provisions and grain as a present to Joseph, which afforded him seasonable relief. "I pray God to bless them abundantly," he writes, "and may it be returned upon their heads an hundredfold."

Under date of March 10, 1843, the following is recorded: "I (Joseph), with Willard Richards, Wilford Woodruff and many others, about 7 p. m., discovered a stream of light in the southwest quarter of the heavens. Its pencil rays were in the form of a broad sword, with the hilt downward, the blade raised, pointing from the west-southwest, raised to an angle of 45 degrees from the horizon, and extending nearly or within two or three degrees to the zenith of the degree where the sign appeared. This sign gradually disappeared from half-past 7 o'clock, and at 9 had entirely disappeared. As sure as there is a God who sits enthroned in the heavens, and as sure as he ever spoke by me, so sure will there be a speedy and bloody war; and the broad sword seen this evening is the sure sign thereof."

On the 11th of March, Joseph, together with Brigham Young, went to Ramus, a small town in the northeast part of Hancock County, where they the next day (March 12th) preached to the Saints.

In the evening (March 13th) meeting," writes Joseph, "twenty-seven children were blessed, nineteen of whom I blessed myself, with great fervency. Virtue went out of me, and my strength left me, when I gave up the meeting to the brethren. * * *

"Elder Jedediah M. Grant inquired of me the next day the cause of my turning pale and losing strength last night while blessing children. I told him that I saw that Lucifer would exert his influence to destroy the children that I was blessing, and I strove with all the faith and spirit that I had to seal upon them a blessing that would secure their lives upon the earth; and so much virtue went out of me into the children, that I became weak, from which I have not yet recovered; and I referred to the case of the woman touching the hem of the garment of Jesus. (Luke, 8th chapter.) The virtue here referred to is the spirit of life; and a man who exercises great faith in administering to the sick, blessing little children or confirming, is liable to become weakened."

In the midst of a heavy snow-storm Joseph and Brigham Young returned to Nauvoo on the 14th.

During Joseph's next visit to Ramus, he had a conversation with some of the brethren, on April 2nd, in which he taught those important doctrines which constitute the 130th section of the Doctrine and Covenants.

CHAPTER 18.

Joseph speaks at the annual conference in Nauvoo.—Prophesies about the coming of the Savior.—Preaches a funeral sermon.—Reviews the Nauvoo Legion.—Speaks on the eternity of the marriage covenant.—"The more sure word of prophecy."—Prophecy about Stephen A. Douglas and the future fate of the United States.—Extracts from a discourse.—Endowments given in Nauvoo to Hyrum Smith, Brigham Young and others.

On the 6th of April and following days the annual conference of the Church was held within the Temple walls in Nauvoo, on which occasion Joseph asked the Saints if they were satisfied with the First Presidency, so far as he was concerned as an individual, to preside over the whole Church, or would they have another. He did not crave power merely for its own sake. He acted in the capacity of President because God had called him; and while he filled the position he earnestly desired the love and confidence of God's people. He did everything that a man could do to secure the good feelings of the Church.

"If," said he, "I have done anything to injure my character, reputation or standing, or have dishonored our religion by any means in the sight of angels or in the sight of men and women, I am sorry for it; and if you will forgive me, I will endeavor to do so no more. I do not know that I have done anything of the kind; but if I have, come forward and tell me of it. If anyone has any objection to me, I want you to come boldly and frankly and tell me of it; and if not, ever after hold your peace."

Sidney Rigdon's conduct during these days was such as not to satisfy him. He acted in such a manner that Joseph could not have genuine confidence in him, or have that fellowship for him which it was natural he should desire to feel for one of his counselors. His feelings respecting Sidney Rigdon's course probably made him more desirous of learning from the Saints how they felt respecting the First Presidency of the Church. It was a great cause of strength to him, as it is to every man filling a high and responsible station, to know that the prayers of the people ascended to God in his behalf, and that they had confidence in him that he was trying to magnify his office.

On motion Joseph was then unanimously sustained as President of the Church, with Sidney Rigdon and William Law as his counselors. During the conference many glorious doctrines, to the great joy and edification of the Saints, were set forth by Joseph, who spoke under the guidance of the Spirit of God. In one of his sermons he said:

"Were I going to prophesy, I would say the end will not come in 1844, '45 or '46, or forty years. There are those of the rising generation who shall not taste death till Christ comes.

"I was once praying earnestly upon this subject, and a voice said unto me, 'My son, if thou livest until thou art eighty-five years of age, thou shalt see the face of the Son of Man.' I was left to draw my own conclusions concerning this; and I took the liberty to conclude that if I live to that time, he would make his appearance. But I do not say whether he will make his appearance or I shall go where he is. I prophesy in the name of the Lord God, and let it be written: The Son of Man will not come in the clouds of heaven till I am eighty-five years old.

"He then read the 14th chapter of Revelations, 6th and 7th verses: 'And I saw another angel fly in the midst of heaven,' etc., and Hosea, 7th chapter: 'After two days,' etc.—2,520 years, which brings it to 1890. The coming of the Son of Man never will be—never can be till the judgments spoken of for this hour are poured out; which judgments are commenced. Paul says: 'Ye are the children of the light, and not of darkness, that that day should overtake you as a thief in the night.'

"It is not the design of the Almighty to come upon the earth and crush it and grind it to powder, but He will reveal it to his servants, the Prophets. Judah must return, Jerusalem must be rebuilt, and the Temple, and water come out from under the Temple, and the waters of the Dead Sea be healed. It will take some time to build the walls of the city and the Temple; and all this must be done before the Son of Man will make his appearance. There will be wars and rumors of wars, signs in the heavens above and on the earth beneath, the sun turned to darness and the moon to blood, earthquakes in divers places, the seas heaving beyond their bounds; then will appear one grand sign of the Son of Man in heaven. But what will the world do? They will say it is a planet, a comet, etc. But the Son of Man will come as the sign of the coming of the Son of Man, which will be as the light of the morning cometh out of the east."

Shortly after this (April 16th), Joseph preached on the subject of the resurrection, having heard of the death of Elder Lorenzo D. Barnes, while on a mission to England. Of his sermon on that occasion we copy the following:

"When I heard of the death of our beloved brother Barnes, it would not have affected me so much if I had the opportunity of burying him in the land of Zion.

"I believe their condition is enviable who have buried their friends here. Look at Jacob and Joseph in Egypt, how they required their friends to bury them in the tomb of their fathers. See the expense which attended the embalming and the going up of the great company to the burial.

"It has always been considered a great calamity not to obtain an honorable burial; and one of the greatest curses the ancient Prophets could put on any man was, that he should go without a burial.

"I have said: Father, I desire to die here among the Saints. But if this is not thy will, and I go hence and die, wilt thou find some kind friend to bring my body back, and gather my friends who have fallen in foreign lands, and bring them up hither, that we may all lie together.

"I will tell you what I want. If to-morrow I shall be called to lie in yonder tomb, in the morning of the resurrection, let me strike hands with my father and cry, 'My Father,' and he will say, 'My son, my son,' as soon as the rock rends and before we come out of our graves.

"And may we contemplate these things so? Yes, if we learn how to live and how to die. When we lie down we contemplate how we may rise up in the morning; and it is pleasing for friends to lie down together, locked in the arms of love, to sleep, and awake in each other's embrace, and renew their conversation.

"Would you think it strange if I relate what I have seen in vision in relation to this interesting theme? Those who have died in Jesus Christ may expect to enter into all that fruition of joy, when they come forth, which they possessed or anticipated here.

"So plain was the vision that I actually saw men, before they had ascended from the tomb, as though they were getting up slowly. They took each other by the hand, and said to each other: 'My father, my son, my mother, my daughter, my brother, my sister.' And when the voice calls for the dead to arise, suppose I am laid by the side of my father, what would be the first joy of my heart? To meet my father, my mother, my brother, my sister; and when they are by my side, I embrace them, and they me.

"It is my meditation all the day, and more than my meat and drink, to know how I shall make the Saints of God comprehend the visions that roll like an overflowing surge before my mind.

"Oh! how I would delight to bring before you things which you never thought of! But poverty and the cares of the world prevent. But I am glad I have the privilege of communicating to you some things, which, if grasped closely, will be a help to you when earthquakes bellow, the clouds gather, the lightnings flash, and the storms are ready to burst upon you like peals of thunder. Lay hold of those things, and let not your knees or joints tremble, nor your hearts faint; and then what can earthquakes, wars and tornadoes do? Nothing. All your losses will be made up to you in the resurrection, provided you continue faithful. By the vision of the Almighty I have seen it.

"More painful to me are the thoughts of annihilation than death. If I had no expectation of seeing my father, mother, brothers, sisters and friends again, my heart would burst in a moment, and I should go down to my grave.

"The expectation of seeing my friends in the morning of the resurrection cheers my soul and makes me bear up against the evils of life. It is like their taking a long journey, and on their return we meet them with increased joy."

Under date of April 19th, Joseph writes: "I have been called to thousands of cases in sickness, and I have never failed of administering comfort where the patient has thrown himself unreservedly on me; and the reason is that I never prescribed anything that would injure the patient, if it did him no good.

"I have lost a father, brother and child, because in my anxiety I depended more on the judgment of other men than my own, while I have raised up others who were lower than they were. By-the-bye, I will say that that man (pointing to Levi Richards) is the best physician I have ever been acquainted with. People will seldom die of disease, provided we know it seasonably, and treat it mildly, patiently and perseveringly, and do not use harsh means.

"It is like the Irishman's digging down the mountain. He does not put his shoulder to it to push it over, but puts it in his wheelborrow, and carries it away day after day, and perseveres in it until the whole mountain is removed. So we should persevere in the use of simple remedies, and not push against the constitution of the patient, day after day, and the disease will be removed and the patient saved. It is better to save the life of a man than to raise one from the dead."

In speaking to the Twelve on the same day, the Prophet said:

"It is not necessary that Jedediah M. and Joshua Grant should be ordained High Priests in order to preside. They are too young. * * * If a High Priest comes along, and goes to snub either of them in their presidency, because they are Seventies, let them knock the man's teeth down his throat—I mean spiritually. * * *

"Take Jacob Zundall and Frederic H. Moeser, * * * and send them to Germany; and when you meet an Arab, send him to Arabia; when you find an Italian, send him to Italy, and a Frenchman to France; or an Indian that is suitable, send him among the Indians. Send them to the different places where they belong. Send somebody to Central America and to all Spanish America; and don't let a single corner of the earth go without a missionary."

Upon suitable occasions Joseph took great pleasure in witnessing the evolutions of the Nauvoo Legion, of which he was the lieutenant-general. Martial exercises gave him great pleasure, and had occasion required, he would, without doubt, have made a very superior general; he appeared to possess every needed qualification. On May 6th there was a grand review of the Nauvoo Legion on the parade ground east of Nauvoo. Joseph reviewed the Legion and expressed his admiration at the perceptible improvement there was in the discipline, evolutions and uniform. He felt proud to be associated with such a body of men, who, in point of discipline, uniform, appearance and a knowledge of military tactics, were one of the strongest defenses of the State of Illinois and a great bulwark of the western country. In addressing the Legion, he said, among other things:

"When we have petitioned those in power for assistance, they have always told us they had no power to help us. * * * When they give me the power to protect the innocent, I will never say I can do nothing for their good; I will exercise that power."

His great heart burned within him at the thought of the oppressions which himself and brethren had endured in this land of liberty, for the redemption of which from tyranny their fathers had fought. If he had had the power, oppression would have ceased in the land, and all who were disposed to do right would have had freedom.

During a discourse which Joseph preached in Yelrome, May 14, 1843, he said:

"In this world mankind are naturally selfish, ambitious and striving to excel one above another. So in the other world there are a variety of spirits. Some seek to excel. And this was the case with Lucifer when he fell. He sought for things which were unlawful. Hence he was cast down, and it is said he drew away many with him; and the greatness of his punishments is, that he shall not have a tabernacle. This is his punishment. So the devil thinking to thwart the decree of God by going up and down in the earth, seeking whom he may destroy—any person that he can find that will yield to him, he will bind him, and take possession of the body, and reign there, glorying in it mightily, not caring that he had got a stolen body; and by and by some one having authority will come along and cast him out and restore the tabernacle to its rightful owner. The devil steals a tabernacle because he has not one of his own; but if he steals one, he is always liable to be turned out of doors. * * *

"Now for the secret and grand key. Though they (the Saints) might hear the voice of God and know that Jesus was the Son of God, this would be no evidence that their election and calling was made sure, that they had part with Christ, and were joint heirs with him. They then would want that more sure word of prophecy, that they were sealed in the heavens and had the promise of eternal life in the kingdom of God. Then, having this promise sealed unto them, it was an anchor to the soul, sure and steadfast."

"Tuesday, 16th (May, 1843), at 11 o'clock," writes Joseph, "I, with Geo. Miller, Wm. Clayton, Eliza and Lydia Partridge and J. M. Smith, started for Carthage, where we tarried about half-an-hour conversing with different individuals, when we started for Ramus; arrived about half-past 3 p. m., and stayed at Wm. G. Perkins' for the evening; then went to Benjamin F. Johnson's with Wm. Clayton, to sleep. Before retiring, I gave Brother and Sister Johnson some instructions on the Priesthood; and putting my hand on the knee of Wm. Clayton, I said:

" 'Your life is hid with Christ in God, and so are many others. Nothing but the unpardonable sin can prevent you from inheriting eternal life, for you are sealed up by the power of the Priesthood unto eternal life, having taken the step necessary for that purpose.

" 'Except a man and his wife enter into an everlasting covenant and be married for eternity, while in this probation, by the power and authority of the Holy Priesthood, they will cease to increase when they die; that is, they will not have any children after the resurrection. But those who are married by the power and authority of the Priesthood in this life, and continue without committing the sin against the Holy Ghost, will continue to increase and have children in the celestial glory. The unpardonable sin is to shed innocent blood or be accessory thereto. All other sins will be visited with judgment in the flesh, the spirit being delivered to the buffetings of Satan until the day of the Lord Jesus.

" 'The way I know in whom to confide—God tells me in whom I may place confidence. In the celestial glory there are three heavens or degrees; and in order to obtain the highest, a man must enter into this order of the Priesthood; and if he does not, he cannot obtain it. He may enter into the other, but that is the end of his kingdom—he cannot have an increase.' " (Doc. & Cov., Sec. 131.)

"Wednesday, 17th, * * * At 10 o'clock a. m., I preached from 2nd Peter, 1st chapter, and showed that knowledge is power; and the man who has the most knowledge has the greatest power. Salvation means a man being placed beyond the power of all his enemies. The more sure word of prophecy means a man knowing that he is sealed up unto eternal life by revelation and the spirit of prophecy through the power of the holy Priesthood. It is impossible for a man to be saved in ignorance. Paul saw the third heavens, and I more. Peter penned the most sublime language of any of the Apostles.

"In the evening I went to hear a Methodist preacher lecture. After he got through, I offered some corrections as follows:

" 'The 7th verse of 2nd chapter of Genesis ought to read—God breatbed into Adam bia spirit (i. e., Adam's spirit) or breath of life; but when the word 'rauch' applies to Eve, it should be translated lives.

" 'Speaking of eternal duration of matter, I said: There is no such thing as immaterial matter. All spirit is matter, but is more fine or pure, and can only be discerned by purer eyes. We cannot see it; but when our bodies are purified, we shall see that it is all matter.' "

In passing through Carthage on his return from a preaching mission to Ramus, May 18, 1843, Joseph dined with Judge Stephen A. Douglas, who was there holding court. After dinner, Joseph, at the judge's request, occupied three hours in giving him a minute history of the persecutions of the Saints in Missouri. The judge listened attentively, and spoke warmly in condemnation of the conduct of Governor Lilburn W. Boggs and the authorities of Missouri, and said that any people who had acted as the mobs of Missouri had done ought to be punished. Joseph, in conclusion, said:

"I prophesy, in the name of the Lord God of Israel, unless the United States redress the wrongs committed upon the Saints in the State of Missouri and punish the crimes committed by her officers, that in a few years the government will be utterly overthrown and wasted, and there will not be so much as a potsherd left for their wickedness in permitting the murder of men, women and children, and the wholesale plunder and extermination of thousands of her citizens to go unpunished, thereby perpetrating a foul and corroding blot upon the fair fame of this great republic, the very thought of which would have caused the high-minded and patriotic framers of the Constitution of the United States to hide their faces with shame. Judge, you will aspire to the Presidency of the United States, and if you ever turn your hand against me or the Latter-day Saints, you will feel the weight of the hand of the Almighty upon you; and you will live to see and know that I have testified the truth to you, for the conversation of this day will stick to you through life."

A portion of this prophecy respecting the United States and the State of Missouri has been fulfilled, and the rest will be. But Joseph's words to Judge Douglas have been fulfilled to the very letter. Douglas did aspire to the Presidency of the United States, and he did use his influence against the Latter-day Saints, thinking that he could gain popularity by so doing, but he miserably failed. He was deserted by his own friends, and died a disappointed man.

In a discourse which Joseph delivered on the 21st of May, 1843, to a large congregation in Nauvoo, he said:

"I love that man better who swears a stream as long as my arm, yet deals justice to his neighbors and mercifully deals his substance to the poor, than the long, smooth-faced hypocrite. * * *

"God judges men according to the use they make of the light which he gives them. * * *

"I could explain a hundredfold more than I ever have of the glories of the kingdoms manifested to me in the vision, were I permitted, and were the people prepared to receive it. * * *

"Salvation is for a man to be saved from all his enemies; for until a man can triumph over death, he is not saved. A knowledge of the Priesthood alone will do this.

"The spirits in the eternal world are like the spirits in this world. When those have come into this world and received tabernacles, then died, and again have risen and received glorified bodies, they will have an ascendancy over the spirits who have received no bodies, or kept not their first estate, like the devil. The punishment of the devil was, that he should not have a habitation like men. The devil's retaliation is, he comes into this world, binds up men's bodies, and occupies them himself. When the authorities come along, they eject him from a stolen habitation."

Under date of May 26th, Joseph records: "After 5 p. m. I met in council in the upper room, with my brother Hyrum, Brigham Young, Heber C. Kimball, Willard Richards, Judge James Adams, Bishop Newel K. Whitney and William Law, and gave them their endowments and also instructions in the Priesthood, on the new and everlasting covenant, etc."

It afforded Joseph great joy and relief to be able to bestow these blessings upon his brethren—faithful men, whom he had tried and proved, and who had never deserted him nor flinched in the hour of temptation and danger. He now felt that the responsibility and care no longer rested upon himself alone, for he had bestowed upon them the keys of the Priesthood, the same that he himself held; and whatever might happen to him there were others now who had the authority to step forth and build up the kingdom of God on the earth and to perform all the ordinances thereof.

Sunday, June 11th, Joseph preached from the stand in Nauvoo. In the course of his interesting remarks, he said:

"Many will say, 'I will never forsake you, but will stand by you at all times.' But the moment you teach them some of the mysteries of the kingdom of God that are retained in the heavens and are to be revealed to the children of men when they are prepared for them, they will be the first to stone you and put you to death. It was the same principle that crucified the Lord Jesus Christ, and will cause the people to kill the Prophets in this generation. * * *

"Hades, the Greek, or shaole, the Hebrew, these two significations mean a world of spirits. Hades, shoale, paradise, spirits in prison, are all one; it is a world of spirits. * * *

"As the Father hath power in himself, so hath the Son power in himself, to lay down his life and take it again, so he has a body of his own. The Son doeth what he hath seen the Father do; then the Father hath some day laid down his life and taken it again; so he has a body of his own; each one will be in his own body."

CHAPTER 19.

Joseph visits his wife's sister near Dixon, Illinois.—Is arrested and ill-treated by Sheriff Reynolds and Constable Wilson.—Obtains a writ of habeas corpus and starts for Ottawa.—Interesting experience in Pawpaw Grove.—Joseph and company return to Dixon and subsequently start for Quincy.—The Prophet is met by his friends, who escort him triumphantly to Nauvoo.—His trial before the municipal court in Nauvoo and his final acquittal.

Joseph's wife, Emma, had a sister by the name of Mrs. Wasson, who was living near Dixon, Lee County, Illinois. On the 13th of June he started with his wife and children to make her a visit. After he had gone, a letter from Judge James Adams, of Springfield, under date of the 16th, reached Nauvoo by express. In this letter the judge stated that Governor Thomas Ford had told him that he was going to issue a writ for Joseph, and that it would start the next day. Missouri was still determined that Joseph should not have any peace, and the governor of that State had sent to the governor of Illinois, Thomas Ford, to arrest him and deliver him up to the officers of Missouri. When this letter reached Nauvoo, Joseph's brother Hyrum sent Elders William Clayton and Stephen Markham as fast as possible to inform him. They rode 212 miles to reach the place where Joseph was; in sixty-six hours after leaving Nauvoo they found him. Joseph told them not to be alarmed. Said he: "I have no fear. I shall not leave here. I shall find friends, and Missourians cannot hurt me; I tell you in the name of Israel's God." He had previously given an appointment to preach in Dixon, and the people were anxious to hear him; but he wrote to them, telling them there was a writ out for him, and he, therefore, declined preaching.

On the 23rd, two men were at Dixon trying to hire a man and team. They said they were "Mormon" Elders and wanted to see the Prophet. They obtained the team and drove up to Mr. Wasson's while the family were at dinner. They told the same story there, that they were "Mormon" Elders and wanted to see "Brother Joseph." This, however, was not true, for one of them was Joseph H. Reynolds, sheriff of Jackson County, Missouri, and the other Constable Harmon T. Wilson, of Carthage, Illinois.

"I was in the yard going to the barn," writes Joseph, "when Wilson stepped to the end of the house and saw me. He accosted me in a very uncouth, ungentlemanly manner, when Reynolds stepped up to me and collared me; both of them presented cocked pistols to my breast, without showing any writ or serving any process. Reynolds cried out, 'G— d— you, if you stir, I'll shoot; G— d— you, if you stir one inch, I'll shoot you; G— d— you, be still, or I'll shoot you, by G—.' I inquired, 'What is the meaning of all this?' 'I'll show you the meaning, by G—; and if you stir one inch, I'll shoot you, G— d— you.' I answered 'I am not afraid of your shooting; I am not afraid to die.' I then bared my breast and told them to shoot away, saying, 'I have endured so much oppression, I am weary of life; and kill me, if you please. I am a strong man, however, and with my own natural weapons could soon level both of you; but if you have any legal process to serve, I am at all times subject to law, and shall not offer resistance.' Reynolds replied, 'G— d— you, if you say another word, I will shoot you, by G—.' I answered, 'Shoot way; I am not afraid of your pistols.'

"By this time Stephen Markham walked deliberately towards us. When they saw him coming, they turned their pistols from me to him, and threatened his life if he came any nearer; but he paid no attention to their threats, and continued to advance nearer. They then turned their pistols on me again, jamming them against my side, with their fingers on the triggers, and ordered Markham to stand still, or they would shoot me through. As Markham was advancing rapidly towards me, I said, 'You are not going to resist the officers, are you, Brother Markham?' He replied, 'No, not if they are officers; I know the law too well for that.'

"They then hurried me off, put me in a wagon without serving any process, and were for hurrying me off without letting me see or bid farewell to my family or friends, or even allowing me time to get my hat or clothes, or even suffer my wife or children to bring them to me. I then said, 'Gentlemen, if you have any legal process, I wish to obtain a writ of habeas corpus,' and was answered —'G— d— you, you shan't have one.' They still continued their punching me on both sides with their pistols.

"Markham then sprang and seized the horses by the bits, and held them until my wife could bring my hat and coat, Reynolds and Wilson again threatening to shoot Markham, who said, 'There is no law on earth that requires a sheriff to take a prisoner without his clothes.' Fortunately, at this moment I saw a man passing, and told him, 'These men are kidnapping me, and I wish a writ of habeas corpus to deliver myself out of their hands.' But as he did not appear to go, I told Markham to go, who immediately proceeded to Dixon on horseback, where the sheriff also proceeded with me at full speed, without even allowing me to speak to my family or bid them good-bye. The officers held their pistols with the muzzles jamming into my side for more than eight miles, and only desisted on being reproached by Markham for their cowardice in so brutally ill-treating an unarmed, defenseless prisoner. On arriving at the house of Mr. McKennie, the tavern-keeper, I was thrust into a room and guarded there, without being allowed to see anybody; and fresh horses were ordered to be ready in five minutes.

"I again stated to Reynolds, 'I wish to get counsel,' when he answered, 'G— d— you, you shan't have counsel; one word more, G— d— you, and I'll shoot you.' 'What is the use of this so often?' said I. 'I have repeatedly told you to shoot; and I now tell you again to shoot away.'

"I saw a person passing, and shouted to him through the window, 'I am falsely imprisoned here, and I want a lawyer.' Lawyer Edward Southwick came, and had the door banged in his face, with the old threat of shooting him if he came any nearer.

"Another lawyer (Mr. Shepherd G. Patrick) afterwards came and received the same treatment, which began to cause considerable excitement in Dixon.

"A Mr. Lucien P. Sanger asked Markham what was the matter, when he told him all, and stated that the sheriff intended to drag me away immediately to Missouri, and prevent my taking out a writ of habeas corpus.

"Sanger soon made this known to Mr. Dixon, the owner of the house, and his friends, who gathered round the hotel, and gave Reynolds to understand that if that was their mode of doing business in Missouri, they had another way of doing it in Dixon. They were a law-abiding people and Republicans, and gave Reynolds to understand that they should not take me away without giving me the opportunity of a fair trial, and that I should have justice done me; but if they persisted in their course, they had a very summary way of dealing with such people.

"Mr. Reynolds, finding further resistance to be useless, allowed Mr. Patrick and Mr. Southwick to come into the room to me (but Wilson was inside guarding the door, and Reynolds guarded the outside of the door), when I told them I had been taken prisoner by these men without process; I had been insulted and abused by them. I showed them my flesh, which was black for about eighteen inches in circumference on each side, from their punching me with their pistols; and I wanted them to sue out a writ of habeas corpus, when Reynolds swore he should only wait half an hour to give me a chance. A messenger was immediately sent by Mr. Dixon to Mr. Chamberlain, the master in chancery, who lived six miles distant, and another messenger to Cyrus H. Walker, who happened to be near, to have them come down and get out the writ of habeas corpus.

"A writ was sued out by Markham before a justice of the peace against Reynolds and Wilson for threatening his life. They were taken into custody by the constable. He sued out another writ for assault and threatening my life, whereupon they were again arrested.

"At this time Markham rushed into the room and put a pistol (unobserved) into my pocket, although Reynolds and Wilson had their pistols cocked at the same time and were threatening to shoot him.

"About midnight he sued out a writ for a violation of the law in relation to writs of habeas corpus, Wilson having transferred me to the custody of Reynolds, for the purpose of dragging me to Missouri, and thereby avoiding the effect and operation of said writ, contrary to law, which was put over to be heard at 10 o'clock to-morrow morning; and I was conducted back to the room and guarded through the night."

The next day (June 24th) Joseph took the opportunity of giving Brother William Clayton a hint about going to Nauvoo to let his brother Hyrum know what was being done. A horse and buggy were hired to carry him to Rock Island. This was on the Mississippi River, and if a steamboat should pass there on its way down the river, he would soon be carried to Nauvoo. When he reached there the people thought there would be no steamboat going down for days. Brother Clayton was non-plussed; but before he decided on any other plan of action, he thought he would take dinner. While they were preparing it for him, he heard the puff of a steamboat coming down the river. It was the Amaranth; she was hailed and rounded to at the landing; and in 15 minutes from the time he reached there, Brother Clayton was on board and on his way to Nauvoo. It was a providential occurrence for a steamboat to be secured with so little delay.

About 8 o'clock a. m. the master in chancery arrived at Dixon and issued a writ of habeas corpus, returnable before the Hon. John D. Caton, judge of the Ninth Judicial Circuit, at Ottawa, which was duly served on Reynolds and Wilson. Cyrus H. Walker, who was considered the greatest criminal lawyer in that part of Illinois, told Joseph he could not find time to defend him, unless he would promise him his vote. He was a candidate for representative to Congress and was out making speeches to secure his election. He thought if Joseph would only vote for him that his election would be secured, for the Latter-day Saints would all vote as the Prophet did. Joseph determined to secure his aid and promised to vote for him, which caused Walker to feel very joyful and he told Brother Markham, "I am now sure of my election, as Joseph Smith has promised me his vote, and I am going to defend him."

During that morning another writ was sued against Reynolds and Wilson for private damage and false imprisonment, claiming the sum of $10,000 damages, upon the ground that the writ issued by the governor of Illinois was void in law. This writ against them was from the circuit court of Lee County—the county in which they were at that time—and they were held to bail in $10,000 each. They could get no one to go their security there, and they had to send to Missouri for bondsmen. They were placed in the custody of the sheriff of Lee County; but they also obtained a writ of habeas corpus, for the purpose of being discharged before Judge Caton.

These prompt proceedings against the kidnappers made them feel uneasy. It was not so easy a thing to run off with Joseph as they supposed it would be, and they began to feel badly. They became more cool and moderate in their tone and did not threaten so much as they had done.

Upon the first writ of habeas corpus Joseph was conveyed by Reynolds and Wilson towards Ottawa. They traveled about thirty-two miles, and stopped for the night at Pawpaw Grove. Here their abuse of Joseph was noticed by the landlord. Soon after Mr. Campbell, the sheriff of Lee County, arrived there; he had been sent by Mr. Cyrus H. Walker, the lawyer, to assist Joseph, and he slept by him. But Reynolds and Wilson did all that petty malice could suggest to annoy Joseph. There were certain men in the place who wanted to see him in the morning; but they would not permit them.

The news of Joseph's arrival had hastily circulated about the neighborhood, and very early in the morning the largest room in the hotel was filled with citizens. They were anxious to hear him preach, and requested him to address them. But Reynolds, who was opposed to this, entered the room and, pointing to Joseph, said: "I wish you to understand this man is my prisoner, and I want you to disperse; you must not gather round here in this way."

Just as he said this a Mr. David Town, an aged gentleman, who was lame and carried a large hickory walking stick, stepped towards Reynolds, and bringing his stick down upon the floor said: "You d—d infernal puke. We'll learn you to come here and interrupt gentlemen. Sit down there (pointing to a very low chair) and sit still. Don't open your head till General Smith gets through talking. If you never learned manners in Missouri, we'll teach you that gentlemen are not to be imposed upon by a nigger-driver. You can not kidnap men here, if you do in Missouri; and if you attempt it here, there's a committee in this grove that will sit on your case; and, sir, it is the highest tribunal in the United States, as from its decision there is no appeal."

This Mr. Town was at the head of a committee of citizens who had organized themselves to prevent settlers upon the public domain from being imposed upon by land speculators. In newly settled parts of the States the citizens have frequently organized such committees, and many a claim-jumper has been hung by them. Reynolds, probably, was aware of this. He, doubtless, understood what Mr. Town meant when he said that the committee there was the highest tribunal in the United States, and that from its decision there was no appeal. If they were to decide to hang or otherwise kill a man, to appeal to another court would be of no use. Reynolds quietly sat down and Joseph addressed the assembly for an hour and a half on the subject of marriage, it being the company's request that he should give them his views upon that subject. From that hour Joseph's freedom commenced.

On Sunday, June 25th, while at Pawpaw Grove, it was ascertained that Judge Caton was on a visit to New York, whereupon the company, consisting of Joseph, his three lawyers (Walker, Southwick and Patrick), Reynolds, Wilson, Stephen Markham and others, returned to Dixon, where they arrived about 4 o'clock p. m., when Joseph was again locked in a room and guarded through the night.

But deliverance was nigh. The good steamboat Amaranth had sped on her way down the Mississppi, carrying Joseph's friend and messenger, Brother William Clayton, towards Nauvoo. He landed on Sunday, and Hyrum was soon informed of all the particulars of Joseph's arrest. The Saints were in meeting, and Hyrum repaired to the stand and requested the brethren to meet him at the Masonic Hall in thirty minutes. They went there in such numbers that the hall could only hold a small portion of them. They adjourned to the adjoining green and Hyrum told them, as they were formed in a hollow square, all that Brother Clayton had informed him about Reynolds and Wilson's conduct in arresting Joseph. Hyrum called for volunteers to go up to Joseph's assistance and see that he had his rights. Upward of three hundred men volunteered, from whom such as were wanted were selected. Generals Wilson Law and Charles C. Rich started the same evening with a company of about one hundred and seventy-five men on horseback. William Law, one of Joseph's counselors, went with the company. Wilson Law declared that he would not stir a step unless he could have money to bear his expenses. President Brigham Young said the money should be forthcoming, although he did not know at the time where he could raise a dollar. In about two hours he had borrowed seven hundred dollars, and put the money in the hands of Hyrum Smith and Wilson Law. Besides this company which went by land, about seventy-five, with Elder John Taylor, sailed on the Maid of Iowa, a little steamboat of which Joseph was part owner and Brother Dan Jones was the captain. They went down the Mississippi to the mouth of the Illinois River, and then sailed up that river. This was for the purpose of examining the steamboats, thinking that Joseph might be a prisoner on one of them.

In the meantime, as the reader will remember, Joseph and the company with him had returned to Dixon because of Judge Caton's absence. The writ of habeas corpus was then returned, endorsed thereon, "Judge absent," and another writ of habeas corpus was issued by the master in chancery, and was worded at Colonel Markham's request, "Returnable before the nearest tribunal in the Fifth Judicial District, authorized to hear and determine writs of habeas corpus;" and the sheriff of Lee County served it upon Reynolds and Wilson immediately. Joseph and his friends and lawyers held a council and arranged to go before Judge Stephen A. Douglas, at Quincy, a distance of about two hundred and sixty miles. Joseph employed a person to convey them in a stage coach on their journey toward Quincy.

They started from Dixon on the 26th of June, traveled about forty miles, and stopped over night at a farm-house. The next day Joseph requested the privilege of riding on horseback; but Reynolds refused him. The sheriff and one of the lawyers persuaded him to let Joseph exchange seats with Cyrus H. Walker, and ride with the latter's son-in-law, Mr. Montgomery, in the buggy. Shortly afterwards they met two of the brethren from Nauvoo—Peter W. Conover and William S. Cutler. Joseph could not refrain from shedding tears at seeing these friends who had come to meet him. He said to Mr. Montgomery, "I am not going to Missouri this time. These are my boys."

While they were talking several other brethren rode up, being in advance of the main body, and at the same time, the company who started with Joseph from Dixon joined them. Joseph said to Reynolds, "Now, Reynolds, I can have the privilege of riding old 'Joe Duncan.'" This was one of Joseph's favorite horses which Brother William Clayton had ridden from Nauvoo. At the appearance of these brethren Reynolds and Wilson were seized with trembling. Brother Conover was acquainted with Wilson, and he asked him what the matter was, and whether he had the ague. Reynolds wanted to know whether Jim Flack was in the crowd. He was told that he was not then, but that he would see him tomorrow about this time. "Then," said Reynolds, "I am a dead man; for I know him of old." Conover told him not to be frightened, for he would not be hurt. But he still stood trembling like an aspen leaf. Brother Markham walked up to him and shook hands with him. Reynolds wanted to know if he met him as a friend. Brother Markham replied that they were friends except in law; that must have its course.

The company then moved on to Andover, where the sheriff of Lee County engaged lodgings for the night for the whole company. Joseph was locked up in a room with Captain Grover. In the evening Reynolds, Wilson and the landlord were overheard by Brother Markham consulting together about sending out to raise a company to take him by force, and run with him to the mouth of Rock River, on the Mississippi, as there was a company of men ready to kidnap him over the river. Brother Markham told the sheriff of Lee County what he had heard, and he immediately placed a guard, so that no one might pass in or out of the house during the night.

The next morning (June 28th) at 8 o'clock the company left Andover and traveled to a little grove at the head of Elleston Creek, where they stayed an hour to feed their animals. Reynolds said, "Now we will go from here to the mouth of Rock River and take steamboat to Quincy." Markham said, "No; for we are prepared to travel, and will go on land."

Wilson and Reynolds both spoke and said, "No, by G—d, we won't; we will never go by Nauvoo alive;" and both drew their pistols on Markham, who turned round to Sheriff Campbell, of Lee County, saying, "When these men took Joseph a prisoner, they took his arms from him, even to his pocket-knife. They are now prisoners of yours, and I demand of you to take their arms from them for that is according to law."

They refused to give them up, when the sheriff was told, "If you cannot take the arms from them, there are men enough here, and you can summon a posse to do it; for it is plain to be seen that they are dangerous men."

Reynolds and Wilson then reluctantly gave up their arms to the sheriff. The company then started, taking the middle road towards Nauvoo to within six miles of Monmouth, and stopped at a farm-house, having traveled about forty miles. Brother P. W. Conover laid down at the southwest corner of the building outside the house. In about ten minutes, Reynolds and Wilson came out of the house with the son of the landlord. They talked for some time, and came to the conclusion to take the carriage horses, go to Monmouth, raise a mob, and come to the farm-house in the night, seize Joseph, and convey him to the Mississippi River, and take him to Missouri, as they had a steamboat in readiness for that purpose at the mouth of Rock River, a tributary of the Mississippi.

After completing their plan of operations, Reynolds, Wilson and the boy separated and went towards the stable. Conover, who had heard the plot unobserved, immediately rose and came to Joseph and told him what he had just heard.

Joseph consulted with Cyrus H. Walker, the landlord and Sheriff Campbell, who took Reynolds and Wilson into his custody, and put them in the upper room, placing a guard of two men at the door, with orders not to allow any man to pass in or out of the house, except the landlord, who, as soon as he was told of the attempt to get his son into difficulty, put a stop to his proceedings at once.

"Thursday, (June) 29th," writes Joseph, "we continued our journey this morning, leaving Monmouth on our left, and Oquaka five miles on our right; and after passing Monmouth about three miles, William Empy, Gilbert Rolfe, James Flack and three others met us.

"I called Flack to my side and told him not to injure Reynolds, whatever provocation he had previously received from him, as I had pledged myself to protect him, and requested Flack to bury his feelings against Reynolds.

"Reynolds then got out of the stage, exchanged seats with one of the horsemen, and Flack and Reynolds rode by themselves about a quarter of a mile, when they again joined the company and rode together. The company continued to Henderson River, and took dinner at a farm-house, owned by Mr. Alanson Hagerman.

"While staying at this farm-house, General Wilson Law and William Law and about sixty men came up in several little squads. I walked out several rods to meet the company. William and Wilson Law jumped from their horses, and unitedly hugged and kissed me, when many tears were shed. * * *

"I consulted with my lawyers, and told them that Nauvoo was the nearest place where writs of habeas corpus could be heard and determined. They examined the subject and decided I was correct, when we turned our steps towards Nauvoo. The prospect of soon being in the midst of my friends again gladdened my heart. I sent a messenger to inform the citizens of Nauvoo of the glad change, and I requested Peter W. Conover to ride ahead to Mr. Michael Crane's on Honey Creek, and call for supper for 100 men.

"After dinner we traveled about fifteen miles. On arriving at Crane's I jumped out of the buggy, and instead of going through the gate or climbing the fence, walked up and jumped over the fence without touching it. Mr. Crane ran out and embraced me, and bade me welcome.

"A flock of turkeys and chickens were killed, and a substantial supper was provided for all, and the company feasted, sang and had a happy time that night. I showed my sides to Mr. Crane and the company, which still continued black and blue from the bruises I had received from the pistols of Reynolds and Wilson, while riding from Inlet Grove to Dixon eight days ago. * * *

"Friday, 30th. A messenger started from my company in the night, and arrived in Nauvoo early in the morning, saying that I and the company would be in the city about noon. Dr. Willard Richards and Wilford Woodruff arranged the seats in the court-room, preparatory to my arrival.

"At half past 10 o'clock the Nauvoo brass band and martial band started with Emma and my brother Hyrum to meet me; also a train of carriages containing a number of the principal inhabitants.

"At 8 o'clock a. m., the company with me again started; arrived at the Big Mound about half past 10, where the brethren decorated the bridles of their horses with the flowers of the prairie, and were met by a number of the citizens. We continued our journey, and at 11:25 a. m. I was gladdened, when oposite my brother Hyrum's farm, about one and a half miles east of the Temple, with seeing the train approaching towards us; and I directed Colonel Rockwood to place my life-guards in their appropriate position in the procession. I was in a buggy with Mr. Montgomery. Sheriff Reynolds and Wilson, with my three lawyers, Cyrus Walker, Shepherd G.

Patrick and Edward Southwick, were in the stage-coach with Lucien P. Sanger, the stage proprietor. Mr. Campbell, the sheriff of Lee County, and a company of about one hundred and forty were with me on horseback.

"I was a prisoner in the hands of Joseph H. Reynolds, the agent of Missouri, and Harmon T. Wilson, his assistant. They were prisoners in the hands of Sheriff Campbell, who had delivered the whole of us into the hands of Colonel Stephen Markham, guarded by my friends, so that none of us could escape.

"When the company from the city came up, I said I thought I would now ride a little easier; got out of the buggy, and after embracing Emma and my brother Hyrum, who wept tears of joy at my return, as did also most of the great company who surrounded us (it was a solemn, silent meeting), I mounted my favorite horse, 'Old Charley,' when the band struck up 'Hail Columbia,' and proceeded to march slowly towards the city, Emma riding by my side into town.

"The carriages having formed in line, the company with me followed next, and the citizens fell in the rear. As we approached the city, the scene continued to grow more interesting; the streets were generally lined on both sides with the brethren and sisters, whose countenances were joyous and full of satisfaction to see me once more safe.

"I was greeted with the cheers of the people and firing of guns and cannon. We were obliged to appoint a number of men to keep the streets open for the procession to pass, and arrived at my house about 1 o'clock, where my aged mother was at the door to embrace me, with tears of joy rolling down her cheeks, and my children clung around me with feelings of enthusiastic and enraptured pleasure. Little Fred exclaimed: "Pa, the Missourians won't take you away again, will they?' "

Joseph's friends, who had come with him from Dixon, beheld these scenes with astonishment. They had never seen such a sight. They had heard him called an impostor and false prophet, and that he was a tyrant, seeking to enslave his followers, and to get power and riches at their expense. But these exhibitions of love and devotedness, which they saw extended on all hands towards him, could not be the tribute which a people in free America brought and laid at the feet of one who had deceived and oppressed them. It was not fraud and violence, deception and wrong that called forth such manifestations as these. The people's best earthly friend, their affectionate father, guide and counselor, had been preserved from threatening and serious danger, and had been brought back to them again, and the pent-up feelings of their hearts broke forth with a power which almost surprised themselves, for they scarcely knew the depth of their own feelings and the strength of their attachment towards him. It required an extraordinary occasion like the present, when he whom they loved had just escaped a great peril, to make them fully conscious of how near he was to them.

The multitude seemed unwilling to disperse without hearing his voice. So he climbed the fence, and told them that he was out of the hands of the Missourians again, for which he thanked God; and he thanked them for all their kindness and love to him and blessed them in the name of the Lord. He then told them that he should address them at the grove, near the Temple, at 4 o'clock that afternoon.

Joseph took a course to heap coals of fire upon the heads of his enemies. At dinner there were about fifty of his friends present, and he placed Reynolds and Wilson at the head of the table, and they were served with the best that he had, by his wife, whom they had so cruelly refused to allow Joseph to see when they arrested him. If they were capable of feeling shame, they must have felt it then. Men with any feeling of honor or sensibility would have been overwhelmed with confusion and remorse in their position, and would never have rested until they made all the amends in their power. But a man might as well hope to bring wolves and tigers to a sense of wrong doing, or of shame, as to make these men have any feelings of compunction and sorrow for their outrageous and barbarous conduct. Their hearts were like stone, incapable of any humane and kindly feeling, and if they could have had Joseph in their power they would have treated him as badly as ever.

As soon as Joseph and his company reached Nauvoo, the municipal court came together, and Joseph told them that "the writ of the master of chancery at Dixon was made returnable to the nearest court having jurisdiction; and you are that court." Reynolds was required in legal form to return the writ, but he refused. Joseph then drew up a petition to the municipal court of the city of Nauvoo, in which he set forth ten reasons for believing that his arrest was illegal and in violation of law, and prayed that a writ of habeas corpus might be awarded, directed to Reynolds, commanding him to bring him (Joseph) without delay before the court that he might be dealt with according to law. A writ was issued commanding Reynolds to bring Joseph before the municipal court, and, in case he should refuse, the city marshal was authorized to arrest him. Reynolds returned the writ with the cause of Joseph's detention endorsed upon it. He refused to submit to the writ, but submitted to the attachment, and Joseph was delivered into the hands of the marshal of the city. Joseph requested the privilege from the court to fill his appointment, which was granted, and the court adjourned until the next morning. A large congregation assembled in the grove, and Joseph addressed it, giving among other things a recital of all that had occurred connected with his arrest. While he was speaking, Reynolds and Wilson started for Carthage. They threatened to raise the militia and to come again and take Joseph out of Nauvoo.

The next day, July 1st, the municipal court met, and proceeded to investigate the writ of habeas corpus. Hyrum Smith, Parley P. Pratt, Brigham Young, George W. Pitkin, Lyman Wight and Sidney Rigdon were examined as witnesses. Their testimony was conclusive. They described with great minuteness the scenes through which the Saints had passed and the cruel and inhuman persecutions they had endured from the hands of the authorities and people of Missouri. After listening to their testimony it would have been nothing less than consenting to the murder of an innocent man to have given Joseph up to Reynolds to be dragged by him into Missouri. While he was in that State his life had been sought, and it was only by the power of God that he had been enabled to escape. He was not guilty of the least offense against the law; but if his enemies could have carried him to Missouri, they would have murdered him.

After the testimony had been given, the lawyers employed by Joseph—Walker, Patrick, Southwick and Backman—each addressed the court. They exhorted the Saints "to stand for their right—stand or fall, sink or swim, live or die." An order was then made out for the discharge of Joseph from arrest and imprisonment—that he should be discharged for want of substance in the warrant upon which he was arrested, as well as upon the merits of the case. The lawyers named above made an affidavit to the effect that no violence or threats had been made use of towards Reynolds or Wilson either on the journey to or after their arrival at Nauvoo, and that they came to Nauvoo voluntarily and were in no danger of violence, etc. This was done to contradict the lies which Reynolds and Wilson had told to excite prejudice against Joseph and the Saints, and to make the public believe that their prisoner had been taken from their custody unfairly and with threats of violence. In fact, scarcely had this affidavit been signed when word came to Nauvoo from Carthage that these villianous men were stirring up the people to mobocracy, and were about to send a petition to Governor Ford for a posse to retake Joseph. Reynolds and Wilson had filed their affidavits that Colonel Markham had, with armed force, taken Joseph out of their hands. The citizens of Nauvoo immediately made out a petition to the governor, praying him not to issue any more writs against Joseph; also a remonstrance against the Carthage proceedings. A transcript of the trial before the municipal court, and various other documents throwing light upon Joseph's case, were delivered to his lawyers, with instructions to see Governor Ford immediately.

CHAPTER 20.

Nauvoo is visited by a number of friendly Indians.—Their interpreter speaks and Joseph answers.—The expeditions which had been out in search of the Prophet return to Nauvoo.—A comical incident.—Items of doctrine by the Prophet.—Revelation on plural marriage.—The political situation in Illinois.—Dissatisfaction in the ranks of the mobbers.—Plurality of wives.—Charge against Sidney Rigdon.—Instruction by the Prophet.

During Joseph's absence several Pottawattamie chiefs came to Nauvoo to see him. They had a "talk" with some of the brethren; they had but little to say, however, as they wanted to see the great Prophet. Joseph's fame had spread considerably among the surrounding Indian tribes. Many of them had heard of the great white Prophet, of his people, and the manner in which he and they had been treated by their fellow-citizens. Realizing their own lamentable conditions and remembering the wrongs they had suffered from the hands of the whites, they could sympathize with the Saints in their difficulties, and their feelings were kindly towards them.

On the 2nd of July, 1843, after his trial and discharge, Joseph, in company with several of the Twelve and other Elders, met with these Indian chiefs. After making particular inquiry of Joseph whether those present were his friends, the Indian orator spoke as follows:

"We, as a people, have long been distressed and oppressed. We have been driven from our lands many times. We have been wasted away by wars, until there are but few of us left. The white men have hated us and shed our blood, until it has appeared as though there would soon be no Indians left. We have talked with the Great Spirit, and the Great Spirit has talked with us. We have asked the Great Spirit to save us and let us live; and the Great Spirit has told us that he had raised up a great Prophet, chief and friend, who would do us great good and tell us what to do; and the Great Spirit has told us that you are the man (pointing to the Prophet Joseph). We have now come a great way to see you, and hear your words, and to have you tell us what to do. Our horses are poor from traveling, and we are hungry. We will now wait and hear your words."

The Spirit of God rested upon the Lamanites, especially the orator. Joseph was much affected, and shed tears. He arose and said unto them:

"I have heard your words. They are true. The Great Spirit has told you the truth. I am your friend and brother, and I wish to do you good. Your fathers were once a great people. They worshipped the Great Spirit. The Great Spirit has told you the truth. I am their friend; but they left the Great Spirit, and would not hear his words nor keep them. The Great Spirit left them, and they began to kill one another, and they have been poor and afflicted until now.

"The Great Spirit has given me a book, and told me that you would be blessed again. The Great Spirit will soon begin to talk with you and your children. This is the book which your fathers made. I wrote upon it (showing them the Book of Mormon). This tells what you will have to do. I now want you to begin to pray to the Great Spirit. I want you to make peace with one another, and do not kill any more Indians; it is not good. Do not kill white men; it is not good; but ask the Great Spirit for what you want, and it will not be long before the Great Spirit will bless you, and you will cultivate the earth and build good houses, like white men. We will give you something to eat and to take home with you."

When the Prophet's words were interpreted to the chiefs, they all said they were good.

At the close of the interview, Joseph had an ox killed for them, and they were furnished with some more horses, and they went home satisfied and contented.

On the same day (July 2nd) in the evening the Maid of Iowa reached Nauvoo from the trip up the Illinois River in search of Joseph. The brethren on board had kept a strict lookout for steamboats, and went up the Illinois River as far as Peru, where they met an express sent by General Charles C. Rich, by whom they were instructed to return to Quincy. Just as they left that city they were met by a man in a skiff, who informed them that Joseph had already reached Nauvoo. Relieved and overjoyed at this welcome news, they continued their course up the river, and after arriving at Nauvoo they walked up to Joseph's office, where they formed a hollow square, and sent in a deputation to Joseph. As soon as he had bid them welcome, he opened the window of his office and requested that no man would leave the ground until he had spoken to them. With his brother Hyrum he then went into the hollow square, shook hands with each man, blessing them and welcoming them home. He then took off his hat and related to them how he was brought home to the midst of his friends, and how he had regained his liberty. "I feel," said he, "by the Spirit of the Lord, that if I had fallen into your hands that you would either have brought me safe home, or that we should all have died in a heap together." After dusk he dismissed the company, blessing them in the name of the Lord.

Under the direction of Joseph, the Twelve Apostles called a special conference, July 3, 1843, to choose Elders to go into the different counties of Illinois to preach the gospel and disabuse the public mind with regard to his arrest. Eighty-two Elders were called to go on this mission. About noon on that same day, General Charles C. Rich, with a company of twenty-five men, returned from their trip in search of Joseph and his captors. They had made one of the most rapid and fatiguing marches that is on record, having traveled about five hundred miles in seven days with the same horses, and in very hot weather. Among the many incidents which occurred on the trip the following is related:

Early in the morning of the day previous to their reaching Nauvoo, Jesse B. Nichols went into the village of Galesburg, waked up a blacksmith and employed him to set a couple of horseshoes. It was Sunday, and the blacksmith, being a professor of religion, refused to do the work unless he could get double price for it. He thought it wrong to work on Sunday, probably; but if he could get well paid for a job he was willing to risk the sin. Nichols consented to give him what he asked, and he commenced work. Whilst he was setting the shoes the company passed through the village, exciting considerable curiosity among the inhabitants. As Brother Nichols was about paying the blacksmith for the work, a Presbyterian minister came up. He told the smith that he ought to charge a dollar a shoe. Said he: "These are Mormons; and you, who are a church member, have been shoeing this Mormon's horse on Sunday; and you ought to be brought before the church for doing it." Hearing this from his priest the blacksmith demanded two dollars for his work, instead of the one he agreed to take. Nichols handed him one dollar. The priest told him he ought not to take it —that Joseph (he called him Joe Smith) was an impostor, and ought to be hung. The smith, however, took the dollar, but demanded more; upon which Nichols kicked the priest on his seat of honor, mounted his horse, and left amid the loud cheers of a number of spectators.

In addressing the Saints at the Grove, in Nauvoo, July 9, 1843, Joseph remarked that all was well between him and the heavens, that he had no enmity against anyone; and as the prayer of Jesus, or his pattern, so prayed Joseph:

"Father, forgive me my trespasses as I forgive those who trespass against me."

Joseph writes:

"I freely forgive all men. If we would secure and cultivate the love of others, we must love others, even our enemies as well as friends. * * *

"The Saints can testify whether I am willing to lay down my life for my brethren. If it has been demonstrated that I have been willing to die for a 'Mormon,' I am bold to declare before Heaven that I am just as ready to die in defending the rights of a Presbyterian, a Baptist, or a good man of any other denomination; for the same principle which would trample upon the rights of the Latter-day Saints would trample upon the rights of the Roman Catholics, or of any other denomination, who may be unpopular and too weak to defend themselves. * * *

"The gospel requires baptism by immersion for the remission of sins, which is the meaning of the word in the original language—namely, to bury or immerse.

"But I further believe in the gift of the Holy Ghost by the laying on of hands, done in view of the remission of sins and getting of the Holy Ghost. Baptism by water is but half a baptism, and is good for nothing without the other half—that is, the baptism of the Holy Ghost."

Exciting events like these narrated above did not prevent Joseph from actively attending to the duties of his office. He had been accustomed to sail in a stormy sea, and difficulties did not appall him or discompose his mind, or prevent him from magnifying his calling. On the 12th of July, 1843, he dedicated that great and glorious revelation on celestial marriage, through which the greatest revolution in family organizations ever witnessed among men, of which we have any knowledge, has been effected among the Latter-day Saints. The Lord had revealed this principle to him before this date, but on that day William Clayton, in the presence of Hyrum Smith, wrote it as the words fell from the inspired lips of the Prophet, and as it is now recorded in the Doctrine and Covenants, Section 132. By this revelation a flood of light was thrown upon the principles of eternal life and exaltation, and the path which men must pursue to reach the presence of the Father and the Son was pointed out in great plainness. For centuries these great truths had been unknown to the inhabitants of the earth, now they were to be again brought to their knowledge. But who could receive it? In a public discourse which Joseph preached July 16, 1843, he mentioned the names of two or three Elders who were on the stand behind him, and said if he were to tell the things which God had revealed to him, they would openly seek his life in the streets of Nauvoo. Said he:

"The same spirit that crucified Jesus is in the breast of some who profess to be Saints in Nauvoo. I have secret enemies in the city, intermingling with the Saints. * * *

I slightly touched upon the subject of the everlasting covenant, showing that a man and his wife must enter into that covenant in the world, or he will have no claim on her in the next world. But on account of the unbelief of people I cannot reveal the fulness of these things at present."

Joseph knew how unprepared the Saints, and even many of the leading Elders, were to receive the important truths which the Lord had revealed. It was as much as a man's life was worth in those days to say that God required his servants to believe in and practice plural marriage. The idea was opposed to the traditions of ages, and the so-called Christian world professed to be shocked at the bare mention of the principle; yet the Elders who have preached this doctrine since Joseph's day have found that corrupt, impure and dishonest men have bitterly opposed the doctrine and sought to destroy those who believe and practice it; but the virtuous and the honest have recognized its worth and acknowledged that, if practiced according to the order revealed by the Lord, it would save the human family from many of the dreadful evils under which it now groans.

The Elders who were faithful had a testimony from God that Joseph was his servant. They knew that through him the Lord had revealed the gospel to them, and when he taught them the principle of celestial marriage, they sought unto the Lord, and he gave them a testimony that it was true. Such men were a great help to Joseph in those days, when many of those who occupied prominent positions in the Church were disposed to turn away and betray him.

It became more and more plain to Joseph and the Saints that they could not depend upon any political party for their rights as American citizens. Because of their union in times of elections they really held the balance of power in their hands, which exasperated their enemies. At the last election there had been two candidates for governor of the State. One of them—Joseph Duncan—had said that if the people would elect him, he would exterminate the "Mormons" and take away their charters. By these promises he hoped to secure the votes of all those who were opposed to the Latter-day Saints and wished them harm. The other candidate was Thomas Ford. He made no such threats; but in his speeches manifested a spirit to give every man his rights if he should be elected; hence, the Church universally voted for Mr. Ford, who was elected governor. But he was a politician, and the success of a politician as is known depends much upon his popularity.

Mr. Ford's sentiments appeared to be very much like those expressed by a candidate running for office in one of the Western States, who, after givnig his sentiments on the "Constitution," the "Monroe Doctrine," and other topics, said: "Gentlemen (and he put his hand on the region of his heart), these are my sentiments—the sentiments, gentlemen, of an honest man—aye, an honest politician—but, gentlemen and fellow-citizens, if they don't suit you, they can be altered."

When Reynolds was foiled in his scheme to carry Joseph into Missouri, he presented a petition to Governor Ford for a detachment of militia to be detailed to assist him in retaking Joseph. Ford, in the meantime, however, had received the remonstrance and affidavits of the people of Nauvoo and of Joseph's lawyers, which were all adverse to Reynold's request. The lawyers were influential men, and Walker was a member of the Whig party; Ford, himself, was a Democrat, and if he did not act with some degree of fairness, they might expose him and damage him politically. Therefore, he did not dare to grant Reynolds' petition without further investigation, but sent a messenger—a Mr. Braman—to Nauvoo, for a copy of all the testimony that was given in the case before the municipal court and affidavits concerning the expulsion of the Saints from Missouri. Upon his report the governor decided to take no action in response to Reynolds' demand.

About this time there was considerable excitement in the State on political matters, as an election was about to be held for members of Congress, and one party accused the other of tricks to secure votes. The demand of Missouri for Joseph's arrest was charged upon the Whig party by the Illinois State Register, a Democratic paper published at Springfield, Illinois, as a trick to prejudice the Saints against Governor Ford and the Democratic party, with the hope to secure their votes for the Whig candidate. On the other hand the Whigs accused Ford of having delayed his decision upon the demand of Missouri for the militia to arrest Joseph, until after the election, with the view to intimidate the Saints and compel them to vote the Democratic ticket. The election was held on the 7th of August, and the Democratic ticket was voted for by the people of Nauvoo generally, though Joseph, himself, according to his previous determination and in fulfillment of a pledge which he had voluntarily made to Cyrus H. Walker, who was the Whig candidate for Representative in Congress, voted the Whig ticket.

The State Register said in defending Governor Ford, that eleven days previous to the election he had decided not to call out the militia, and had so advised Governor Reynolds, of Missouri. On the 14th of August Governor Ford wrote to Governor Reynolds at some length, explaining his reasons for not doing so. He contended that the law of the State of Illinois had been fully exercised in the matter. A writ had been issued for Joseph's apprehension; he was apprehended, and was duly delivered by the officer of the State of Illinois to the agent of the State of Missouri appointed to receive him. No process, officer, or authority of Illinois had been resisted or interfered with, nor had there been any resistance either in the writ issued for the arrest of Joseph or in the person of the officer appointed to apprehend him. Everything had been done on his part which the law warranted him in doing; and he ended by saying, that "in no one aspect of the case can I consider the present an extreme emergency, warranting a call for the militia according to the provisions of the law in this State."

Thus once more the Missourians were foiled in their dastardly attempts to capture and kill the Prophet. In anticipation of Governor Ford ordering out the militia and retaking him, General Moses Wilson, a mobocrat, who made himself notorious in persecuting the Saints in Missouri, had crossed into Illinois with ten or twelve men, and had been waiting there for two or three weeks, with the hope of taking him back into Missouri. But they were not to have that pleasure. Governor Ford's decision spoiled the plan, and Wilson and his crew had their expense and trouble for nothing. Joseph was safe among his friends at Nauvoo.

Sunday, August 13, 1843, Joseph, in preaching on the death of Judge Higbee, remarked:

> "Four destroying angels holding power over the four quarters of the earth until the servants of God are sealed in their foreheads, which signifies sealing the blessing upon their heads, meaning the everlasting covenant, thereby making their calling and election sure. When a seal is put upon the father and mother, it secures their posterity, so that they cannot be lost, but will be saved by virtue of the covenant of their father and mother."

Utterly dissatisfied with the result of the court proceedings in Joseph's case, the mobocrats of Carthage and other places in Hancock County held a meeting at the courthouse, in Carthage, August 19, 1843, and appointed a committee to report resolutions for the action of the meeting. This committee asked to be discharged from further duties; but recommended that a committee of six be appointed to draft resolutions and make a report to an adjourned meeting, which was done, and the following named men were chosen: Walter Bagley, F. J. Bartlet, Stephen Owen, Stephen H. Tyler, Valentine Wilson and Joel Weston.

At the adjourned meeting, which was held September 6th, the committee presented a long preamble and series of resolutions, written in the most vindictive language, and filled with misrepresentations and falsehoods. In one of the resolutions they pledged themselves in the most determined manner to stand ready to aid in capturing Joseph, if the authorities of the State of Missouri should make another demand for him, and the governor of Illinois should issue another warrant for his arrest. They also pledged themselves, in the event of a collision, to stand by and support each other in every emergency up to the death. Committees were appointed in the several precincts of the county, who were to maintain a correspondence with a central committee at Carthage. And this was not all; they even recommended all the surrounding counties to appoint committees similar to those they had chosen, for the purpose of carrying on a crusade against Joseph and the Saints. The crowning act of infamy, however, was a resolution requesting the president of the meeting to communicate with the governor of Missouri and ask him to make another demand upon the authorities of Illinois for the body of Joseph; also, offering their services and pledging themselves to enforce the order for his arrest.

Reynolds, upon his return to Missouri, gave such an account of the manner in which he was defeated in his purpose to carry off Joseph as to convey the idea that he had been badly treated by Joseph and his friends. Some persons in that State talked about holding the whole State of Illinois responsible for the treatment of Reynolds and the release of Joseph; and they even threatened that if Illinois failed to deliver him up, there would be something serious between the two States. Missouri, they said, would have Joseph Smith for trial, or do all the constitution would allow to restrict the intercourse between the citizens of Illinois and Missouri. This, however, was all bombast. They knew they had not the shadow of an excuse for their attempts to arrest and drag him off to Missouri; this, and the knowledge of their own crimes, for which they deserved the severest punishment, caused them to feel weak, and it was the last open attempt they made to get Joseph into their hands.

Notwithstanding the unpleasant circumstances surrounding them, the Saints in Nauvoo continued their wonted avocations and made great improvements. The work on the Temple was pushed forward as fast as possible, and public and private buildings arose in rapid succession. The city could already boast of 15,000 inhabitants. The gospel was preached abroad with unabated zeal, and missionaries were sent to several foreign countries.

Under date of October 5, 1843, Joseph records the following: "I gave instructions to try those persons who were preaching, teaching, or practicing the doctrine of plurality of wives; for, according to the law, I hold the keys of this power in the last days; for there is never but one on earth at a time on whom the power and its keys are conferred; and I have constantly said no man shall have but one wife at a time, unless the Lord directs otherwise."

The course which Sidney Rigdon took in those days was not such as to please Joseph, who felt that he could not sustain such a man as his counselor; he wished to drop him, and told a public congregation of the Saints that he was a mass of corruption, and he would carry him no longer. It was reported that Rigdon had had interviews with Governor Thomas Carlin and others, with the view to conspire with them to have Joseph arrested and delivered into the hands of the Missourians. Rigdon denied this, and said that he had never exchanged words with any man living upon that subject. At the October Conference, 1843, his case was brought up before the people. Joseph told them that he was dissatisfied with him as a counselor, as he had not received any material benefit from his labors or counsels from the time of their escape from Missouri. Sidney Rigdon then spoke at considerable length in his own defense. He appealed to the sympathies of Joseph and his hearers, and not without effect upon the latter, for they were deeply moved. But Joseph's confidence was not restored by his remarks; he, judging from their past intercourse, could have no faith in his integrity and steadfastness. Joseph's brother, Hyrum, however, plead for mercy, as also did Elders Almon W. Babbitt and William Law, who was Joseph's second counselor, after which William Marks, who was then acting president of that Stake of Zion, moved that Sidney Rigdon be permitted to retain his station as counselor to Joseph. This motion was carried; but Joseph arose and said: "I have thrown him off my shoulders, and you have again put him on me. You may carry him, but I will not."

During that conference, which commenced on the 6th and closed on the 9th of October, Joseph gave some excellent instructions to the Saints. On the last day of conference he preached a funeral sermon on the death of General Adams and said, among other things:

"All men know that they must die. And it is important that we should understand the reasons and causes of our exposure to the vicissitudes of life and of death, and the designs and purposes of God in our coming into the world, our sufferings here, and our departure hence. Could you gaze into heaven five minutes, you would know more than you would by reading all that was ever written on the subject. * * *

"The organization of the spiritual and heavenly worlds, and of spiritual and heavenly beings, was agreeable to the most perfect order and harmony: their limits and bounds were fixed irrevocably, and voluntarily subscribed to in their heavenly estate by themselves, and were by our first parents subscribed to upon the earth. Hence the importance of embracing and subscribing to principles of eternal truth by all men upon the earth that expect eternal life. * * *

"Spirits can only be revealed in flaming fire or glory. Angels have advanced further, their light and glory being tabernacled; and hence they appear in bodily shape. The spirits of just men are made ministering servants to those who are sealed unto life eternal, and it is through them that the sealing power comes down. * * *

"Angels have advanced higher in knowledge and power than spirits. * * * The spirits of the just are exalted to a greater and more glorious work; hence they are blessed in their departure to the world of spirits. Enveloped in flaming fire, they are not far from us, and know and understand our thoughts, feelings and motions, and are often pained therewith.

"Flesh and blood cannot go there; but flesh and bones, quickened by the Spirit of God, can."

A short time after this conference Joseph delivered a discourse (October 15, 1843), in which he gave the people instructions respecting the policy they should pursue to be self-sustaining. He said:

"I think there are too many merchants among you. I would like to see more wool and raw materials instead of manufactured goods, and the money be brought here to pay the poor for manufacturing goods.

"Instead of going abroad to buy goods, lay your money out in the country, and buy grain, cattle, flax and wool, and work it up yourselves.

"I proclaim, in the name of the Lord God Almighty, that I will fellowship nothing in the Church but virtue, integrity and uprightness.

"We cannot build up a city on merchandise. I would not run after the merchants. I would sow a little flax, if I had but a garden spot, and make clothing of it."

In the same discourse the Prophet said:

"I prophesy in the name of the Lord God of Israel: Anguish and wrath and tribulation and the withdrawing of the Spirit of God from the earth await this generation, until they are visited with utter desolation. This generation is as corrupt as the generation of the Jews that crucified Christ; and if he were here today, and should preach the same doctrine he did then, they would put him to death. I defy all the world to destroy the work of God; and I prophesy they never will have power to kill me till my work is accomplished, and I am ready to die."

Speaking to the High Council in Nauvoo, November 25, 1843, Joseph, said:

"If a man commit adultery, he cannot receive the celestial kingdom of God. Even if he is saved in any kingdom, it cannot be the celestial kingdom."

CHAPTER 21.

The Nauvoo Mansion.—John C. Calhoun's doctrine in relation to States rights.—Joseph Smith's political views.—His statement in relation to having a right-hand Brutus causes uneasiness among the apostates in Nauvoo.—Joseph chosen as a candidate for the Presidency of the United States.—In Council with the Twelve he concludes to send an expedition to the Rocky Mountains.

Nauvoo, during these days, was visited by many strangers from different parts of the country, prompted by curiosity to see Joseph, the people and the wonderful city that was being built up on one of the most beautiful sites on the Upper Mississippi River. Joseph found it a heavy tax upon him to entertain so much company as he had, free of charge. From the foundation of the Church his house had been a home and resting place for thousands, and his family had often been obliged to do without food themselves after having fed all they had to visitors. He was a liberal, generous man; and had it been within his power it would have been a pleasure to him to have extended hospitality to all who entered his doors, but he could not do so. He therefore found himself reduced to the necessity of opening a hotel, which he called the "Nauvoo Mansion." It was a large and convenient building, and at that time it afforded better accommodations and was provided with a better table than any other place on the Upper Mississippi. The brick stable also, built for the use of the Mansion, had stalls for seventy-five horses, and room for storing the requisite forage for that number of animals. The Mansion was opened about the middle of November, 1843, but Joseph did not long retain charge of it himself. In the beginning of 1844, he rented it and the stables to Ebenezer Robinson, and only reserved three rooms for his own private use. He and his family were to board in the house.

In November, 1843, Joseph wrote letters to the various candidates for the Presidency of the United States, to inquire what their feelings were toward the Saints as a people, and what their course of action would be, in relation to the cruelty and oppression the Saints had suffered from the State of Missouri. The names of these candidates were John C. Calhoun, Lewis Cass, Richard M. Johnson, Henry Clay and Martin Van Buren.

The reply of John C. Calhoun was characteristic. He was the foremost or most prominent advocate in the nation of the doctrine of State rights, and answered briefly, that if he should be elected, he would strive to administer the government according to the Constitution and the laws of the Union; and that as they make no distinction between citizens of different religious creeds, he should make none. "But," he continued, "as you refer to the case of Missouri, candor compels me to repeat what I said to you at Washington, that, according to my views, the case does not come within the jurisdiction of the Federal Government, which is one of limited and specific powers."

Joseph wrote a reply to his letter, January 2, 1844, in which he so thoroughly exposed Calhoun's sophistry, that wherever it was read—and it was very widely circulated—men were struck by the contrast between the narrow, sectional doctrines which Calhoun advanced respecting the powers of the Federal Government, and the broad, patriotic and truly national views which Joseph advocated. Joseph was aroused, and the noble scorn which he felt for the politician's tricks is breathed in every line of his reply, which the following extracts will show:

"Your reply to my letter of last November, concerning your rule of action toward the Latter-day Saints, if elected President, is at hand; and that you and your friends of the same opinion relative to the matter in question may not be disappointed as to me or my mind upon so grave a subject, permit me, as a law-abiding man, as a well-wisher to the perpetuity of constitutional rights and liberty, and as a friend to the free worship of Almighty God by all, according to the dictates of every person's own conscience, to say I am surprised that a man or men in the highest stations of public life should have made up such a fragile 'view' of a case, than which there is not one on the face of the globe fraught with so much consequence to the happiness of men in this world or the world to come.

"To be sure, the first paragraph of your letter appears very complacent and fair on a white sheet of paper. And who, that is ambitious for greatness and power, would not have said the same thing? Your oath binds you to support the Constitution and laws: * * * But why—tell me why are all principal men held up for public stations so cautiously careful not to publish to the world that they will judge a righteous judgment, law or no law? for laws and opinions, like the vanes of steeples, change with the wind. * * *

"Your second paragraph leaves you naked before yourself, like a likeness in a mirror, when you say that, 'according to your view, the Federal Government is one of limited and specific powers,' and has no jurisdiction in the case of the 'Mormons.' So then a State can at any time expel any portion of her citizens with impunity, and, in the language of Mr. Van Buren, frosted over with your gracious 'views of the case,' though the cause is ever so just, government can do nothing for them, because it has no power.

"Go on then, Missouri, after another set of inhabitants (as the Latter-day Saints did) have entered some two or three hundred thousand dollars' worth of land, and made extensive improvements thereon. Go on, then, I say; banish the occupants or owners, or kill them, as the mobbers did many of the Latter-day Saints, and take their land and property as spoil and let the legislature, as in the case of the 'Mormons,' appropriate a couple of hundred thousand dollars to pay the mob for doing that job; for the renowned senator from South Carolina, Mr. J. C. Calhoun, says the powers of the Federal Government are so specific and limited that it has no jurisdiction of the case! O ye people who groan under the oppression of tyrants!—ye exiled Poles, who have felt the iron hand of Russian grasp!—ye poor and unfortunate among all nations! come to the asylum of the oppressed; buy ye lands of the General Government; pay in your money to the treasury to strengthen the army and navy; worship God according to the dictates of your own consciences; pay in your taxes to support the great heads of a glorious nation, but remember a 'sovereign State' is so much more powerful than the United States, the parent government, that it can exile you at pleasure, mob you wih impunity, confiscate your lands and property, have the legislature sanction it—yea, even murder you as an edict of an emperor, and it does no wrong; for the noble senator of South Carolina says the power of the Federal Government is so limited and specific, that it has no jurisdiction of the case! What think ye of imperium in imperio? * * *

"If the general government has no power to reinstate expelled citizens to their rights, there is a monstrous hypocrite fed and fostered from the hard earnings of the people! A real 'bull beggar' upheld by sycophants. * * * Yet remember, if the Latter-day Saints are not restored to all their rights and paid for all their losses, according to the known rules of justice and judgment, reciprocation and common honesty among men, that God will come out of his hiding-place, and vex this nation with a sore vexation: yea, the consuming wrath of an offended God shall smoke through the nation with as much distress and woe as independence has blazed through with pleasure and delight. * * *

"Congress has power to protect the nation against foreign invasion and internal broil; and whenever that body passes an act to maintain right with any power, or to restore right to any portion of her citizens, it is the supreme law of the land; and should a State refuse submission, that State is guilty of insurrection or rebellion, and the President has as much power to repel it as Washington had to march against the 'whiskey boys at Pittsburg,' or General Jackson had to send an armed force to suppress the rebellion of South Carolina."

In relation to the doctrine of States rights, Joseph once remarked:

"The States rights doctrines are what feed mobs. They are a dead carcass—a stink, and they shall ascend up as a stink offering in the nose of the Almighty.

"They shall be oppressed as they have oppressed us, not by 'Mormons,' but by others in power. They shall drink a drink offering, the bitterest dreg, not from the 'Mormons,' but from a meaner source than themselves. God shall curse them."

According to Calhoun's theory the Federal Government had no right to interfere with the affairs of any particular State, much less hold any single State responsible for its conduct towards individuals or societies. It is evident that such a doctrine destroys the very basis of the Federal constitution; it opens wide the door for disunion, strife and civil war. If these views were correct, the constitution was not worth the paper on which it was written; the Union so much lauded was only a league of independent States, and each State would retain its entire sovereignty and would have the right to put its own construction upon the laws of Congress, and to defy the parent government. Of course, having these views, Calhoun thought the Federal Government had no right to redress the wrongs endured by the Saints in Missouri. The latter State, according to his doctrine, was independent, and must be left to its own sense of justice and right, to correct any abuses to which the residents within its borders might be subjected. If the governor and the officials of the State chose to trample upon law and lead mobs to murder, plunder and exterminate a large body of its citizens, as they did in the case of the Latter-day Saints, the Federal Government could not interfere; in fact, there was no remedy for these evils!

Joseph's views were the very opposite of Calhoun's. His doctrine was that the constitution of the United States formed a government, not a league. Each State had expressly parted with so much of its power as to constitute, jointly with the other States, a single nation. The States severally did not retain their entire sovereignty; they had surrendered to the Federal Government many of the essential parts of sovereignty. The allegiance of the citizens of each State was due, in the first instance, to the government of the United States; they bore the proud and general title of American citizens, and if any of them were deprived of their rights by the mal-administration of the law, or by mob violence, in the State where they resided, they had the right of appeal to the general government; and if their cause was just, the parent government had the necessary authority to reinstate them in their rights, even if it required the whole power of the United States to do so.

Had his views prevailed with the chief executive and Congress, when he appealed to them after the Saints were expelled from Missouri, the late terrible civil war might have been averted; for the supremacy of the law and of the general government would have been vindicated, and Missouri been taught a lesson that would have had a salutary effect on every States rights man in the Union. But the weakness, vacillation and dishonesty of men in high places prevented this, and the consequence was a frightful war, during which the blood of thousands upon thousands was shed.

Several of the Elders wrote appeals to their native States, setting forth in strong language the wrongs and oppressions which had been inflicted upon them by the State of Missouri. Joseph, in November, 1843, wrote a stirring appeal to the people—the Green Mountain Boys—of his native State. After giving a sketch of the grievances which the Saints had endured, he said:

"Now, therefore, having failed in every attempt to obtain satisfaction at the tribunals where all men seek for it, according to the rules of right, I am compelled to appeal to the honor and patriotism of my native State—to the clemency and valor of 'Green Mountain Boys;' for throughout the various periods of the world, whenever a nation, kingdom, state, family, or individual has received an insult or an injury from a superior force (unless satisfaction was made), it has been the custom to call in the aid of friends to assist in obtaining redress. * * *

"With all these facts before me, and a pure desire to ameliorate the condition of the poor and unfortunate among men, and if possible, to entice all men from evil to good; and with a firm reliance that God will reward the just, I have been stimulated to call upon my native State for a 'union of all honest men,' and to appeal to the valor of the 'Green Mountain Boys' by all honorable methods and means to assist me in obtaining justice from Missouri, not only for the property she has stolen and confiscated, the murders she has committed among my friends, and for our expulsion from the State, but also to humble and chastise or abase her for the disgrace she has brought upon constitutional liberty, until she atones for her sins. * * *

"I appeal to the 'Green Mountain Boys' of my native State to rise in the majesty of virtuous freemen, and by all honorable means help to bring Missuori to the bar of justice. If there is one whisper from the spirit of an Ethan Allen, or a gleam from the shade of a General Stark, let it mingle with our sense of honor and fire our bosoms for the cause of suffering innocence, for the reputation of our disgraced country, and for the glory of God; and may all the earth bear me witness, if Missouri—blood-stained Missouri—escapes the due merit of her crimes—the vengeance she so justly deserves—that Vermont is a hypocrite, a coward, and this nation the hot-bed of political demagogues!

"I make this appeal to the sons of liberty of my native State for help to frustrate the wicked designs of sinful men. I make it to hush the violence of mobs. I make it to cope with the unhallowed influence of wicked men in high places. I make it to resent the insult and injury made to an innocent, unoffending people, by a lawless, ruffian State. I make it to obtain justice where law is put at defiance. I make it to wipe off the stain of blood from our nation's escutcheon. I make it to show presidents, governors and rulers prudence. I make it to fill honorable men with discretion. I make it to teach senators wisdom. I make it to teach judges justice. I make it to point clergymen to the path of virtue. And I make it to turn the hearts of this nation to the truth and realities of pure and undefiled religion, that they may escape the perdition of ungodly men; and Jesus Christ, the Son of God, is my great Counselor."

December 29, 1843, forty men, who had been selected to act as city policemen, met with the city council of Nauvoo and were sworn into office. At that meeting Joseph said, among other things:

"I am exposed to far greater danger from traitors among ourselves than from enemies without, although my life has been sought for many years by civil and military authorities, priests and people of Missouri; and if I can escape from the ungrateful treachery of assassins, I can live AS CAESAR MIGHT HAVE LIVED, WERE IT NOT FOR A RIGHT-HAND BRUTUS. I have had pretended friends betray me. All the enemies upon the face of the earth may roar and exert all their power to bring about my death, but they can accomplish nothing, unless some who are among us, and enjoy our society, have been with us in our councils, participated in our confidence, taken us by the hand, called us brother, saluted us with a kiss, join with our enemies, turn our virtues into faults, and, by falsehood and deceit, stir up their wrath and indignation against us, and bring their united vengeance upon our heads. All the hue and cry of the chief priests and elders against the Savior could not bring down the wrath of the Jewish nation upon his head, and thereby cause the crucifixion of the Son of God, until Judas said unto them, 'Whomsoever I shall kiss, he is the man; hold him fast.' Judas was one of the twelve Apostles, even their treasurer, and dipped with their Master in the dish, and through his treachery the crucifixion was brought about; and WE HAVE A JUDAS IN OUR MIDST."

These remarks of Joseph soon came to the ears of William Law, Joseph's second counselor, who told Brother Hyrum Smith that the police had been sworn by Joseph secretly to put him out of the way within three months. In consequence of this a special meeting of the city council was called, at which William Law was present. He stated under oath that he had been informed that some of the policemen had had another oath administered to them besides the one which they took publicly. One of them had said there was a Judas in Joseph's cabinet—one who stood next to him, and he must be taken care of and not allowed to go into the world; he was not only a traitor like Judas, but an assassin like Brutus.

After William Law had made his statement, Joseph explained why he made the remarks he did. Orrin P. Rockwell had brought the intelligence that his enemies were determined to get him into their power and take his life, hoping thereby to accomplish the overthrow of the work. In order to do this they had secured the services of some of his most confidential friends, whom he did not suspect, to deliver him into their hands. They did not design to try him, but hang him, or take his life anyhow. If they could not get him into their power without, they had a man in Nauvoo who would fix him out.

The whole day was spent in examining witnesses and investigating the subject. William Law cross-examined the witnesses until he appeared satisfied. The result showed that his fears were imaginary; and, before leaving, he shook hands with Joseph and declared he did not believe a word of the story, but that he would stand by Joseph unto death, and called the whole council and the police to witness the declaration.

But the matter did not end here. Joseph's statement about having a "right-hand Brutus" caused a general flutter among prominent men who were weak in the faith or were plotting in secret against him. William Marks, president of the Nauvoo Stake, was the next to become alarmed; and as William Law's fears had returned, they both pretended to be afraid of their lives.

A man by the name of Leonard Soby, who afterwards became an apostate, had told Marks that his life was threatened. It was in the winter and the weather was severely cold. Some person had built a fire on the bank of the Mississippi River nearly opposite William Mark's house. No sooner did he see the fire than he became frightened, and concluded he must be the Brutus to whom Joseph had referred! Tortured by these fears, he lay awake all night. His fertile imagination suggested to him that there was an object in building the fire at that place, and that object must be to give the police light so that they could see to kill him! In the morning he called on Joseph, reported the circumstances, expressed his fears, and requested that another session of the city council be called.

The council came together January 5, 1844, only two days after they had met before. The policemen were sworn, and all the witnesses that could be obtained were cross-examined, and with the same result as before. There was not the least ground for the alarm of these men, and it was afterwards seen that their panic did not have its origin in the acts of the police, but in the corruption and hyprocrisy of their own hearts. Every man who was at these councils and had the Spirit of the Lord, could see that these men had lost that spirit and were in the dark. They were filled with fear, even to distrust the Prophet and servant of God, and their best and nearest friends. Brother George A. Smith, who was then a member of the council in the capacity of alderman, said he could sleep with a fire near his house, even if there was some of the police warming themselves by it, and he believed any honest man could do the same.

"What can be the matter with these men?" writes Joseph. "Is it that the wicked flee when no man pursueth, that hit pigeons always flutter, that drowning men catch at straws, or that Presidents Law and Marks are absolutely traitors to the Church, that my remarks should produce such an excitement in their minds? Can it be possible that the traitor whom Porter Rockwell reports to me as being in correspondence with my Missouri enemies is one of my quorum? The people in the town were astonished—'Is it possible that Brother Law or Brother Marks is a traitor, and would deliver Brother Joseph into the hands of his enemies in Missouri? If not, what can be the meaning of all this?' 'The righteous are as bold as a lion.'"

Before the council adjourned, Wilson Law, a brother of William Law, and filled with the same spirit as his brother, said:

"I am Joseph's friend; he has no better friend in the world; I am ready to lay down my life for him."

At the time he uttered these words his heart was full of the spirit of apostasy, and he was in league with Joseph's enemies, ready to aid them in their schemes. Besides these two brothers there were many others, such as Dr. Robert D. Foster and Francis M. and Chauncey L. Higbee, who, although they had a standing in the Church, were bitter apostates and sought secretly to encourage the enemies of the Church to bring new troubles upon Joseph. The cause of their apostasy was partly their own wickedness and transgressions, and partly their opposition to the doctrines taught by the Prophet, who, in speaking on this subject in a sermon, delivered by him at the southeast corner of the Temple in Nauvoo, January 21, 1844, says:

"I have tried for a number of years to get the mind of the Saints prepared to receive the things of God; but we frequently see some of them, after suffering all they have for the work of God, will fly to pieces like glass as soon as anything comes that is contrary to their traditions: they cannot stand the fire at all. How many will be able to abide a celestial law, and go through and receive their exaltation, I am unable to say, as many are called, but few are chosen."

Speaking of Saviors on Mount Zion, in the same discourse, he remarked:

"The Bible says: 'I will send you Elijah the Prophet before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord; and he shall turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, and the hearts of the children to the fathers, lest I come and smite the earth with a curse.'

"Now, the word turn here should be translated bind or seal. * * * The keys are to be delivered, the spirit of Elijah is to come, the gospel to be established, the Saints of God gathered, Zion built up, and the Saints to come up as saviors on Mount Zion.

"But how are they to become saviors on Mount Zion? By building their temples, erecting their baptismal fonts, and going forth and receiving all the ordinances, baptisms, confirmations, washings, anointings, ordinations and sealing powers upon their heads, in behalf of all their progenitors who are dead, and redeem them that they may come forth in the first resurrection and be exalted to thrones of glory with them; and herein is the chain that binds the hearts of the fathers to the children, and the children to the fathers, which fulfils the mission of Elijah. * * * The Saints have not too much time to save and redeem their dead, and gather together their living relatives, that they may be saved also, before the earth will be smitten, and the consumption decreed falls upon the world."

January 29, 1844, a political meeting was held in Nauvoo, to take into consideration the proper course for the Latter-day Saints to pursue at the ensuing election for President of the United States. There were two candidates for the office before the people at the time, namely, Martin Van Buren and Henry Clay, neither of whom had shown himself worthy of their vote. Joseph writes:

"It is morally impossible for this people in justice to themselves, to vote for the re-election of President Van Buren; a man who criminally neglected his duties as chief magistrate in the cold and unblushing manner which he did, when appealed to for aid in the Missouri difficulties. His heartless reply burns like a firebrand in the breast of every true friend of liberty: 'Your cause is just, but I can do nothing for you.' As to Mr. Clay, his sentiments and cool contempt of the people's rights are manifested in his reply. 'You had better go to Oregon for redress.' which would prohibit any true lover of our constitutional privileges from supporting him at the ballot-box."

It was therefore moved by Willard Richards, and voted unanimously:

"That we will have an independent electoral ticket, and that Joseph Smith be a candidate for the next Presidency; and that we use all honorable means in our power to secure his election."

Immediately after the nomination, Joseph proceeded to get out a pamphlet, entitled, "Views on the Powers and Policy of the Government of the United States," in which he, in a clear and able manner, defined his position in regard to the burning political questions of the day. Had his measures been accepted and carried out by the American nation, the bloody war which followed would not have taken place, and hundreds of thousands of lives would have been saved, for there would have been no civil war, and those horrible evils which accompanied it would have been unknown. But he plead in vain.

The Twelve Apostles and the leading Elders were sent throughout the United States to electioneer, make stump speeches, advocate the religion of Jesus, the purity of elections and to call upon the people to stand by the law and to put down mobocracy. They were also instructed to tell the people that there had been Whig and Democratic Presidents long enough; it was a President of the United States that was now wanted. Joseph said he would not electioneer for himself; but the Elders would have to do it for him. There was oratory enough in the Church to carry him into the presidential chair.

At a political meeting, which was held shortly after his nomination as a candidate for the presidency (February 8, 1844), Joseph explained his reasons for permitting his name to be used in this connection. He said:

"I would not have suffered my name to have been used by my friends on anywise as President of the United States, or candidate for that office, if I and my friends could have had the privilege of enjoying our religious and civil rights as American citizens, even those rights which the Constitution guarantees unto all her citizens alike. But this as a people we have been denied from the beginning. Persecution has rolled upon our heads from time to time, from portions of the United States, like peals of thunder, because of our religion; and no portion of the government as yet has stepped forward for our relief. And under view of these things, I feel it to be my right and privilege to obtain what influence and power I can, lawfully, in the United States, for the protection of injured innocence; and if I lose my life in a good cause, I am willing to be sacrificed on the altar of virtue, righteousness and truth, in maintaining the laws and Constitution of the United States, if need be, for the general good of mankind."

In the meantime the enemies of the Church were not idle. February 17, 1844, a meeting was held in Carthage for the purpose of devising ways and means by which the Saints might be expelled from the State. Among other resolutions which they passed was one appointing the succeeding 9th of March as a day of fasting and prayer, and the pious of all orders were requested "to pray to Almighty God that he would speedily bring the false prophet, Joseph Smith, to deep repentance, or that he would make a public example of him and his leading accomplices."

Had these wicked men confined themselves to prayer alone to accomplish their evil desires, the soil of Illinois would not have been stained by the innocent blood which now cries to the Lord from its bosom, and their own souls would not welter under the dreadful condemnation which now rests upon them.

Joseph's mind often dwelt on the future and the removal of the Saints to the Rocky Mountains, where he had predicted they should become a great people. Thus, on the 20th of February, we find him in council with the Twelve Apostles about sending out a delegation to explore California and Oregon, and hunt out a good location, where the Saints could remove to after the Temple should be completed; "and," as Joseph writes, "where we can build a city in a day, and get up into the mountains, where the devil cannot dig us out, and live in a healthy climate, where we can live as old as we have a mind to."

Respecting this exploring expedition, Joseph said at a subsequent meeting of the Twelve (February 23rd):

"Send twenty-five men: let them preach the gospel wherever they go. Let that man go that can raise $500, a good horse and mule, a double-barreled gun, one barrel rifle, and the other smooth bore, a saddle and bridle, a pair of revolving pistols, bowie-knife, and a good sabre. Appoint a leader, and let him beat up for volunteers. I want every man that goes to be a king and a priest. When he gets on the mountains he may want to talk with his God; when with the savage nations have power to govern, etc. If we don't get volunteers, wait till after the election."

The following brethren volunteered at once to go on that expedition: George D. Watt, Samuel Bent, Joseph A. Kelting, David Fullmer, James Emmett, Daniel Spencer, Samuel Rolfe, Daniel Avery and Samuel W. Richards.

About a meeting held in Nauvoo February 25, 1844, Joseph writes:

"I gave some important instructions, and prophesied that within five years we should be out of the power of our old enemies, whether they were apostates or of the world; and told the brethren to record it, that when it comes to pass, they need not say they had forgotten the saying."

His words were most literally fulfilled. Before five years had elapsed mobs had raged so violently in Nauvoo that that city had to be abandoned by the Saints, who departed into the wilderness and finally found an asylum in the Rocky Mountains of the great West, where they could dwell in peace and safety, undisturbed by their bitter and merciless foes.

March 7, 1844, a general meeting called by the Prophet was held within the walls of the Temple for the purpose of advancing the progress of that building. Joseph, Patriarch Hyrum Smith, President Brigham Young and seven others of the Twelve, the Temple committee and about eight thousand Saints were present. In alluding to correspondence which had been sent to the newspapers east, in which it had been stated that the Temple could not be built on account of it costing so much, Joseph said:

"Who does not know that we can put the roof on the building this season, if we had a mind to? By turning all the means from the Nauvoo House and doubling our diligence we can do it."

In the course of his remarks he made allusion to the objections which were being made to the admission of Texas into the Union on account of slavery. He thought it the very reason why she should be received. Said he:

"The South holds the balance of power. By annexing Texas I can do away with this evil. As soon as Texas was annexed, I would liberate the slaves in two or three States, indemnifying their owners, and send the negroes to Texas, and from Texas to Mexico, where all colors are alike. And if that was not sufficient, I would call upon Canada and annex it."

Sunday, March 10, 1844, Joseph preached on the subject of Elias, Elijah and Messiah, and said:

"The spirit of Elias is to prepare the way for a greater revelation of God, which is the Priesthood of Elias, or the Priesthood that Aaron was ordained unto. And when God sends a man into the world to prepare for a greater work, holding the keys of the power of Elias, it was called the doctrine of Elias, even from the early ages of the world. * * *

"Now for Elijah. The spirit, power and calling of Elijah is, that ye have power to hold the keys of the revelations, ordinances, oracles, powers and endowments of the fullness of the Melchizedec Priesthood and of the kingdom of God on the earth; and to receive, obtain and perform all the ordinances belonging to the kingdom of God, even unto the turning of the hearts of the fathers unto the children and the hearts of the children unto the fathers, even those who are in heaven. * * *

"This is the spirit of Elijah, that we redeem our dead, and connect ourselves with our fathers which are in heaven, and seal up our dead to come forth in the first resurrection; and here we want the power of Elijah to seal those who dwell on earth to those who dwell in heaven. This is the power of Elijah and the keys of the kingdom of Jehovah. * * * Then what you seal on earth, by the keys of Elijah, is sealed in heaven, and this is the power of Elijah, and this is the difference between the spirit and power of Elias and Elijah; for while the spirit of Elias is a forerunner, the power of Elijah is sufficient to make our calling and election sure. * * *

"This spirit of Elijah was manifest in the days of the Apostles, in delivering certain ones to the buffeting of Satan, that they might be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus. They were sealed by the spirit of Elijah unto the damnation of hell until the day of the Lord, or revelation of Jesus Christ. * * *

"A murderer that sheds innocent blood cannot have forgiveness. David sought repentance at the hand of God carefully, with tears, for the murder of Uriah; but he could only get it through hell; he got a promise that his soul should not be left in hell.

"Although David was a king, he never did obtain the spirit and power of Elijah and the fullness of the Priesthood; and the Priesthood that he received, and the throne and kingdom of David, is to be taken from him and given to another by the name of David in the last days, raised up out of his lineage. * * *

"This is the case with murderers. They could not be baptized for the remission of sins, for they had shed innocent blood.

"The spirit of Elias is first, Elijah second, and Messiah last. Elias is a forerunner to prepare the way, and the spirit and power of Elijah is to come after, holding the keys of power, building the Temple to the capstone, placing the seals of the Melchizdek Priesthood upon the house of Israel, and making all things ready; then Messiah comes to his Temple, which is last of all. Messiah is above the spirit and power of Elijah, for he made the world, and was that spiritual rock unto Moses in the wilderness. Elijah was to come and prepare the way and build up the kingdom before the coming of the great day of the Lord, although the spirit of Elias might begin it."

At that time a man by the name of Miller, the founder of the sect known as Millerites, was preaching to the people in the Eastern States that the coming of the Savior was nigh at hand. He was very confident that he knew all about it, so much so, that he asserted he would come on a certain day, and those who believed his doctrine prepared robes so as to be ready to meet him, and arranged all their affairs in expectation of the event. There was considerable excitement in many places about these teachings, and considerable alarm prevailed upon the subject. Some years ago a gentleman with whom a leading Elder in the Church became acquainted, told an amusing instance which illustrates this feeling. He had sailed from the East on a whaling voyage, and previous to starting, the captain and all hands had heard considerable about Miller's predictions about the destruction of the world. The vessel doubled Cape Horn, and after cruising some time in the Pacific, they took their course for Monterey, California, with the intention of obtaining supplies. Day after day they plowed their way eastward, and it was noticed that the captain became very uneasy and had men constantly at the mast-head looking out for land. Columbus, in pushing his way westward, could not have been more anxious to discover land than this skipper appeared to be. But no land appeared in sight. Finally, the captain confidentially imparted to this gentleman the terrible information that they had long ago passed over the place where Monterey had been, and he had no doubt Father Miller's predictions had been fulfilled and the continent of America with the rest of the world had been destroyed at the time stated. How he imagined this stupendous event had occurred without their being aware of it, he did not explain. He still continued, however, to sail eastward, and eventually, to his great relief, reached Monterey. The continent had not moved; but it was the skipper that had got out of his reckoning.

Prophecies concerning the second coming of the Savior.—An interesting conference held in Nauvoo.—The Land of Zion.—William and Wilson Law, Robert D. Foster and others excommunicated from the Church.—They organize a church of their own.—The first and only number of the Nauvoo Expositor issued.—The city council declares the paper a nuisance and orders it destroyed.—Joseph and others arrested on a charge of riot.—A remarkable dream.—Nauvoo threatened by the mob.—Martial law declared in Nauvoo.—The Prophet's last public discourse.

Joseph, in one of his sermons, which he delivered on the 10th of March, 1844, made a brief allusion to the coming of the Savior. He said:

"I have asked of the Lord concerning his coming; and while asking the Lord, he gave me a sign and said, 'In the days of Noah I set a bow in the heavens as a sign and token that in any year that the bow should be seen the Lord would not come, but there should be seed time and harvest during that year; but whenever you see the bow withdrawn, it shall be a token that there shall be famine, pestilence and great distress among the nations, and that the coming of the Messiah is not far distant."

"But I will take the responsibility upon myself to prophesy in the name of the Lord, that Christ will not come this year, as Father Miller has prophesied, for we have seen the bow; and I also prophesy, in the name of the Lord, that Christ will not come in forty years; and if God ever spoke by my mouth he will not come in that length of time. Brethren, when you go home, write this down, that it may be remembered."

When Joseph's name was published as a candidate for the President of the United States, it gave occasion for numerous comments in the public journals of the country, and some of them were quite favorable. They contrasted Joseph's frank avowal of his principles with the shuffling policy and course of the other prominent candidates.

The other two classes were afraid to lose their popularity and consequently sought for the approbation of both the priests and the people.

But the enmity of all these people united together could not be compared with the hatred which apostates in those days felt against Joseph and the work of God. And besides the open and avowed apostates, there were men remaining in the Church who sympathized with them, and who, at heart, were traitors to Joseph and the work of God. Prominent among these were Sidney Rigdon, William Marks and Austin A. Cowles, and many others of lesser note.

They were all alarmed at the idea of Joseph being a candidate for the Presidency. While they ridiculed and abused him, they were very uneasy at the prominence which he was gaining in the nation. If he did not become President of the United States at that election, he was but a young man, only thirty-eight years of age, and he might succeed at some future time in reaching the presidential chair. The thought was a bitter one to them.

In speaking at the regular Sabbath meeting in Nauvoo, March 24, 1844, Joseph said:

"I have been informed by two gentlemen that a conspiracy is got up in this place for the purpose of taking the life of President Joseph Smith, his family, and all the Smith family, and the heads of the Church. One of the gentlemen will give his name to the public, and the other wishes it to be hid for the present; they will both testify to it on oath, and make an affidavit upon it. The names of the persons revealed at the head of the conspiracy are Chauncey L. Higbee, Dr. Robert D. Foster, Mr. Joseph H. Jackson, William and Wilson Law. * * *

"In relation to the power over the minds of mankind which I hold, I would say: It is in consequence of the power of truth in the doctrines which I have been an instrument in the hands of God of presenting unto them, and not because of any compulsion on my part. I wish to ask if ever I got any of it unfairly?—if I have not reproved you in the gate? I ask, Did I ever exercise any compulsion over any man? Did I not give him the liberty of disbelieving any doctrine I have preached, if he saw fit? Why do not my enemies strike a blow at the doctrine? They cannot do it; it is truth, and I defy all men to upset it."

On the 5th of April, 1844, a conference, which was continued for five days, was commenced in Nauvoo. In his opening remarks to the conference, Joseph said:

"Those who feel desirous of sowing the seeds of discord will be disappointed on this occasion. It is our purpose to build up and establish the principles of righteousness, and not to break down and destroy. The Great Jehovah has ever been with me, and the wisdom of God will direct me in the seventh hour. I feel in closer communion and better standing with God than ever I felt before in my life, and I am glad of this opportunity to appear in your midst."

On Sunday, the 7th, he delivered a very interesting discourse before about twenty thousand people, it being the funeral sermon of Elder King Follett, and although he spoke three hours and a half, it was followed with the greatest interest by all present from beginning to end. The principles which he laid before the people on that occasion were grand and exalting. His first object, he said, was to find out the character of the only wise and true God, and what kind of a being he is. In this connection he made some very striking and truthful remarks about taking men's lives because they were false teachers. He said:

"If any man is authorized to take away my life because he thinks and says I am a false teacher, then, upon the same principle, we should be justified in taking away the life of every false teacher; and where would be the end of blood? and who would not be the sufferer?

"But meddle not with any man for his religion; for all governments ought to permit every man to enjoy his religion unmolested. No man is authorized to take away life in consequence of difference of religion, which all laws and governments ought to tolerate and protect, right or wrong. Every man has a natural, and, in our country, a constitutional right to be a false prophet as well as a true prophet. If I show, verily, that I have the truth of God, and show that ninety-nine out of every hundred professing to be religious ministers are false teachers, having no authority, while they pretend to hold the keys of God's kingdom on earth, and was to kill them because they are false teachers, it would deluge the whole world with blood."

Respecting God and the kind of being he is, he said:

"God himself was once as we are now, and is an exalted man, and sits enthroned in yonder heavens! That is the great secret. If the vail was rent today, and the Great God who holds this world in its orbit, and who upholds all worlds, and all things by his power, was to make himself visible—I say, if you were to see him today, you would see him like a man in form—like yourselves in all the person, image and every form as a man; for Adam was created in the very fashion, image and likeness of God, and received instruction from and walked, talked and conversed with him, as one man talks and communes with another. * * *

"Here, then, is eternal life—to know the only wise and true God; and you have got to learn how to be Gods yourselves, and to be kings and priests to God, the same as all Gods have done before you—namely, by going from one small degree to another, and from a small capacity to a great one; from grace to grace, from exaltation to exaltation, until you attain to the resurrection of the dead, and are able to dwell in everlasting burnings, and to sit in glory, as do those who sit enthroned in everlasting power. And I want you to know that God in the last days, while certain individuals are proclaiming his name, is not trifling with you or me.

"All sins, and all blasphemies, and every transgression, except one, that man can be guilty of, may be forgiven, and there is a salvation for all men, either in this world or in the world to come, who have not committed the unpardonable sin, there being a provision either in this world or the world of the spirits. Hence, God hath made a provision that every spirit in the eternal world can be ferreted out and saved, unless he has committed that unpardonable sin, which cannot be remitted to him either in this world or the world of spirits. God has wrought out a salvation for all men, unless they have committed a certain sin; and every man who has a friend in the eternal world can save him, unless he has been guilty of the unpardonable sin.

"A man cannot commit the unpardonable sin after the dissolution of the body, and there is a way possible for escape. Knowledge saves a man; and in the world of spirits no man can be exalted but by knowledge. So long as a man will not give heed to the commandments, he must abide without salvation. If a man has knowledge he can be saved; although, if he has committed great sins, he will be punished for them. But when he consents to obey the gospel, whether here or in the world of spirits, he is saved.

"A man is his own tormentor and his own condemner. Hence the saying, 'They shall go into the lake that burns with fire and brimstone.' The torment of disappointment in the mind of man is as exquisite as a lake burning with fire and brimstone. I say so is the torment of man. * * *

"When a man begins to be an enemy to this work, he hunts me, he seeks to kill me, and never ceases to thirst for my blood. He gets the spirit of the devil—the same spirit that they had who crucified the Lord of Life—the same spirit that sins against the Holy Ghost. You cannot save such persons; you cannot bring them to repentance; they make open war like the devil, and awful is the consequence."

The next day (April 8th) Joseph felt his lungs so exhausted that he could not continue the subject as he had expected. But he had received a revelation, he said, of which he would lay before them the first principle. Said he:

"You know there has been great discussion in relation to Zion—where it is, and where the gathering of the dispensation is, and which I am now going to tell you. The Prophets have spoken and written upon it; but I will make a proclamation that will cover a broader ground. The whole of America is Zion itself, from north to south, and is described by the Prophets, who declare that it is the Zion where the mountain of the Lord should be, and that it should be in the center of the land. When Elders shall take up and examine the old prophecies in the Bible, they will see it."

In the same discourse he also said:

"As soon as the Temple and baptismal font are prepared, we calculate to give the Elders of Israel their washings and anointings, and attend to those last and more impressive ordinances, without which we cannot obtain celestial thrones. * * There must, however, be a place built expressly for that purpose, and for men to be baptized for their dead. It must be built in this the central place; for every man who wishes to save his father, mother, brothers, sisters and friends must go through all the ordinances for each one of them separately, the same as for himself, from baptism to ordination, washings and anointings, and receive all the keys and powers of the Priesthood, the same as for himself."

Joseph's declaration, that all North and South America is the land of Zion, caused the conference to rejoice exceedingly, and the Elders in their remarks dwelt upon its importance. The occasion was a most interesting one, the weather was beautiful, and in alluding to these days, Joseph said: "They have been the greatest, best and most glorious five consecutive days ever enjoyed by this generation."

The electioneering campaign was entered upon with spirit by the Elders. At the conference a unanimous vote was passed by the immense assembly for Joseph to be the candidate for the next President. The Twelve Apostles arranged appointments for general conferences to be held at various places throughout the different States, so that the entire United States might be canvassed by the Elders, religiously and politically. No band of men ever went out in the United States on an electioneering campaign so united and so thoroughly in earnest as did these Elders. They knew Joseph was a servant and Prophet of God, and that if the nation would elect him, and then be guided by him, it would be saved from dishonor and destruction, and be elevated to an unequalled pitch of greatness and power.

In a council meeting held in Nauvoo, April 18, 1844, and attended by six of the Twelve and 26 other Elders, William and Wilson Law and Robert D. Foster were excommunicated from the Church for unchristian conduct. These and a band of other apostates labored incessantly to bring about the murder of Joseph. On one occasion during the month of April, August Spencer, one of this band, was arrested by the city marshal for assaulting his brother Orson Spencer in the latter's own house. This soon brought out three of his companions—Chauncy L. Higbee and Charles and Robert D. Foster—who immediately proceeded to Joseph's office. Joseph was standing on the steps of his office, when Charles Foster drew a pistol and pointed it towards him, threatening to shoot him. The police were directed to arrest him, and, while trying to do so, his brother and Higbee interfered, resisted the officers, and they were arrested also. They swore dreadful oaths, and Higbee and Charles Foster said they would shoot Joseph, and consider themselves the favored of God for the privilege of ridding the world of such a tyrant as Joseph was.

William Law, who had been Joseph's counselor, had sat with him in council and been on terms of intimate friendship with him, had transgressed and lost the Spirit of God, and now he was the foremost of Joseph's enemies. They rallied around him, and he became the center of all the apostate and disaffected spirits in that region. On Sunday, April 28th, he and the other apostates and their dupes held a meeting at the house of his brother, Wilson Law. Several affidavits which they had taken against Joseph and others were read, and a number of them were appointed as a committee to visit the different families in the city, to see who would join the new church, for they had organized a new one, having decided, as many apostates had done before them, that "the doctrine is right, but Joseph is a fallen prophet." William Law was appointed by them to fill the place of Joseph, and he chose Austin Cowles and Wilson Law as his counselors. Chauncey L. Higbee and Robert D. Foster, the two men who conducted themselves so disgracefully on the occasion mentioned above, were selected to be two of the twelve apostles.

May 6, 1844, Joseph was arrested by John D. Parker on a warrant issued by the clerk of the circuit court at Carthage, on the complaint of Francis M. Higbee, who had laid his damages at $5,000, but for what the writ did not state. Joseph petitioned and obtained a writ of habeas corpus from the municipal court, before which tribunal he had a hearing on the 8th. The testimony given went to show that Higbee was a wicked, malicious, adulterous and bad man, who, together with his confederates, had instituted these proceedings against Joseph through malice, private pique and corruption. Hence the court decided that "Joseph Smith be discharged and Francis M. Higbee pay the costs of suit."

In speaking from the stand in Nauvoo, May 12, 1844, the Prophet said:

"My enemies say that I have been a true prophet. Why, I had rather be a fallen true prophet than a false prophet. When a man goes about prophesying, and commands men to obey his teachings, he must either be a true or false prophet. False prophets always arise to oppose the true prophets, and they will prophesy so very near the truth that they will deceive almost the very chosen ones. * * *

"In relation to the kingdom of God, the devil always sets up his kingdom at the very same time in opposition to God. Every man who has a calling to minister to the inhabitants of the world was ordained to that very purpose in the grand council of heaven before this world was. I suppose I was ordained to this very office in that grand council.

"There are many mansions for those who obey a celestial law, and there are other mansions for those who come short of the law—every man in his own order. * * * There will be one hundred and forty-four thousand saviors on Mount Zion, and with them an innumerable host that no man can number. Oh! I beseech you to go forward, go forward, and make your calling and your election sure; and if any man preach any other gospel than that which I have preached, he shall be cursed; and some of you who now hear me shall see it, and know that I testify the truth concerning them. * * *

"In order for you to receive your children to yourself, you must have a promise—some ordinance, some blessing, in order to ascend above principalities, or else it may be an angel. They must rise just as they died; we can there hail our lovely infants with the same glory—the same loveliness in the celestial glory, where they all enjoy alike. They differ in stature, in size; the same glorious spirit gives them the likeness of glory and bloom; the old man with his silvery hairs will glory in bloom and beauty. No man can describe it to you—no man can write it.

"When did I ever teach anything wrong from this stand? When was I ever confounded? I want to triumph in Israel before I depart hence and am no more seen. I never told you I was perfect: but there is no error in the revelations which I have taught. Must I, then, be thrown away as a thing of naught?"

May 17, 1844, a State convention was held in Nauvoo, when it was moved, seconded and carried by acclamation "that Joseph Smith, of Illinois, be the choice of this convention for President of the United States." Sidney Rigdon was also chosen as a candidate for the Vice-Presidency.

Language conveys but a very weak idea, even when used in the most powerful manner, of the condition of affairs which existed in Nauvoo during the days of which we write. Joseph's enemies howled around him like a pack of wolves, indulging in the most murderous threats, forming all kinds of plots and moving earth and hell to compass his destruction. The leaders of this crusade were the Laws, the Higbees, the Fosters and many other apostates of lesser note, who consorted with them. William Law having been one of the First Presidency, was of course familiar with the doctrine which God had made known in the revelation on celestial marriage. The knowledge he had of this doctrine he communicated to others, and so determined was he to destroy Joseph, that he went before the grand jury at Carthage and swore that Joseph had been guilty of polygamy and adultery; and upon his testimony that Joseph had told him that he practiced polygamy, or, as it was then called, "spiritual wife-ism," the Prophet was indicted.

When Joseph heard that the grand jury had indicted him, he started on horseback, with a few friends, for Carthage, on the 27th of May, thinking it best to meet his enemies before the circuit court, and have the indictments investigated. The company was swelled by several brethren joining the party while on the road, and by the addition of others on Joseph's arrival in Carthage.

Charles A. Foster, brother of Robert D. Foster, a man who had never belonged to the Church, overtook the party outside of Carthage, and rode with Joseph into that place. Joseph had considerable conversation with him, and Foster was almost persuaded that he was influenced to some extent by false reports.

After the arrival of the party at Carthage, Foster took Joseph into a private room and told him in a friendly manner, that there was a conspiracy against his life. No doubt, from all that transpired at that time and subsequently, it was the intention of these apostates and mobbers then to have taken Joseph's life. But situated as he was, having so many friends with him, they could not accomplish their evil design.

Joseph's lawyers used all reasonable exertions to bring forward his trial; but the prosecuting party were not ready. Joseph was anxious for his trial, but the case was deferred till next term, and he was left to give bail to the sheriff at his option. The sheriff told him he might return, and he would call upon him and take bail at his convenience.

Abundant evidence was in the hands of Joseph to prove the wickedness and utter corruption of these men. They were guilty of every crime of which they accused the Saints. Both William and Wilson Law were guilty of adultery. Wilson Law, who had acted as major-general in the Nauvoo Legion, was cashiered for dishonesty and robbing the government. Several affidavits had also been sworn to by females, accusing the Higbees and Fosters of seduction and adultery. Joseph H. Jackson, who never belonged to the Church, but who was a confederate with them in their schemes, had been, according to his own acknowledgment, a murderer and robber. To these crimes, he added that of perjury, in swearing falsely against Joseph. Yet, with all these evidences against him and his party, William Law professed to be very holy, said Joseph was a fallen Prophet, and that he (Law) was to take his place.

The Saints who were faithful and lived in close communion with the Lord, knew for themselves that Joseph was innocent and pure; and the ravings and threatenings of these apostates had no effect upon them. The only ones influenced by them were those who were neglectful of the duties of their religion and were on the road to apostasy.

Joseph told the people repeatedly that he asked no odds of apostates; but he could go to the cross and lay down his life for the Saints. He did not want his brethren and sisters, however, to forsake him and the truth. He wanted their friendship, and he constantly exhorted them to be humble and patient and to render good for evil. In a public meeting in Nauvoo, May 26th, he declared that he was the same man and just as innocent as he was fourteen years ago. He said he had labored with those apostates himself until he was out of all manner of patience, and then he had sent his brother Hyrum to them. He had sent word to the Laws that if they had any case against him, he would go before the Church and confess. On the same occasion, in speaking to the Saints, he said:

"As I grow older, my heart grows tenderer for you. I am at all times willing to give up everything that is wrong, for I wish this people to have a virtuous leader. I have set your minds at liberty by letting you know the things of Jesus Christ. When I shrink not from your defense, will you throw me away for a new man who slanders you? I love you for your reception of me. Have I asked you for your money? No; you know better."

About the 10th of May a prospectus of a paper called the Nauvoo Expositor was issued and distributed among the people by these apostates. The prospectus stated the intentions of the publishers to be among other things:

"To advocate the unconditional repeal of the city charter of Nauvoo, to restrain and correct the abuses of the unit power, to ward off the rod which is held over the devoted heads of the citizens of Nauvoo and the surrounding country, to advocate unmitigated disobedience to political revelation." etc.

Its signers were no others than the two Laws, the two Higbees and the two Fosters, every one of them vile, adulterous, base men, who had been guilty of the most outrageous wickedness.

The Expositor made its appearance June 7, 1844, and was filled with the foulest abuse of Joseph and the Saints. It denounced Joseph for teaching the doctrine of plurality of wives, and also for the revelation which he had received on the subject of celestial marriage, and its writers were fully intent on raising persecution and mobs against him and the Saints, and, if possible, to destroy him. Almost every line breathed a murderous spirit, and it was very clear that if such a sheet were suffered to remain in existence, mobs would be raised, and the acts of violence and bloodshed which had been endured in Missouri would be repeated, and the Saints be driven from their homes. Anything that disturbs the peace of a community is properly called a nuisance. This sheet was, to all intents and purposes, a nuisance. Its object was to destroy the peace and happiness of the people, and to withdraw from the city all its chartered rights and privileges.

On the 10th of June the city council took this paper into consideration, and after a lengthy investigation, the council declared it a nuisance, and passed a resolution to that effect. By this resolution the mayor was instructed to cause the printing establishment and paper to be removed without delay in such a manner as he should direct. He accordingly issued his orders to the city marshal, who proceeded to the Expositor office and removed the press, type, printing paper and fixtures into the street, and destroyed them. This proceeding on the part of the city council caused considerable excitement among the apostates. It spoiled their game, and they were very angry and threatened vengeance.

On the following day Joseph issued a proclamation, as mayor of the city of Nauvoo, setting forth the course taken by the Expositor, and stating that it had been destroyed as a nuisance, according to the provision of the charter of the city. He called upon the municipal officers and the citiens to use all honorable and lawful means in their power to maintain the public peace and the common quiet of the city; and to be vigilant and wise in preventing the promulgation of false statements, libels, slanders or any other malicious calumny or design that might be circulated to ferment the passions of men. He also recommended them to be ready to suppress the gathering of mobs, and to repel, by gentle means and noble exertions, every foul scheme designed to disgrace and dishonor the city or State.

After the destruction of the press, runners were sent out in all directions by the apostates to endeavor to raise a mob, and those who were opposed to the Saints and on the side of the mob, began to sell their houses and property in Nauvoo, thinking that trouble would be sure to come, and that the Saints would be destroyed. Francis M. Higbee said, and all those associated with him felt the same, that if the city authorities should lay their hands upon the press of the Expositor, to break it, they might date their downfall from the very hour. He thought that within ten days, there would not be a single "Mormon" in Nauvoo.

He immediately went to Carthage and made a complaint before Thomas Morrison, the justice of the peace at that place, swearing to an affidavit that Joseph and seventeen other brethren had committed a riot, alleging that, with force and violence, they had broken into the Nauvoo Expositor printing office and unlawfully burned and destroyed the printing press, type and other property of the same. June 12th, Morrison sent a constable with a writ to Nauvoo, to arrest Joseph. The writ stated that the officer was to bring the persons charged in it "before me (Morrison) or some other justice of the peace, to answer the premises, and further to be dealt with according to law."

When he had finished reading the writ, Joseph referred the officer who bore it, to that clause, and said: "We are ready to go to trial before Esquire Johnson or any justice in Nauvoo." At this, the constable was very angry, and he swore he would carry them to Carthage before Morrison, who had issued the writ. Joseph asked him if he intended to break the law; and called upon all present to witness that he then offered himself to go immediately before the nearest justice of the peace. His brother Hyrum offered to do the same. Joseph felt so indignant at the officer's abuse, that he was determined to take out a habeas corpus, and petitioned the municipal court of the city of Nauvoo, to grant him the benefit of that writ, and, on the afternoon of the same day, he appeared before that court, and the case was examined. It was "decided by the court that Joseph Smith had acted under proper authority in destroying the establishment of the Nauvoo Expositor, on the 10th inst.; that his orders were executed in an orderly and judicious manner, without noise or tumult; that this was a malicious prosecution on the part of Francis M. Higbee; and that said Higbee pay costs of suit, and that Joseph Smith be honorably discharged from the accusations of the writ, and go hence without delay."

The other brethren were arrested the next day (13th), and they also petitioned for and obtained a writ of habeas corpus, and were tried before the municipal court on that day; and, after witnesses had been examined as in the case of Joseph, they were all honorably discharged from the accusations and arrests. The court decided that Higbee pay the costs of suits.

Acting under the advice of Judge Thomas, the circuit judge, they afterwards (June 17th) submitted once more to arrest, on the charge of riot, in destroying the Nauvoo Expositor press. They were tried before Daniel H. Wells, who at that time was not a member of the Church, but was a justice of the peace, and after a long and close examination they were again acquitted.

About this time Joseph had a remarkable dream which he related as follows:

"I thought I was riding out in my carriage, and my guardian angel was along with me. We went past the Temple, and had not gone much further before we espied two large snakes so fast locked together that neither of them had any power. I inquired of my guide what I was to understand by that. He answered, 'Those snakes represent Dr. Foster and Chauncey L. Higbee. They are your enemies, and desire to destroy you; but you see they are so fast locked together that they have no power of themselves to hurt you.' I then thought I was riding up Mulholland Street, but my guardian angel was not along with me. On arriving at the prairie, I was overtaken and seized by William and Wilson Law and others, saying—'Ah! ah! we have got you at last! we will secure you and put you in a safe place!' and, without any ceremony, dragged me out of my carriage, tied my hands behind me, and threw me into a deep, dry pit, where I remained in a perfectly helpless condition, and they went away. While struggling to get out, I heard Wilson Law screaming for help hard by. I managed to unloose myself so as to make a spring, when I caught hold of some grass which grew at the edge of the pit.

"I looked out of the pit and saw Wilson Law at a little distance attacked by ferocious wild beasts, and heard him cry out, 'Oh! Brother Joseph, come and save me!' I replied—'I cannot, for you have put me into this deep pit.' On looking out another way, I saw William Law with outstretched tongue, blue in the face, and the green poison forced out of his mouth, caused by the coiling of a large snake around his body. It had also grabbed him by the arm, a little above the elbow, ready to devour him. He cried out in the intensity of his agony, 'Oh! Brother Joseph, Brother Joseph, come and same me, or I die!" I also replied to him, 'I cannot, William; I would willingly, but you have tied me and put me in this pit, and I am powerless to help you or to liberate myself.' In a short time after, my guide came and said aloud, 'Joseph! what are you doing there?' I replied, 'My enemies fell upon me, bound me, and threw me in.' He then took me by the hand, drew me out of the pit, set me free, and we went away rejoicing."

The recital of this dream made a deep impression upon the Saints, who easily could understand its meaning so far as William and Wilson Law were concerned, for they had placed it beyond Joseph's power to help them by their wicked conduct; but the people could not understand all of the dream. It was not clear to their minds what was meant by those two men dragging Joseph out of his carriage and binding his hands fast, and casting him into a pit. Although he spoke frequently about the Twelve bearing off the kingdom and taking additional responsibility, speaking as though he was about to leave them, still, no one supposed that he was going to die; and this dream was not generally interpreted in that manner. As we proceed with our history, however, the reader will see how truthfully it was fulfilled.

Every effort was made by the enemies of the Saints, after the Expositor was declared a nuisance, to fan the flames of persecution and to form combinations to drive and exterminate them. In some parts, they threatened to drive or kill every Latter-day Saint who did not deny the faith and cease to believe that Joseph was a Prophet of God. They also threatened to use violence to those who were not Latter-day Saints, if they did not take up arms to help them to drive the Church out of the country. Those whom they could not persuade to join them in their schemes, they tried to frighten by their threats. They told men of this class that they must join them, or leave the country, or give their arms to them. One of the leading spirits of this work of persecution was one Levi Williams, a colonel of militia, and a Baptist preacher. With all his pretentions to religion, he was a great villain. Robbery, house-burning, murder and every other act of violence, he thought perfectly right, so long as the Latter-day Saints were the victims. To accomplish the destruction of the Saints, he was willing to adopt any measure, however wicked or violent. There were many others who were like him. They acted upon the idea that it was no disgrace to shoot a "Mormon;" that he had no rights which they should respect. Where they had the power, they were very violent and abusive; but they were always careful to have the largest number on their side when they made an attack on any person or settlement. They visited individuals and those who lived in small settlements, because they were not afraid of meeting equal numbers to resist them. As soon as the help which they expected from Missouri should arrive, they said, they would march against Joseph and the city of Nauvoo, capture him and destroy the city. They expected about fifteen hundred or two thousand men from Missouri to help them.

Joseph was well informed respecting the movements of the mob, and he counseled the brethren to keep cool and prepare their arms for the defense of the city. He had guards posted on all the roads leading out of the city; and within the city he had other guards stationed in the streets and on the river bank. This he did in his capacity as lieutenant-general of the Nauvoo Legion. He also issued orders to have all the powder and lead in the city secured, and that all the arms should be brought into use, and those which were not used by their owners be put into the hands of those who could use them. Under the circumstances which then existed, these preparations were necessary, for the mob were threatening to march upon the city, and they could only be kept from doing so by the knowledge that the Saints were prepared to give them a warm reception. Joseph, in company with several officers of the Legion, visited the prairie east of Nauvoo and arranged his plans for the defense of the city, and selected the most suitable points at which to meet the mob. He also made arrangements to secure provisions for the city, giving his agent instructions to pledge his farms for that purpose. On the 18th of June, he proclaimed the city of Nauvoo under martial law, and issued the following proclamation:

"To the Marshal of the city of Nauvoo:

"From the newspapers around us, and the current reports as brought in from the surrounding country, I have good reason to fear that a mob is organizing to come upon this city, and plunder and destroy said city, as well as murder the citizens; and by virtue of the authority vested in me as mayor, and to preserve the city and lives of the citizens, I do hereby declare the said city, within the limits of its corporation, under martial law. The officers, therefore, of the Nauvoo Legion, the police, as well as all others, will strictly see that no persons or property pass in or out of the city without due orders.

JOSEPH SMITH, MAYOR."

About 2 o'clock on the same day (June 18th) the Legion was drawn up in the street close to Joseph's house. Judge William W. Phelps read the Warsaw Signal extra of June 17th, wherein all the "old citizens" were called upon to assist the mob in exterminating the leaders of the Saints and driving away the people. Joseph stood in full uniform as lieutenant-general on the top of a frame building and spoke to the Legion and the assembled multitude for about an hour and a half. The following synopsis was compiled by Geo. A. Smith from the verbal reports of a number of the brethren who were present and heard the Prophet on the occasion:

"It is thought by some that our enemies would be satisfied with my destruction; but I tell you that as soon as they have shed my blood, they will thirst for the blood of every man in whose heart dwells a single spark of the spirit of the fulness of the gospel. The opposition of these men is moved by the spirit of the adversary of all righteousness. It is not only to destroy me, but every man and woman who dares believe the doctrines that God hath inspired me to teach to this generation.

"We have never violated the laws of our country. We have every right to live under their protection, and are entitled to all the privileges guaranteed by our State and national constitution. We have turned the barren, bleak prairies and swamps of this State into beautiful towns, farms and cities, by our industry; and the men who seek our destruction and cry thief, treason, riot, etc., are those who themselves violate the laws, steal and plunder from their neighbors, and seek to destroy the innocent, heralding forth lies to screen themselves from the just punisbment of their crimes by bringing destruction upon this innocent people. I call God, angels and all men to witness that we are innocent of the charges which are heralded forth through the public prints against us by our enemies; and while they assemble together in unlawful mobs to take away our rights and destroy our lives, they think to shield themselves under the refuge of lies which they have thus wickedly fabricated.

"We have forwarded a particular account of all our doings to the governor. We are ready to obey his commands, and we expect that protection at his hands which we know to be our just due.

"We have taken the counsel of Judge Thomas, and bave been tried before a civil magistrate on the charge of riot—not that the law required it, but because the judge advised it as a precautionary measure to allay all possible pretext for excitement. We were legally acquitted by Esquire Wells, who is a good judge of law. Had we been before the circuit, the supreme, or any other court of law in the State, or nation, we should have been acquitted, for we have broken no law.

"Constable Bettisworth came here with a writ requiring us to go before Mr. Morrison, 'or some other justice of the peace of the country,' to answer to the charge of riot. We acknowledged ourselves his prisoners, and were ready to go before any magistrate in any precinct in this part of the country, or anywhere else where our lives could be protected from the mob who have published the resolutions for our extermination which you have heard read. This is a privilege the law guarantees to us, and which the writ itself allows. He broke the law, and refused us this privilege, declaring that we should go before Morrison in Carthage, and no one else, when he knew that a numerous mob was collected there who are publicly pledged to destroy our lives.

"It was under these circumstances that we availed ourselves of the legal right of the ancient, high and constitutional privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, and were brought before the municipal court of this city, and discharged from the illegal detention under which we were held by Constable Bettisworth. All mob-men, priests, thieves and bogus-makers, apostates and adulterers, who combine to destroy this people, now raise the hue-and-cry throughout the State that we resist the law, in order to raise a pretext for calling together thousands more of infuriated mob-men to murder, destroy, plunder, and ravish the innocent.

"We are American citizens. We live upon a soil for the liberties of which our fathers perilled their lives and spilt their blood upon the battle-field. Those rights so dearly purchased shall not be disgracefully trodden under foot by lawless marauders without at least a noble effort on our part to sustain our liberties.

"Will you all stand by me to the death, and sustain, at the peril of your lives, the laws of our country, and the liberties and privileges which our fathers have transmitted unto us, sealed with their sacred blood? ('Aye,' shouted thousands.) He then said—'It is well. If you had not done it, I would have gone out there (pointing to the west) and would have raised up a mightier people.'

"I call upon all men, from Maine to the Rocky Mountains, and from Mexico to British America, whose hearts thrill with horror to behold the rights of freemen trampled under foot, to come to the deliverance of this people from the hand of oppression, cruelty, anarchy and misrule to which they have long been made subject. Come, all ye lovers of liberty, break the oppressor's rod, loose the iron grasp of mobocracy, and bring to condign punishment all those who trample under foot the principles of our glorious Constitution and the people's rights. (Drawing his sword, and presenting it to heaven, he said)—'I call God and angels to witness that I have unsheathed my sword with a firm and unalterable determination that this people shall have their legal rights, and be protected from mob violence, or my blood shall be spilt upon the ground like water, and my body consigned to the silent tomb. While I live, I will never tamely submit to the dominion of cursed mobocracy. I would welcome death rather than submit to this oppression; and it would be sweet, oh, sweet to rest in the grave, rather than submit to this oppression, agitation, annoyance, confusion and alarm upon alarm any longer.

"I call upon all friends of truth and liberty to come to our assistance; and may the thunders of the Almighty, and the forked lightnings of heaven and pestilence, and war and bloodshed come down on those ungodly men who seek to destroy my life and the lives of this innocent people.

"I do not regard my own life. I am ready to be offered a sacrifice for this people; for what can our enemies do? Only kill the body, and their power is then at an end. Stand firm, my friends; never flinch. Do not seek to save your lives, for he that is afraid to die for the truth will lose eternal life. Hold out to the end, and we shall be resurrected, and become like Gods, and reign in celestial kingdoms, principalities and eternal dominions, while this cursed mob will sink to hell, the portion of all those who shed innocent blood.

"God has tried you. You are a good people; therefore I love you with all my heart. Greater love hath no man than that he should lay down his life for his friends. You have stood by me in the hour of trouble, and I am willing to sacrifice my life for your preservation.

"May the Lord God of Israel bless you forever and ever. I say it in the name of Jesus of Nazareth, and in the authority of the Holy Priesthood, which he hath conferred upon me."

Joseph was a noble looking, angelic man at ordinary times, but on that occasion there was a grand dignity in his appearance that was very impressive. He spoke with remarkable power, even for him, whose discourses were always powerful and heart-piercing, and the vast assemblage listened to his words with breathless attention. He had them fully under his influence, and had he expressed a wish to meet the mob and fight it, they would have gone with joy. It is no wonder the Prophet's words sank deep into their hearts; it is no wonder that to their sight he appeared exceedingly grand, or that his words impressed them so deeply, for it was the last time, in the flesh, that they were to listen to the music of his voice, or to feel the spell of his inspiration and genius. It was his last public discourse! Little did his hearers think that in a few short days that godlike form, so perfect in its manly beauty, could be locked in the arms of death, and that that voice, whose eloquence entranced them, would never more be heard from mortal lips.

CHAPTER 23.

Governor Ford arrives in Carthage, but refuses to come to Nauvoo.—Joseph and a few chosen friends cross the Mississippi River, intending to go to the Rocky Mountains.—At the request of friends they return to Nauvoo.—Joseph, Hyrum and others go to Carthage for trial.—Bad behavior of the troops.—Governor Ford's perfidy.

Two days previous to this (June 16th) a public meeting had been held in Nauvoo, at which a number of delegates were appointed to go to the different precincts throughout the county to lay a true statement of the condition of affairs at Nauvoo before the people, and to correct the many false reports which had been put in circulation. Joseph also wrote to Governor Ford, and sent his letter by the hands of Edward Hunter, Philip B. Lewis and John Bills as messengers. In this letter he expressed his desire that the governor would come to Nauvoo in person, with his staff, and investigate the whole difficulty without delay. This he thought would be the best method of restoring peace to the country. With the letter he sent an affidavit concerning the intentions of the mob, but all this evidence had very little weight with Governor Ford, who lacked the firmness, decision of character and the sense of justice necessary to maintain order and to enforce the right. He became the tool of the mob, and they managed him, without informing him of all their plans to suit their purposes.

June 20th, Joseph wrote to those of the Twelve Apostles who were absent on missions to come home immediately. Brigham Young was at that time in Boston, Heber C. Kimball and Orson Pratt in Washington, Orson Hyde and William Smith in Philadelphia, Parley P. Pratt in New York, Wilford Woodruff in Portage, New York, Geo. A. Smith in Petersboro, John E. Page in Pittsburgh, Lyman Wight in Baltimore and Amasa M. Lyman in Cincinnati, Ohio.

On the same day Joseph gave directions to Theodore Turley to commence the manufacture of artillery. Turley asked if he should rent a building and set some men to work repairing the small arms which were out of order, but the Prophet told him confidentially that there would not be a gun fired on the part of the Saints during the whole "fuss."

June 21st, Governor Ford came to Carthage, one of the places where the mob had full sway, and sent an express into Nauvoo to the mayor and city council, requesting them to send out to him one or more well-informed, discreet persons, who could lay before him the city council's version of the difficulty. Elders John Taylor, Willard Richards and Dr. John M. Bernhisel were selected to go. Brothers Taylor and Bernhisel did go, taking with them a number of affidavits, which set forth in great plainness the acts of the mob, and Brother Richards remained to prepare additional documents. The next day these documents were sent by the hand of Lucien Woodworth, who went in the stead of Dr. Richards. Joseph wrote another long letter to Governor Ford, and sent it by him, in which he made many explanations, and repeated his request for the governor to come to Nauvoo. If he would come there, the mayor and city council could lay the whole matter before him in its true colors and sustain their statements by an abundance of testimony. But if they had to go to Carthage to do this, they would expose themselves to the power of a mob filled with fury and a desire to shed blood, a part of whom had already fired several times upon the Saints.

The following day (June 22nd) Joseph received the governor's answer, which plainly showed that he had no more real comprehension of the issues at stake between the Saints and the mob than if he had been a child. From the letter it could be readily perceived that the task of controlling or checking the mob was beyond his power. The charges in his letters were based upon the most vile falsehoods. He both scolded and entreated the mayor and city council; but one of the chief points in his letter was that they should submit themselves to be "arrested by the same constable, by virtue of the same warrant, and be tried by the same magistrate" who had issued the summons for their arrest on the charge of destroying the press of the Nauvoo Expositor. Nothing short of that, he said, would vindicate the dignity of the law and allay the "just excitement" of the people.

Joseph wrote a reply to Ford's letter that must have made the latter's cheeks tingle with shame when he read it, for Joseph controverted every one of Ford's statements and arguments. He said he could not see how it would be possible for them to be tried constitutionally by the same magistrate who first issued the writ, as the constitution expressly says that
